Decisions and Orders of the Board 1

This volume includes all important Decisions and Orders issued by the Board during the period June 1 through July 29, 1988.

Some Board Decisions granting routine motions for summary judgment contain nothing of precedential value and are not included in this volume. Copies of such Decisions can be obtained from the NLRB, Division of Information, Washington, D.C. 20570, by reference to volume and pamphlet number.

The page numbers of Board Decisions that carry pamphlet numbers may be found by referring to the Cross-Reference which appears immediately after the Table of Cases.

NOTE: The Board Decisions cited herein that contain the volume and pamphlet number, rather than the volume and page number, may be located in the Table of Cases or the Cross-Reference table of the particular volume cited.

Warehouse Union Local 6, International Longshoremen and Warehousemen's Union and Golden Grain Macaroni, Company. Case 32–CD–82

June 8, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER DENYING MOTIONS

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by Golden Grain Macaroni Company (the Employer) on October 5, 1984, and duly served on Warehouse Union Local 6, International Longshoremen and Warehousemen's Union (the Respondent), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint August 14, 1985, against the Respondent alleging that it had violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act.[1]

The complaint alleges that on October 2, 1984, the Respondent claimed that employees represented by it, rather than employees represented by Local 125, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers' International Union (Local 125), were entitled to package bread crumbs for Golden Grain stuffing mix at the Employer's Ghirardelli Chocolate Company plant (disputed work). The complaint also alleges that on October 4 and 5, 1984, the Respondent, in furtherance of its claim, encircled a machine at the Ghirardelli Chocolate Company plant, wrapped paper around it, and placed on it a sign bearing the legend "Unfair to Local 6." The complaint further alleges that by such conduct the Respondent induced and encouraged individuals employed by Golden Grain to engage in a strike or refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform services, and threatened, coerced, and restrained the Employer and other persons engaged in commerce, or in industries affecting commerce, with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees it represents, rather than to employees represented by Local 125. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent has failed and refused to comply with the Board's July 19, 1985 Decision and Determination of Dispute,[2] which awarded the disputed work to Local 125-represented employees, by failing to give the Regional Director timely and unequivocal written notice of its intent to comply with the decision. On August 22, 1985, the Respondent filed an answer admitting in part, and denying in part, the complaint allegations, denying the commission of any unfair labor practices, and asserting the work preservation doctrine as an affirmative defense.

On September 9, 1985, the General Counsel filed a Motion to Strike Denials in the Respondent's Answer and Motion for Summary Judgment. The General Counsel asserts that summary judgment should be granted because all evidentiary issues raised by the Respondent's answer were either litigated in the underlying 10(k) proceeding, admitted by the Respondent, or have been established by undisputed evidence.

On September 17, 1985, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. The Respondent filed a response, again asserting that the Respondent's conduct is protected by the work preservation doctrine.

We find, contrary to the General Counsel's contentions, that the pleadings and submissions of the parties raise issues which can best be resolved by a hearing before an administrative law judge. In its answer to the complaint, the Respondent denied, inter alia, that the Employer assigned the disputed work to Local 125-represented employees; that the Respondent claimed that Local 6-represented employees were entitled to perform the work; that the Respondent encircled a machine, wrapped paper around it, and placed a sign on it; that such conduct induced employees to engage in a work stoppage; that an object of the conduct was to force the Employer to assign the work to Local 6-represented employees rather than to Local 125-represented employees; and that the Respondent has refused to comply with the Board's determination of dispute by failing to state in writing its intent to comply.[3] The Respondent also raised its work preservation defense in both its answer to the complaint and its response to the Board's Notice to Show Cause.

[1] On August 23, 1985, the complaint was amended to correct the caption.

[2] Longshoremen ILWU Local 6 (Golden Grain), 275 NLRB 1128 (1985). In that case the Board rejected the Respondent's work preservation defense and found reasonable cause to believe Sec. 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act had been violated. No credibility issues were raised.

[3] We note with regard to this final allegation that the Respondent has not submitted evidence to rebut the General Counsel's affidavit showing noncompliance. Such refusal to promise compliance with the 10(k) determination does not, however, serve as an independent basis for finding an 8(b)(4)(D) violation. Rather, such noncompliance serves as a triggering event for the issuance of a complaint. See Iron Workers Local 595 (Bechtel Corp.), 112 NLRB 812, 817 (1955); Operating Engineers Local 150 (D. H. Johnson Co.), 268 NLRB 1339, 1341 (1984), enfd. 755 F.2d 78 (7th Cir. 1985). To the extent that cases such as Longshoremen ILWU Local 62–B (Alaska Timber), 271 NLRB 1291 fn. 3 (1984), modified 781 F.2d 919 (D.C. Cir. 1986), and Plumbers Local 195 (Texas Oil), 231 NLRB 525, 527 (1977), enfd. 574 F.2d 1215 (5th Cir. 1978), are inconsistent, they are overruled.

An 8(b)(4)(D) proceeding, unlike a 10(k) proceeding, is an adjudicatory proceeding required to be conducted pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 554. As the Supreme Court noted in ITT v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 134, 419 U.S. 428, 446 (1975), relying on the following footnote from NLRB v. Plasterers Local 79, 404 U.S. 116, 122 fn. 10 (1971):

> The 10(k) determination is not binding as such even on the striking union. If that union continues to picket despite an adverse 10(k) decision, the Board must prove the union guilty of a 8(b)(4)(D) violation before a cease-and-desist order can issue. The findings and conclusions in a 10(k) proceeding are not res judicata on the unfair labor practice issue in the later § 8(b)(4)(D) determination. International Typographical Union, 125 N.L.R.B. 759, 761 (1959). Both parties may put in new evidence at the § 8(b)(4)(D) stage, although often, as in the present cases, the parties agree to stipulate the record of the 10(k) hearing as a basis for the Board's determination of the unfair labor practice. Finally, to exercise its powers under § 10(k), the Board need only find that there is reasonable cause to believe that a § 8(b)(4)(D) violation has occurred, while in the § 8(b)(4)(D) proceeding itself the Board must find by a preponderance of the evidence that the picketing union has violated § 8(b)(4)(D). International Typographical Union, supra at 761 fn. 5 (1959).

Therefore, when a 10(k) determination does not end the work dispute, the proceeding becomes adjudicatory following the issuance of an unfair labor practice complaint. Bricklayers v. NLRB, 475 F.2d 1316, 1322 (D.C. Cir. 1973), enfg. 188 NLRB 148 (1971). At that point, if a genuine issue of material fact exists whether an unfair labor practice has occurred, a hearing before an administrative law judge is required, even if the issue was previously litigated in the underlying 10(k) proceeding. In this regard, we find that a genuine issue of material fact exists when there are credibility issues to be resolved or when a respondent denies the existence of an element of the 8(b)(4)(D) violation, either directly or by raising an affirmative defense. An 8(b)(4)(D) respondent is not, however, required to proffer new and previously unavailable evidence in order to be entitled to a hearing.[4] Accordingly, we overrule prior Board cases to the extent they suggest that a respondent in an 8(b)(4)(D) proceeding is not entitled to relitigate factual issues concerning the elements of the 8(b)(4)(D) violation that were raised in an underlying 10(k) proceeding unless it presents new or previously unavailable evidence.[5]

Thus, summary judgment will be appropriate only when the parties have stipulated the record of the 10(k) hearing as a basis for the Board's determination of the unfair labor practice or when a respondent has not demonstrated the existence of a material issue of fact with respect to the findings made at the 10(k) proceeding.[6] In these instances, the Board will continue to utilize the record in the 10(k) hearing in order to determine whether, by a preponderance of the evidence, an 8(b)(4)(D) violation has occurred.

In this case, the parties have not stipulated the 10(k) record as a basis for the 8(b)(4)(D) unfair labor practice determination. Further, the Respondent's work preservation defense is a mixed question of fact and law relating to the alleged illegal object of the Respondent's conduct. We find that, by its renewal of the work preservation defense in its answer to the complaint and in its response to the notice to show cause, combined with its denial of the complaint allegations relating to whether the alleged unlawful conduct occurred, the Respondent has demonstrated the existence of a material issue of fact regarding the elements of the alleged 8(b)(4)(D) violation. Accordingly, we conclude that summary judgment is inappropriate in the instant case.

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's motions are denied and the proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 32 for further appropriate action.

[4] The Board will not, however, relitigate threshold matters that are not necessary to prove an 8(b)(4)(D) violation. See Bricklayers, above, in which the court found the threshold issue of whether there had been an agreed method of settlement had been resolved by the Board in the 10(k) proceeding.

See Rule 56(e), which provides, inter alia, as follows: "When a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of his pleading, but his response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On October 13, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber, Warrenton, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 23, 24, and 25 September 1986 in Warrenton and Thomson, Georgia, based on a charge filed by General Teamsters, Local Union No. 528 (the Union) on 5 March 1985 and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board on 4 April 1985.[1] The complaint alleged that E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging two employees for engaging in union activities. Respondent's timely answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.[2]

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were submitted by the General Counsel and Respondent on 10 November 1986. Both briefs were considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, and on substantive, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber is a Georgia corporation engaged in the manufacturing of innertubes in Warrenton, Georgia. Jurisdiction is not in issue. E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber, in the past 12 months, in the course and conduct of its business operations, shipped products from its Warrenton facility valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points located outside the State of Georgia. I conclude and find that E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

Respondent is the successor to Polson Rubber Co., for whom several current employees and supervisors were employed. The product is rubber innertubes. At present the plant manufactures on three shifts and the shipping department operates on two shifts. Bill Bonner is plant manager, Jim Harper is personnel manager, Lewis Newsome is production superintendent, Earnest Hobbs is shipping manager, and Grover Jobes is the subordinate shipping supervisor responsible for the boxing employees on each of the two shifts, 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. and 4 p.m. to midnight. Each of the three manufacturing shifts is supervised by a general foreman. Boyd Taylor is the general foreman on the first shift and Linton Jones is the subordinate mill supervisor on the first shift. Each manufacturing shift has mold lines, splice and valve employees, and inspectors. A chief inspector is present on each manufacturing shift. Eloise Braddy was chief inspector on the first shift in manufacturing and Gloria Yarbough was boxing supervisor on the second shift in shipping.

On 31 August 1984 the Union won an election among Respondent's employees. The Union was not certified as the exclusive representative, however, until 11 November 1985. From that certification until June 1986 the parties were engaged in motions including a summary judgment for the General Counsel. The Board denied the summary judgment and notice of hearing issued on 23 July 1986.

Respondent in its answer to the General Counsel's complaint admitted the discharges of Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough on 28 September 1984. Respondent also admitted that the two employees were discharged for engaging in union activities.

The General Counsel's complaint alleges that the discharges violate the Act and Respondent contends that the two employees are "supervisors" and therefore not protected by the Act.

Pertinent testimony of witnesses is detailed below.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Eloise Braddy testified that her previous employment of 5 years was at Polson Rubber, the predecessor company, where the last 2 years she served as chief inspector. Her employment at Polson ceased 18 January 1980 and she was hired by Respondent on 26 January 1981. Braddy was hired by Melissa Dawkins, personnel director of Respondent, along with all other inspectors from Polson. There was no discussion of duties or responsibilities of inspectors for Respondent because all inspectors were experienced. Braddy was hired as chief inspector on the first shift (7 a.m. to 3 p.m.). She was salaried at $10,000 progressing to $12,559 on the day of her discharge and was a nonexempt employee for overtime pay purposes. Braddy, as chief inspector, had contributory health insurance on an 80/20 basis of company pay/-employee pay, whereas the hourly paid employees had a 60/40 ratio. She received a 2-week vacation after 1 year and 3 weeks after 5 years, contrasted with hourly employees, who received 1 week and 2 weeks, respectively.

Braddy oversees the on-the-job training of new inspectors but has no authority to hire or fire employees nor to assign employees to a particular work station. Plant management hires employees and assigns employees to work stations. All new hires for the inspector classification train on the first shift without regard for their permanent shift assignment. Taylor decides what position the new hire is assigned to and Braddy trains the new hire in that same position. Usual training period is 3 weeks devoted to learning to spot open splices, wrinkles, pinches, holes, and thin sidewalls. Inspectors mark tubes with defects and place them on a conveyor to repair. Good tubes are placed on a conveyor to warehousing preparatory to boxing and shipping.

There are 13 hourly employees in the inspection department; 8 regular inspectors, 1 relief inspector, 2 repair persons, 1 classifier, and 1 warehouseman. There are four production lines (A, B, C, and D) consisting of approximately 14 molds each. Two inspectors are stationed on each production line and divide the output of the molds evenly. Normal production consists of standard passenger car tubes or truck/tractor tubes that are larger. Passenger tubes flow down the line at the rate of one per minute, and that is the established standard for the inspectors, seven tubes each 7 minutes. The truck/tractor tubes are larger and require more molding time and more inspection time. Typically, two inspectors on a line will pass 700 passenger tubes and reject 50 to 100 as defects. Braddy, as chief inspector, inspects all defective tubes from the four production lines to determine repairability and marks each tube with her stamp before sending it to repair. Braddy follows the established standard of no more than three repairs per tube, unless the repairs are small, allowing a total of four repairs. Any tubes less than 50 percent rubber or outside the repair standard are labeled scrap and recycled into production. Tubes with more than 50 percent rubber and outside the repair standard are labeled "blems" and sold as seconds. On occasion Braddy's inspection does not substantiate a defect and the tube is returned to the original inspector. Many tubes, in addition to repairs, labeling as scrap or blems must be buffed to remove unwanted and excess rubber dregs before proceeding to warehousing. Braddy's department in the past had a buffer classification but that has not been the case for years. Braddy, in addition to inspecting 400 to 500 tubes from all 4 lines per day, must operate the buffing machine and see that the department is supplied with valve cases and necessary tools. Ninety-five percent of Braddy's workday is spent at her station inspecting and handling tubes from the production line. The remainder of her workday is spent on recordkeeping of scrap and repairs per day and the filling out of forms for employees in her department.

All tubes needing repair are repaired by one of the two repair persons and then sent to the classifier. The classifier determines if the repair is satisfactory or if the tube should be scrapped. Usually all tubes produced on a shift are inspected rather than leaving any for the next shift. Occasionally, repairs or blems may be left for the next shift depending on the critical nature of the scheduled production.

Quality control, a separate department, spot checks first-line tubes (those tubes passed by the inspectors) for defects or other misinspections. Any tubes found defective by quality control are red-tagged with the original inspector's number and returned to the production department. Boyd Taylor decides if the red-tagged inspector will be disciplined and if so whether it will be a warning or a writeup. Taylor then instructs Braddy to do it. Braddy either executes the warning or writeup during shift or after shift, depending on her own workload of tubes. Braddy includes all writeups with her record sheets and turns them in daily to Taylor. She does not see the writeup again. Someone in management is responsible for them and for implementing the discipline policy of three writeups, then discharge. From time to time the number of red tags becomes a problem. The shift will start with all employees going through the red-tagged tubes to familiarize themselves with what is causing red tags in an effort to increase efficiency. Taylor has in the past instructed Braddy to counsel certain employees about their work performance and to help them do a better job of inspecting.

Braddy also, on instructions from Taylor, writes up employees for tardiness and absenteeism. The Company's rule requires employees to call in before shift to report unavailability. Usually the third-shift supervisor or Boyd Taylor will take the call and tell Braddy who would be out or late that day. Braddy has sometimes been in the office before shift and taken a phone call; she cannot, however, excuse employees on her own. She has to report to Taylor and he decides what to do. All writeups by Braddy are subject to approval by Taylor, the personnel department, or the production superintendent. On several occasions writeups by Braddy were changed by Taylor or someone else without consultation of Braddy. Braddy has not, on her own or via a recommendation, told Taylor that anyone should be disciplined or fired. On one recent occasion, an employee called Braddy a "bitch" during shift. At some later time Braddy mentioned it to Taylor, and he said she should have reported the incident to him, and he would have sent the employee home. Taylor also told Braddy that she should have written up the employee. Braddy's standing instructions from Taylor were to report to him any employees not doing their work. If Taylor did not personally speak to the employee, he would tell Braddy what to say to the employee. If the employee did not thereafter perform satisfactorily, Braddy was to write up the employee. All inspection employees are evaluated after the first 30 days of employment. The wage schedule for inspectors contains four steps from hire-in wage to top of the scale. Evaluations are based on the Company's inspection standard of five large tubes each 13 minutes and seven passenger tubes each 7 minutes. Braddy has, on four or five occasions since 1981, checked a new employee against the standards and filled out an employee status change sheet, which allows the employee to receive the appropriate step increase in wage. The employee status sheets are supplied by the personnel office at the appointed time for each employee. Most frequently, Taylor filled out the sheets and gave them to Braddy to sign. Braddy stated that she had authority to recommend discipline of employees by writing up the employee for poor quality of production, tardies, and absences because that was what she did in accord with the procedures. The writeups were turned in to Taylor at shift's end for processing.

Employees are allowed several breaks and lunchtime each shift. Inspectors are relieved for breaks so the production line can continue running. Reliefs are handled by the relief inspector. There have been times when the relief inspector was absent or filling in for an absent inspector and inspectors would break at the same time as the molder to keep tubes from piling up during break. Each inspector takes breaks according to an early or late schedule. In the past the schedule allowed the same inspector the same break every shift. Even though inspectors were allowed to switch breaks with each other as long as the line was attended, the schedule was the rule. The inspectors complained to Braddy about the inequity and she talked to Taylor. Taylor told Braddy the inspectors could rotate by line so no one inspector would always be early or late.

Taylor decides when overtime is necessary and tells Braddy to check for volunteers. If an insufficient number of employees volunteer for overtime, the employees draw straws to see who must work. Any employees who refuse to work their overtime are disciplined. Taylor decides what discipline and instructs Braddy to write up the employee. Taylor usually knows when employees are to be late or absent, but if an employee does not report for work Braddy advises Taylor. He picks employees from a call-board and either he or Braddy makes the call to the employee. The process continues repeatedly until contact with an accepting employee is made.

As chief inspector, Braddy has the authority to shut down a certain mold continuously producing defective tubes, but she must immediately notify Taylor so he can find the trouble and correct it.

From plant opening in 1981 to the union campaign beginning in July, there were scheduled meetings of supervisors. Braddy was not required to attend nor was she invited to attend any of the supervisors' meetings. After employees walked out 10 July, management commenced daily meetings of all salaried production employees on each shift. Quality control employees also attended the meetings. Management was seeking information about union discussions among employees and speculation of who would vote for the Union and who would vote for the Company.

On two other occasions Braddy attended meetings with management. One just before the election and the other 2 weeks before her discharge. Both meetings were held in Bonner's office in the presence of Bonner, Newsome, and Company Attorney Cobb. In the first meeting Braddy was asked to reveal what she had heard about the Union from employees in her department and to designate the affiliation of each employee in her department for the upcoming election. Braddy told the assembled management what she knew of the union conversations among employees in her department and characterized each employee as procompany or prounion. The second meeting included additional supervisors, Harper and Taylor. Cobb started the meeting by telling Braddy that five employees had reported threats by her to management. Cobb stated that the five employees said Braddy had told them to join the Union or she would have them fired. Braddy denied making any such threats to employees and further denied talking to employees about the Union. Cobb asked if she had signed a union card or attended union meetings. Braddy replied that she had neither signed a card nor attended union meetings. Cobb then asked Braddy if she would be willing to go before the National Labor Relations Board and state that she had talked to all employees in the plant and influenced them to vote for the Union. Cobb told Braddy if she spoke to the National Labor Relations Board he felt the election would be thrown out. Braddy told the assembled management that she would do whatever they wanted. Cobb then asked Braddy if she would submit to a polygraph test and Braddy agreed to do so. The meeting ended and Braddy left to go to her car. As she approached her car she became upset and started crying. On reflection Braddy felt she was not being treated right so she reentered the plant and went to Bonner's office. She told the assembled management that she had changed her mind and would not talk to the National Labor Relations Board or submit to a polygraph test.

Braddy added that they could fire her for not doing it if they wanted to. Bonner stated that no one said anything about firing her and asked Braddy if she was feeling all right. Braddy told Bonner that she was all right and left again to go home. Braddy worked as usual after that and no one mentioned the meeting or its substance again.

Braddy worked 28 September, without incident and without conversation from her supervisor. She felt something was wrong because Newsome spent the day just looking at her and not saying a word. At 2:55 p.m., Taylor brought Braddy her paycheck and told her to see Harper in his office. Braddy compiled her production sheets, as she always did, and turned them over to Taylor and went to Harper's office. Harper had Braddy's personnel folder and a completed separation notice before him when Braddy arrived. Braddy asked why she was being fired and Harper replied that he was told to discharge her for "union activities."

Ophelia Grier testified that she worked as an inspector for Polson Rubber and was hired by Warrenton as an inspector when the plant started operations. She worked first shift with Braddy. Grier, although employed at Warrenton, would on occasion fill in for chief inspectors on other shifts, but did not fill out any forms or documents normally executed by the chief inspector. Several times Grier has heard Taylor instruct Braddy to write up employees for too many red tags. Once Grier herself and two other employees were subjects of writeups dictated by Taylor. In the past Grier was forced by severe winter weather to call in absent. She would ask for Taylor or Braddy when calling, but Taylor answered the phone and told her to get to work when she could. Grier has not talked to Braddy when calling in. Whenever she wanted to leave work early Grier would make the request of Braddy. Braddy did not on her own grant any permission to leave work. Braddy would tell Taylor of the request and then relay Taylor's answer to the employee. Either "yes" or "no." Grier also worked as relief inspector. She would relieve each line inspector and then the chief inspector although the chief did not have a set time to break. The chief inspector's job is harder than the line inspectors because the chief has more work to do. Relief inspectors also fill in for any absent inspector for the whole day. Whenever Grier filled in for the chief inspector, whether breaktime, lunch, or the full day, she did have to relay Taylor's instructions or criticisms to the employees. "If they had done wrong and if Taylor come to me I have to tell them what Taylor said."

Gloria Yarbough testified that she worked in the boxing department of Polson and was hired by Warrenton for boxing in 1981 at an hourly rate on the first shift. After 3 months she became crew leader of boxing on the second shift at the same hourly rate. The second shift boxing crew is composed of five boxers, one conveyor man, one tube supplier, and the crew leader. The second shift times are 3 to 11 p.m., but the crew leader always arrives 15 minutes early to consult with the first-shift crew leader about the ongoing order. Each tube size has to be packed in different boxes and each crew leader has a list of tube sizes to be packed on that shift. Yarbough always started her shift with extra sheets of orders supplied by Shipping Supervisor Jobes. As crew leader, Yarbough would determine from the shipping list what size boxes the crew would need. She physically moved the correct bundle of boxes to the work area and labeled the boxes with the tube sizes and quantity. There were approximately 50 different sizes. Tubes to be packed would be moved into the area by the supply person and if bundles of boxes were short he also moved them in. On occasion when special orders required more speed, Yarbough would tell the tube man to give a certain size tube to a particular boxer because she could box faster than the others. Usually on Thursdays or Fridays a rush order would require one or two boxes of tubes made up before the truck was loaded and someone would tell Yarbough what to box and she would either get it boxed or do it herself. There are times when an unusual size is ordered and Jobes or Hobbs would have to determine the box size and quantity before the crew could box them.

Whenever employees were not working as they should, Yarbough told them if they did not stop what they were doing or pay more attention to their work, she would tell Jobes or Hobbs. Jobes would normally come out on the floor and talk with the employees to get them straightened out. On occasion, Jobes told Yarbough to send the employee to his office. Blank writeup notices were kept in Jobes' office. Although Yarbough wrote up employees, she could not do so unless Jobes or Hobbs told her to do so. She did not on her own volition write up or otherwise discipline employees. After being instructed to write up an employee, Yarbough always turned in the writeup to Jobes and never saw it again. Yarbough also filled out employee attendance information sheets whenever employees were absent, tardy, or left work early and turned in the sheets to Jobes. Only Jobes or Hobbs could give employees permission to leave work early and, if both Jobes and Hobbs had left for the day when an employee requested permission to leave early, Yarbough called one or the other at home to see if the employee could leave early. At all times when employees called in to report an absence or being late to work, they spoke to Jobes or Hobbs. Yarbough would not know of an absent or late employee until supervision informed her.

All employees trained on the job at the hire-in rate. If a new employee was boxing at a speed comparable to the older employees Yarbough told Jobes. Sometimes Jobes told Yarbough to check on the performance of certain employees and report to him. Jobes would decide if a new employee could have a first wage increase and whether older employees were entitled to a wage increase. When Jobes decides that an employee is entitled to a wage increase he tells Yarbough to write up the employee for an increase. Yarbough would do so and leave the form with Jobes for his approval. Normally, Yarbough did not have time during shift to make whatever writeups she was told to do, so she waited until the end of the shift to do her paperwork, sometimes during the last 15 minutes and sometimes after shift.

In the past, Yarbough has complained to Jobes and/or Hobbs about certain employees not doing their job or causing friction among the crew. She suggested one time that a particular employee be discharged because he would not do his job and always caused trouble. Both Jobes and Hobbs talked to Yarbough about the situation and decided to transfer the employee to another shift. Several other employees have been a problem either due to slow work or bad work, and Yarbough also reported their performance to Jobes. After such a report Jobes or Hobbs would come to the floor and counsel the employee to do better. If an employee was not keeping up with the crew and had been reported by Yarbough to Jobes or Hobbs, either or both of them would observe the employee's work. They then decided whether to give the employee more time to work up to speed or to tell Yarbough to write them up. One employee was fired by Jobes because the wrong size tubes were shipped and then returned by the customer.

Whenever overtime was required Hobbs or Jobes decided how long to work. With the exception of Saturdays, usually several employees had to work. Yarbough was told to check with the employees to see who wanted to work overtime. If no one, including Yarbough, wanted to work overtime either Jobes or Hobbs would talk to the whole crew. There were times when only Yarbough was willing to work overtime and she would work by herself. Several Saturdays, Jobes and Hobbs called Yarbough at home for overtime work and she came in to work by herself.

Work breaks among the boxing crew were taken all at the same time unless there was an order that had to be finished. In that event Yarbough would relieve each employee, one by one, until all had been given a break. The order of relief was decided by the employees and who wanted to go on break first. On one occasion, the whole crew took a few extra minutes on break. Jobes saw that Yarbough was the only one at her work station. Jobes told Yarbough to write up all five employees for overstaying break when there was work to do.

During the month of July, on Fridays, when shift started, if the first shift had left enough boxes and tubes to keep the second shift occupied for awhile, Yarbough would not have to move boxes or tubes into position right away. With the crew already working Jobes would tell Yarbough to get the timecards from the rack and initial the employees' recorded time. The initialing of timecards was actually Jobes' responsibility, but he would utilize Yarbough's slow time to help him.

About the first week in August, Yarbough was put on salary, contrary to her wishes. Hobbs called her to his office and asked how she felt about going on salary. Yarbough told Hobbs she preferred staying at an hourly rate because of the weekly paycheck. Hobbs told her to think about it for a few days and they would talk again. Yarbough went to Hobbs several days later and told Hobbs she did not want to go on salary. Hobbs said she had to go on salary whether she wanted to or not and told her to see Harper in the personnel office. Yarbough told Harper that she preferred an hourly wage, but Harper said she had to go on salary and explained to her that she would get a raise and additional benefits. On salary, Yarbough received a paid vacation whereas before she had not, and with a salary she no longer punched the timeclock. She kept the title crew leader and was not told she was thereafter a supervisor. Hobbs did tell Yarbough that she could not talk to the union employees nor could she vote in the election because she was now a salaried employee. Yarbough did feel that she was a supervisor of sorts because she was instructed to see that the work was done and was to report any deficiencies of employees' performances to Jobes or Hobbs. Also Yarbough did the same work that Dorothy Ray did on first shift, and Yarbough considered her to be a supervisor. Yarbough, however, did not have the authority to hire or fire employees nor the authority to recommend such actions. Yarbough's job remained the same after salary as it had been before with the exception that she was given one additional duty, the initialing of timecards whenever employees worked overtime. Yarbough was paid for her overtime, at an hourly rate, after she was put on salary just as she had been before.

Within a week of the election Yarbough was called to the front office by Hobbs. Hobbs informed her that Bonner and Newsome wanted to ask her some questions. When Yarbough arrived at the front office, Attorney Cobb was also present. Cobb did most of the talking and wrote a statement of Yarbough's responses. Cobb asked Yarbough if she went to the union meetings in the city park and she said she had. She was asked if she had signed a union card and told management present that she had. Yarbough was then asked to recall which employees she had seen in attendance at the park meetings, but she said there were too many to name. Yarbough was asked to sign the statement that Attorney Cobb wrote during the meeting and she did.

On 28 September when Yarbough arrived for work she was called to Harper's office. Harper told Yarbough she was fired for having engaged in union activities. Harper paid her and she left the property.

Lula West testified she had been employed as a repair person since Respondent opened the plant. She repairs tubes on the first shift. Occasionally, West runs the buffing machine in addition to repairing tubes. At present her hourly rate of pay is $4.53 and has been since 1984. Although Braddy was chief inspector, if West wanted to leave work early, she would notify Braddy. Braddy in turn would ask Taylor if West could leave early. Taylor's decision was then passed on to West by Braddy. On the days that West intended to come in late or be absent the whole day she would call in. West would tell whoever answered the phone to tell Taylor of her absence or her tardiness. West never spoke to Braddy when calling in nor did she ever ask for Braddy. In overtime situations, if employees refused to work overtime, Braddy told them that Taylor said to write up anyone who did not stay over. Delores Pinkston, chief inspector on the third shift, was transferred to first shift after Braddy was discharged. Taylor does little, if any, manual work in the plant. Mostly he checks the molds and the tubes in various stages of production.

Grover Jobes testified that he retired from Respondent's employment on 6 March 1986. While employed he was shipping supervisor with responsibility to schedule the work of the boxing department and see that the proper crew was in the department each shift. He also had responsibility for completion of shipping schedules of the shipping employees. Jobes worked from 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. normally but on a weekly basis worked over 3 or 4 days until 6 or 7 p.m. There were two shipping employees on the second shift under Jobes' supervision, but after Jobes left for the day they were unsupervised. Jobes relied on one of the most senior employees to get the order shipped in his absence.

When the plant reopened in 1981, the boxing department was set up with a crew leader, Dorothy Ray, on the first shift only. Within a short time Ray was changed from hourly to salary. Jobes explained that Ray was referred to as a supervisor after she became salaried. Gloria Yarbough had boxing experience when she was hired into the boxing department with Ray. Yarbough on occasion assisted Ray in the boxing operation. When a second-shift boxing department was installed, Yarbough became the crew leader on the second shift. Jobes instructed her to handle the second shift according to what she was supposed to do or what she was trained to do. Jobes did not tell her what her title would be. He took for granted that Yarbough would know what her position would be and what she would be doing. Jobes did not, in any descriptive language, tell Yarbough that she was a supervisor or the supervisor of the second-shift boxing. Jobes did recall that when Yarbough was put on second shift he talked to both she and Ray. He instructed both that they had the authority to orally discipline employees and showed them the discipline forms to use. Jobes showed them where the discipline forms were kept in his office, but he did not tell Yarbough that she could write up employees without first reporting to him. Specifically, whenever Yarbough reported an incident to Jobes before any discipline was administered, Jobes never told her that she could discipline or write up employees without checking with him. Jobes, on occasion, after hearing Yarbough's report of an employee, would tell her to let the incident pass without a writeup or he would talk to the employee himself. Jobes initialed all writeups because if he did not, when Hobbs saw the writeup without Jobes' approval he would say, "Jobes, do you agree with this?"

One example of the discipline procedure cited by Jobes occurred in May 1984. Jobes had instructed Yarbough to have employee Vernon Johnson stock a certain size tube when he started his shift. Later in the shift Yarbough called Jobes and reported that she had given Johnson the instruction but he refused to do the task. Jobes told Yarbough that she knew the procedure, what "we" had to do and to go ahead and do it. Yarbough then wrote up Johnson for refusal to follow instructions and poor quality workmanship. Jobes initialed the writeup to confirm that Yarbough had followed through with what she was supposed to do.

A second example of discipline occurring in May 1984 involved Willie Norris. He reported for work intoxicated at 8 p.m. Yarbough called Jobes at home to report the incident. Jobes returned to the plant and sent Norris home. The following morning Jobes wrote up the incident on a discipline form and signed Yarbough's name to show that the incident took place on the second shift. Jobes also reported the incident to Hobbs.

Jobes also stated that both Ray and Yarbough talked to employees who had trouble doing the work or trouble on the shift. They would more or less give the employees an oral discipline and then report to him. A writeup of the employee on a discipline form following a report to Jobes was standard procedure. In fact, in the absence of Ray or Yarbough from the boxing department, Jobes would discipline employees followed by a writeup, but Jobes always signed the crew leader's name to the writeup. On occasion, but not at all times, Jobes would notify the crew leader on her return of the previous writeup.

Also in May, Wyvonie Collins was in training as a boxer on second shift. Yarbough saw that Collins was working at a speed comparable to the older employees but receiving the hourly wage of trainees. Jobes told Yarbough to put it in writing to him and Hobbs. Yarbough wrote a note to Hobbs and Jobes recommending that Collins be taken off the training pay and given her first incremental pay raise. Jobes discussed Collins with Hobbs and Hobbs told Jobes to take it to personnel to see if she could get a raise. Jobes followed through and Collins got her raise.

Typically, Yarbough's workday began with her checking with first-shift boxers (Ray) to see what was left to do on any current orders and checking with Jobes for any additional orders to work. Jobes had premade lists of tubes to be boxed and shipped for Yarbough to work from, and he would supply her with enough lists to last the entire shift. If special orders were needed Jobes would supply a written schedule of tubes and tell her what priority the special order had. After Yarbough received the production schedules, she would check to see if all employees reported for work. If all employees had not reported for work, Yarbough informed Jobes and he would get with Hobbs to determine if someone from first shift should be held over, if someone should be called in for overtime, or if Yarbough should work with a short crew. The decision by Jobes and Hobbs rested on the critical nature of the orders on the production schedule. Once the shift started Yarbough made up boxes with labels according to written specifications detailing how various sized tubes were to be boxed and shipped. Yarbough also gave the tube supplier a copy of the production schedule so he would know what size tubes to supply to the boxers. The box label told the boxers what size tube and the quantity to put in each box. Yarbough would stack the prepared boxes in separate areas so the tube supplier would know where to put the correct size tubes to be boxed. Yarbough, during shift, would inspect random boxes to check the accuracy of the boxers' work.

The Company's call-in rule applied plantwide to all employees. The employees were instructed to call in at least one-half hour before shift time if they expected to be late or absent. Second-shift boxing employees were to call in and speak to Jobes or Hobbs. First-shift employees who called in to report late or absent were instructed to speak to Taylor or Newsome. If a second-shift boxer had called in as instructed, Jobes would tell Yarbough when she came on shift that an employee would be late or absent.

The Company's rule on employees leaving early from shift also applies throughout the plant to all personnel. The Company would not require employees who become sick at work or who have a personal emergency to stay at work. If a second-shift boxer became sick or had an emergency, Yarbough was not required to notify Jobes of the emergency at his home. Any other request to leave early, less than major or catastrophic, had to be decided by Jobes or higher authority before the fact. Yarbough could not on her own release employees making such a request. Whenever a boxer did leave early, Yarbough had to finish the shift with the short crew since she did not have authority to call in off-shift employees. Only Jobes or Hobbs could authorize replacement employees.

Overtime for the boxing employees was only authorized by Hobbs. He would tell Jobes how much overtime for any given day and how many employees would be needed. Jobes would pass the word on to Yarbough. If less than the full crew was needed, Yarbough would ask for volunteers. In the event no employees volunteered, Yarbough reported to Jobes who then went to the boxing area and appointed the requisite number of employees to stay and work overtime. At the end of each week, all timecards showing overtime had to be initialed before employees would receive overtime pay. Jobes had instructed both Ray and Yarbough that the timecards had to be initialed before they were picked up on Friday evenings by payroll and told Ray and Yarbough to initial them.

Yarbough did not have authority to hire or fire employees. Although she never recommended anyone be hired, she did on one occasion recommend that a recalcitrant employee, Vernon Johnson, be discharged. Yarbough reported to Jobes in June 1984 that Johnson refused to do work that she had instructed him to do. Jobes told Yarbough to follow the procedures, make a writeup and turn it in to him. Jobes in turn discussed the writeup with Hobbs. Both separately counseled Johnson and later Hobbs told Jobes that he would handle the situation. Jobes had no further involvement with the incident.

Yarbough, also, did not have authority to remedy any employee complaints relative to hours worked or wages received. Only Jobes could make any adjustments for the employees. Yarbough could handle complaints by employees of water on the floor by having the janitor clean it up. Although other employees could not leave their work stations to look for the janitor, if the janitor was in the area, any employee could tell him to clean up a wet floor.

Jobes was not aware that Yarbough was put on salary until she told him. Although he did not know when Yarbough went on salary, he knew that her status changed from boxer to supervisor with the salary. The changed status, however, did not carry with it any additional duties. Yarbough worked as she always had since going on the second shift.

Shortly after Yarbough's discharge, the second-shift boxing department was discontinued due to a reduction in tube orders.

Evelyn Reynolds testified she has been a boxer on the second shift for 3 years. She was hired by the office and interviewed in the office. When Reynolds began employment, she was sent to Jobes' office. Jobes told Reynolds that she would be working under Yarbough and that Yarbough was the "boss." Jobes added that if Reynolds had any problems, she was to come to him, or, if there are problems that Yarbough cannot handle, come to him. Jobes also told Yarbough if she had any trouble with the employees to call him. Yarbough told Reynolds that Barbara would show her what to do and how to put the tubes in the boxes. Yarbough asked Barbara to help Reynolds and show her what to do. The box labels state the tube size and quantity for each box. The boxers simply put the stated tube size and number in each box. The production quota for each boxer was 1000 tubes in 8 hours. Each day a boxer begins work at the same work station unless the boxes and tubes are stacked differently. If the work stations are different, Yarbough will tell the employees what kind of orders are to be done and how the boxing is to be done. The department is set up with four boxing stations and two extras. All six stations are supplied with boxes and tubes each day. Any time a boxer completes the boxes and tubes at her station, she is supposed to move to one of the extra stations and continue working. As a work station is emptied, a new supply of boxes and tubes are brought in. When the boxer at the extra station runs out of work the movement is reversed.

Reynolds came to work one night and Yarbough told her that she looked sick. Reynolds told Yarbough that she did not feel good but she wanted to try and make the shift. Later Reynolds told Yarbough that she could not make it and was going home. Yarbough asked Reynolds if she had a way home and Reynolds responded, "yes." Yarbough told Reynolds to bring a doctor's excuse when she returned. Reynolds came to work the next day and turned in her doctor's excuse to Jobes.

Vernon Johnson was the tube supplier and Yarbough always had trouble with him. Johnson would shout and cuss Yarbough whenever she corrected what he was doing. Usually, Johnson would not put the tubes in the right work station. Yarbough would end the colloquy with, "I'll call Grover [Jobes]" or "I'll write you up." Johnson responded, "I can write too." On occasion, Yarbough reminded Johnson that she was his "supervisor" to which Johnson replied, "You wasn't shit."

Bernice Johnson, another employee that Yarbough had trouble with, would argue with her. When Yarbough told Bernice that she was her supervisor, Bernice would reply that Yarbough "wasn't nothing." Yarbough at that point would take Bernice from the work floor, but Reynolds did not know where they went.

Willie J. Norris, an additional troublesome employee that was told by Yarbough "I am your supervisor," would engage in cussing Yarbough with language too nasty to repeat.

Reynolds knew that both Johnson and Norris were written up for their nasty conduct, but Yarbough never made the writeups at the time of the incidents. Yarbough made all the writeups after the shift ended. On many occasions when Yarbough had trouble with an employee she would say, "I'm going to tell Earnest [Hobbs] or I'm going to tell Grover [Jobes]." Some time later, either Hobbs or Jobes would come into the department and talk to the employees. Jobes called the whole crew into his office one afternoon and told them, "Yarbough is your boss, you do what she say do." Jobes added that he did not want to have to come back into the plant every night to straighten things out.

One week Reynolds and several others were shorted on their paychecks. The employees told Yarbough and gave her their check stubs. Later Jobes came to the department and told Yarbough the pay oversight was straightened out, and Yarbough told all the employees what Jobes had said.

Yarbough never told Reynolds that she was the supervisor during working hours, but one time riding enroute to work she did. Yarbough said she had been made supervisor but was not ready for it because she needed to get her weekly check to catch up her bills. Even though Yarbough said she was to be a supervisor, the only thing that changed was Yarbough no longer punched a timeclock.

When Reynolds was in training, she was slow working up to the standard of 1000 tubes. At one point, Yarbough told Reynolds that "they" were getting on her and she would have to tell "them" when Reynolds was doing her job right. Yarbough said she told Jobes that Reynolds was slow but she was a steady worker and could do it. Reynolds completed her probationary period producing below standard, and received a partial raise. Later, Reynolds did start producing at standard and Yarbough said she would tell Jobes. After awhile, Yarbough told Reynolds that her raise had been granted and Reynolds did later get her raise.

Wyvonie Collins testified that she was hired as a boxer on the second shift by the personnel office. After the interview, the office lady took Collins to the boxing department, showed her how to use the timeclock, and introduced her to Yarbough. The office lady told Collins that Yarbough would tell her what to do. Collins was not told that Yarbough was her supervisor, but she was told that she would be working under Yarbough. Collins' first day was spent training with a first-shift boxer that stayed over. Thereafter, Yarbough showed her how to do the work. Yarbough told Collins if there was anything she did not understand, to tell Yarbough and she would help her all she can. Each day the boxers turn in a tally of completed boxes to Yarbough who in turn checked the tally against the department production. After checking, Yarbough knew on a daily basis each boxer's production and whether it was standard or not.

Collins recalled that when she began boxing 1000 tubes per shift, which was standard, Yarbough told her she was doing a good job. Yarbough also said she would talk to someone about Collins getting a raise. Later, Collins saw a note that Yarbough had written to Jobes relative to a pay raise for Collins. Collins did not say anything more to Yarbough about a raise.

Collins worked with Vernon Johnson who was the tube supplier. Johnson was slow and, on occasion, the boxers would run out of tubes. When Yarbough would tell Johnson to hurry up, he would cuss her and tell her to shut up because she was not his boss. One evening he and Yarbough got into an argument and Yarbough told him if he cannot do the job to go on home. Johnson responded to Yarbough that she did not hire him and cannot fire him and laughed. Yarbough told Johnson that she was going to tell Jobes of his conduct.

Another employee, Dooley, had a habit of wandering off. Yarbough told him he would have to stay in the department and do his job. Yarbough told Dooley that she was going to tell Hobbs because she was sick and tired of how some of the people were talking to her.

Collins had to leave the shift early twice because her grandbaby was sick. The first time she got word from home that her grandbaby had to be taken to the hospital, Collins told Yarbough of the sickness and asked to leave early. Yarbough said she would have to call Jobes at home and get his approval, but Collins could not wait and left anyway. The second time it happened, Collins did not see Yarbough so she told her coworkers to tell Yarbough that she left early because her grandbaby was sick again.

Collins, at one point, wanted to change shifts and work the first shift for awhile. She asked Yarbough if she could change, and Yarbough told her to see Jobes or Hobbs for permission.

Earnest Hobbs testified that he was hired as traffic and shipping warehouse manager on 22 February 1982. Hobbs met Yarbough 2 weeks later while she was working the first-shift boxing as helper to Dorothy Ray. Ray puts labels on boxes and places the boxes in the several work stations. Ray was called the boxing supervisor.

When the Company decided to set up a second-shift boxing department, Hobbs talked to Yarbough about taking the second-shift boxing position. Hobbs told Yarbough that she would be in charge of boxing and he would hold her responsible for what happened. Although Dorothy Ray on the first shift was doing the same job as Yarbough on the second shift, Ray was salaried and Yarbough was hourly. Hobbs stated that he submitted three requests for Yarbough to be put on salary with the first being made while Yarbough was Ray's helper on the first shift. The second and third requests were made after Yarbough was transferred to the second shift. Hobbs did not remember the dates, but he was sure that the third and final request for Yarbough's salary came just before the walkout by employees and was approved before the elections. Hobbs stated that he was motivated, in part, to request a salary for Yarbough due to her complaints that she was doing the same job as Ray but not making the same amount of money and he assumed she would welcome a change to salary. Hobbs called Yarbough to his office to inform her that a salary had been approved but Yarbough said she was not ready for it. Yarbough told Hobbs that she could not afford to miss a pay period by going to a 2-week period on salary. Hobbs explained to her that she would not miss a week of pay because she would get the 1-week's pay that was held back to fill the gap in the first 2-week period of salary. Yarbough said she would think about it. In the interim, Yarbough spoke to Harper in personnel about the salary plan. Later, Harper and Yarbough told Hobbs that she had decided to "try it," meaning the salary. After Yarbough went on salary, Hobbs explained the better insurance and better vacation benefits she would receive. He did not discuss the timeclock or the signing of timecards; Yarbough had previously begun signing employees' timecards. Hobbs did not detail any new responsibilities for Yarbough following her salary approval because he had always depended on her to get the work done and treated her as his supervisor on the second shift. Hobbs never told Yarbough that she was a "supervisor" or the "boss" of the second shift. He did tell her she was "in charge" of the second-shift boxing and was supposed to answer to Jobes. Yarbough was the only employee Hobbs ever recommended for a salary. Hobbs never used the term "crew leader" for Yarbough or Ray. Hobbs stated that Yarbough had recommended several employees for pay raises and employees knew if Yarbough did not recommend the raise they would not get it. Hobbs admitted that there was a standard of 1000 tubes for small tubes and 80 to 90 tubes for tractor tubes per shift, but he said Yarbough was not bound by the standards for pay raises, e.g., Hobbs said he would not know when an employee was boxing 1000 tubes until Yarbough told him. In addition, an employee boxing to standard had to also maintain a 90 to 95 percent accuracy to get a pay raise. All employees were subject to a three-step wage system, hire in, midrange, and final with the amount of wage for each step set by upper management. Hobbs was the only authority to decide when an employee's error factor was low enough to get a raise. There was an additional policy for boxing employees in training. If the employee was not up to midrange of the standards after 30 days of work, the employee probably would not work out.

Hobbs stated that Yarbough did not have to check with him before giving any employees an oral or a written warning for rule violations, and in fact she never did with the exceptions of employees Johnson and Norris. Regarding the Vernon Johnson incident, Hobbs said such warnings went through Jobes first and most of the time never got to him. Hobbs did not recall any writeups on Vernon Johnson, but did recall that he transferred him to the first shift rather than discharge him. Hobbs' decision to transfer rather than discharge was based on a personal remark Yarbough had made to Johnson during the verbal altercation.

Hobbs attended supervisory meetings composed of department heads and the plant manager. If anything arose in the meetings relative to boxing, he would later pass it on to Jobes who in turn passed it on to Ray and Yarbough. Jobes had in the past attended supervisory meetings, but when Hobbs was hired, Jobes no longer attended.

All employees are hired by the personnel department, but Hobbs interviews employees for boxing before hiring and assigns them to a classification after they are hired. Hobbs is the only person in shipping and boxing who can discharge employees without consultation.

Each shift in boxing is started by giving Ray and Yarbough an order sheet listing all tube sizes to be boxed during the shift. The tube supply person is also given an order sheet so he will know what tubes to supply. If the tubes needed in the department differ from the listing, Yarbough would tell him what sizes to bring first.

Yarbough could not handle complaints about working conditions but she could relate them to Jobes or Hobbs. If an employee complained to Yarbough about short pay she would tell Hobbs or Jobes. Either Hobbs or Jobes would pull the employee's timecard and check for overtime worked but not paid. Hobbs admittedly never told Yarbough that she could call off-shift employees to work when her crew was short, but he said she could have if she wanted to.

Delores Pinkston testified that she was an inspector on first shift from her hiring date in January 1981 until August 1982. She was relief inspector while Braddy was chief inspector. Pinkston stated that Braddy would discipline employees with writeups but never said she had any prior approval to do so. On occasion, usually precipitated by too many red tags, Braddy would conduct meetings of the inspectors and tell the employees they had to do a better job or get their act together. Boyd Taylor attended some of the meetings but not all. Braddy told the inspectors during the meeting that they could be fired if they could not do the job. Pinkston recalled that Braddy told one inspector at her work station that if she did not do better to lessen the number of red tags, she would be out the door. Pinkston and the other inspectors had been told to see Braddy if they had any complaints about work or pay. Braddy did handle a short check complaint for Pinkston saying she would handle it. Later, Pinkston got the shortage. Whenever the crew was short and no one could work overtime, Braddy would rearrange the work stations of the inspectors. Braddy never mentioned that Taylor told her to do so. There were also times that production schedules changed and other size tubes were also being produced. Those inspectors who worked better on the odd tube sizes would be rescheduled by Braddy to work the odd sizes. Pinkston stated that breaks were scheduled by Braddy, and the relief inspector followed the schedule set by Braddy. Braddy also made the decision when she would take her break, which usually was before the other inspectors. Pinkston was not aware that inspectors could change breaktimes among themselves without first checking with Braddy. Days when Braddy was behind in defects, Pinkston or another employee would help Braddy to reduce the number of tubes in the cage. Pinkston never saw Taylor help Braddy whenever she was behind. Pinkston also helped Braddy buff tubes but not on a daily basis.

One day near the end of the shift, Pinkston became visibly ill and told Braddy that she needed to go home. Braddy told Pinkston she could go home early without mention of approval by Taylor. Pinkston, while working as an inspector, only called in to report an absence one time and she spoke to Taylor. She did recall that the inspectors were told to call Braddy for absence reports. Overtime was usually handled by volunteers but when the overtime was mandatory, the inspectors would be assigned days that they were required to work overtime. Braddy would tell the inspectors what their overtime assignments were. Whenever employees worked overtime, Braddy later signed all timecards.

Pinkston is now employed as chief inspector on first shift. A typical production day now is less than what it was when Braddy was chief inspector. An average day of defects now is in the 200 range. Pinkston does her paperwork on company time, not her own time.

Although Pinkston could not specifically recall, she stated that Braddy assigned trainees to work stations and did recommend pay raises for new hires.

Pinkston came to Warrenton from Polson Rubber where she was a chief inspector. Polson supervisors had additional responsibilities that chief inspectors did not have but her foreman called her a supervisor.

As chief inspector for Warrenton on the third shift, Pinkston issued written warnings without consulting with her foreman, albeit, she did not issue any final warnings within the progressive discipline system of "three and you're out." Pinkston stated that Newsome had told her during her tenure as chief inspector she did not have to check with her foreman before issuing a written warning. Pinkston was never told she had authority to allow employees to leave early, but if the employee had an emergency, she did have authority to release them from the shift. Whenever the third shift was short Pinkston either called in someone from the first shift or told the chief inspector on the second shift to assign someone to work overtime. Pinkston said she had the authority to call in any number of people she needed to fill her crew. Although she did not have to check with her foreman before exercising any authority, she did, as a matter of courtesy, keep him informed of her actions. Pinkston also assigned employees to work overtime within the framework of set days for each employee to work overtime when needed.

Boyd Taylor testified that as general foreman, he had direct supervision over molding, seven employees; splicing, eight employees; head in, three employees; and valve spray, one employee. He had general supervision over mill, 7 employees and inspection with 13 employees. Taylor had the responsibility for making tubes on the first shift. On a good day inspection would handle 768 tubes with defects numbering about 150. On a bad day the defects number between 300 to 350. Braddy would spend 25 percent of her time working defects on a good day and 50 percent of her time on a bad day. The remainder of her workday is spent checking repaired and classified tubes. Although Polson Rubber had a buffer classification, at Warrenton the chief inspector does the buffing. Many tubes that have been rejected or repaired need to be buffed before passing them to the warehouse. Braddy had authority to assign someone to help her with defects whenever she needed to but has gone to Taylor to get approval for help. Braddy had authority to write up employees for red tags without consultation with Taylor. Taylor would see red tags with employees' names on them and ask Braddy if she had written the employee a warning. He had nothing more than that to do with writeups for red tags. Taylor did not tell Braddy not to write up employees who got red tags. Although Taylor stated that Braddy had authority to issue writeups for poor performance, he could only recall one instance where Braddy did so without first checking with him. In all cases, Braddy turns in the writeups to Taylor or Newsome by leaving them on their desks at the end of the shift. Braddy, on occasion, would hold meetings with inspection employees because too many defects were being thrown out. One such meeting she told Taylor, "I am taking my inspectors into a meeting, you're welcome to attend if you want to." Taylor attended but said nothing. Braddy explained to the inspectors exactly how she wanted the job done and how she expected them to do it. Braddy also had authority to give employees approval for tardiness or absenteeism. Taylor's only discussion with Braddy about tardiness or absence was his telling her, "that's her department."

Taylor stated that Braddy had the authority to fire employees after first checking with him. He could not recall whether Braddy ever exercised her discharge authority. Braddy could, on the spot, discharge an employee for fighting on the job, but Taylor could not recall whether he ever told Braddy she had such authority.

Taylor recalled that Braddy had two employees who gave her a hard time, and she asked if the employees could be transferred to another shift. Although Taylor did not recall what he told Braddy, he stated that she knew the employees had seniority and could not be moved off the first shift. Taylor stated that in an overtime situation, Braddy would seek volunteers first. If no one wanted to work, Taylor said he was sure he had instructed Braddy to appoint someone to work overtime. Taylor stated that Braddy had the authority to call employees in from other shifts to work overtime when she decided that overtime was needed. She could not order employees to work but she could ask. If any employee refused, she could report the refusal to Taylor and they would handle it. Taylor could not think of any specifics except three occasions when Braddy did not get volunteers for overtime and reported to Taylor. He told Braddy to have the employees draw straws. Braddy had no authority to hire employees and Taylor did not know if Braddy had any input into a new hire's initial classification or station assignment. Taylor did recall one employee that was hired and he told Braddy to station the employee as a rear tractor inspector for training. Taylor also stated that Braddy rarely came to him just before taking any action with employees.

Lewis Newsome testified he has been production manager since 5 January 1981. Salaried employees are paid on a straight 40-hour basis. Eighty percent of insurance premiums for salaried employees are paid by the Company. The hourly employees receive only 60 percent of their insurance premiums from the Company. Salaried employees get more vacation time than hourly employees with both based on years of service. All information of vacations, salary, and insurance for salaried personnel are kept in the "black book" by the personnel manager.

During the walkout in July, all salaried employees worked whereas 50 to 70 hourly employees were on strike. Only salaried employees are given performance appraisals. The appraisals are made annually.

Newsome stated that the personnel department has the only authority to hire or fire employees. Boyd Taylor does not have authority to fire employees, but he can recommend that employees be fired.

All classifications in manufacturing are duplicated on all three shifts excepting that the first shift does not have a splicing supervisor. It was decided in the beginning that with all the other supervision and experience present on the first shift, a splicer supervisor was not needed.

Analysis and Conclusions

The gravamen of this case is the supervisory status of two employees; Eloise Braddy, chief inspector on first shift, and Gloria Yarbough, crew leader of the boxing department on second shift. Both employees were discharged.

Respondent claims both employees are statutory supervisors, and therefore neither is protected by the antidiscriminatory provisions of the Act. The burden of proving supervisory status rests with Respondent.

The General Counsel alleged both discharges to be violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act because Braddy and Yarbough were discharged for engaging in union activities during the union campaign. Respondent admitted the discharges and that union activity was the reason for both.

A corollary issue of coercive interrogation involving both Braddy and Yarbough depends on resolution of the supervisory issue.

The statutory provisions and governing principles that determine an individual's supervisory status are well settled. Section 2(11) of the Act defines a supervisor as:

> The "term supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

In making determinations of supervisory status, the Board is careful not to construe supervisory status too broadly because any employee found to be a supervisor is denied protection of the Act. The statutory indicia of supervisory status is stated disjunctively and only one need exist to confer supervisory status on an individual. Possession alone of one of the statutory indicia, however, is not sufficient to establish supervisory status. The determination rests on the individual's functions and authority. Thus, an assigned title or job classification, standing alone, is insubstantial evidence of statutory authority. If an individual possesses the statutory authority and uses independent judgment in performing the supervisory functions in the interest of management, that individual is a statutory supervisor.

Respondent contends that Braddy has been a supervisor since the plant opened and that Yarbough was made a supervisor when she was put on salary several months before her discharge. Respondent argues alternatively that Yarbough was a supervisor on assuming leadership of the second-shift boxing crew, but does not contend that Yarbough's later change to salary with its attendant increase in benefits was a supervisory promotion.

The record evidence discloses several facts common to a determination of supervisory status of both Braddy and Yarbough.

Production Superintendent Newsome credibly testified that only the personnel department has the authority to hire and fire employees. Hobbs, shipping manager, credibly testified that only himself and other department heads attended the regularly scheduled supervisory meetings, and Taylor credibly testified that Braddy did not attend supervisors' meetings. Both Hobbs and Taylor further testified that neither Yarbough nor Braddy was ever told they were supervisors or what authority, if any, they were to exercise. Hobbs and Taylor expected Yarbough and Braddy to do what they were trained to do and thus help keep production flowing smoothly. New hires, according to Hobbs, were assigned their job classification by himself. Taylor, when newly hired employees reported for work, would tell Braddy where to place them on the inspection lines. Hobbs stated that Yarbough did not have to check with him before disciplining employees but added that Yarbough had to clear everything through Shipping Supervisor Jobes. Jobes testified that he never told Yarbough that she had the authority to discipline employees on her own. Jobes did tell her she was to check with him first and discuss it. Jobes cited three examples of discipline for boxing employees. Two occurred in May and one in June. Vernon Johnson had been instructed by Jobes to perform a certain task. Later, Jobes asked Yarbough if the task was completed and Yarbough reported that Johnson had not started the task. Jobes instructed Yarbough to write up Johnson. Yarbough did so, signed the writeup, and turned it in to Jobes. On another occasion during the second shift, after Jobes had left for home, Willie Norris came to work late and under the influence of alcohol. Yarbough called Jobes at home to report the incident and Jobes returned to the plant and disciplined Norris. Vernon Johnson, in June, refused to follow the instructions of Yarbough, and she reported to Jobes recommending that Johnson be discharged. Jobes and Hobbs considered the incident and transferred Johnson to the first shift due to his disruptive behavior on the second shift.

Taylor testified that Braddy had the authority to initiate writeups on employees but could only recall one instance in which she did so. In all other instances, she sought Taylor's approval first. Hobbs stated that Yarbough could not handle any employee complaints. She could only relate the complaint to himself or Jobes. Jobes testified that Yarbough could not remedy employee complaints, but she could initiate a "clean up" if water or some other liquid was on the work floor. Taylor simply testified that Braddy handled her department, and he left the department to her without specifying employee grievances as such. Testimony of inspector witnesses shows clearly, however, that Braddy just passed on to Taylor any complaint made by employees. Of the 40 exhibits offered to show Braddy's exercise of supervisory authority from 1981 through 1984: 26 are nothing more than writing up the employee subsequent to the receipt of a red tag originating from the quality control department and without any input from Braddy; 6 are writeups dictated by the absence and tardiness policy including the uniform rule that all employees must bring a doctor's excuse when returning to work; 3 are writeups resulting from an employee's refusal to work previously scheduled overtime dictated by the established overtime selection procedure; 3 are writeups issued to employees failing to perform at the acceptable level dictated by the predetermined standard of production; and 2 were issued for refusing to follow instructions, namely, employee Lewis, who was first disciplined in the office by Taylor for failing to sort tubes, and employee Christine Johnson who was jointly disciplined by Taylor and Braddy for failing to perform an assigned task without backtalk or remarks. Of the 10 exhibits offered to show Yarbough's exercise of supervisory authority from 1982 through 1984 (with all exhibits dated 1984): 5 were issued by Yarbough at Jobes' direction to write up all employees for overstaying break when there was work to do; 1 was issued by Yarbough per Jobes' instruction when a box was shipped with less tubes packed than the order called for; 1 was issued by Yarbough after Jobes instructed an employee to perform a task and he failed to do so. Jobes checked with Yarbough and found that the employee had so failed and instructed Yarbough to write up the employee; one was issued by Yarbough to an employee who had called in with car trouble. Jobes told the employee to come in tardy but the employee failed to report for work. Yarbough wrote up the employee for the absence, one was issued by Yarbough to an employee who refused to perform the daily cleanup of the work station as required, and one was issued by Jobes to an employee reporting for work under the influence of alcohol. Yarbough called Jobes at home to report the employee and Jobes returned to the plant and sent the employee home. The following morning, Jobes wrote up the employee and signed Yarbough's name to the form.

Thus, it is clear that neither Yarbough nor Braddy had authority to hire, discharge, assign, or discipline employees or to adjust grievances of employees. It is equally clear that neither could effectively recommend such action as contemplated by the statute.

There is no evidence in the record relating to the authority of any individual to suspend, lay off, recall, or promote employees. There is a limited reference in the record to a company policy that no employee is required to remain at work if a family emergency exists, or the employee becomes ill. Several witnesses testified to practices under the policy. Ophelia Grier testified that whenever she wanted to leave work early, she made the request to Braddy. Braddy would tell Taylor of Grier's request and Braddy would later relay Taylor's answer to Grier. Grier stated that Braddy did not grant permission to leave work. Lula West testified that while Braddy was chief inspector, she would notify Braddy if she wanted to leave work early. Braddy in turn would ask Taylor if West could leave early and later Braddy would pass on Taylor's decision to West. Wyvonie Collins testified that during her employment as a boxer on the second shift with Yarbough, she had several family illnesses. The first instance involved her grandbaby being taken to the hospital. Collins received word at work of the sickness and asked Yarbough if she could leave work. Yarbough told Collins that Jobes had to be notified at home before anyone could leave work. Before Yarbough could talk to Jobes, Collins left work to care for her grandbaby. A second sickness occurred, and when Collins was notified at work, she did not see Yarbough so she told her coworkers to notify Yarbough that her grandbaby was sick again. Both Braddy and Yarbough testified that they did not have authority to release employees to leave work early except in cases of an emergency. When emergencies existed and employees left work, both Braddy and Yarbough simply notified their foreman and continued the shift with a short crew. Taylor and Jobes credibly testified that neither Braddy nor Yarbough had authority to replace absent employees no matter the reason for the absence, and Jobe stated that only he or Hobbs had authority to release employees to go home early. Pinkston's testimony to the contrary, I do not credit with probative value of Braddy's work functions. Pinkston's testimony involved her duties as chief inspector on a different shift and, as she noted, she functions differently than Braddy for whatever reason. I do credit the testimony of employees Grier, West, Collins, Braddy, and Yarbough. The credible record evidence shows that the practice of releasing employees does not involve any supervisory function of Braddy or Yarbough nor does the practice entail the use of independent judgment by Braddy or Yarbough. In addition, Braddy credibly testified without contradiction to an episode involving an inspector during the working shift. The inspector in the course of a conversation with Braddy became angry and called Braddy a "bitch." Sometime later, Braddy mentioned the incident to Taylor. Taylor told Braddy that she should have reported the incident to him when it happened and he would have sent the employee home. Taylor's belated resolution of the incident is instructive of the status Braddy enjoyed vis-a-vis the employees. I conclude and find that neither Braddy nor Yarbough possessed authority to suspend, lay off, recall, or promote employees or that either exercised such authority.

The record shows that overtime, when ordered by Taylor, Hobbs, or Jobes, was fulfilled first by volunteers and second by drawing straws. If the overtime crew needs were small and the employees did not volunteer or draw straws, a selective procedure was followed. In inspection, each employee was previously assigned a weekday. Whenever overtime occurred (without volunteers or drawing of straws), the employees named for that weekday were required to work. When there were no volunteers for overtime in boxing, Jobes selected which employees were required to work the scheduled overtime. Failure of an employee to work scheduled overtime under the weekday selection process or by direction of Jobes was automatically disciplined by writeup under the progressive discipline policy. The testimony of Hobbs that Yarbough could have called off-shift employees and ordered them to report for work I do not credit due to the highly speculative nature of the testimony and Hobbs' admission that Yarbough was never told she had or could exercise such authority. Likewise, Taylor's testimony that Braddy had authority to call in employees from other shifts to perform overtime work I do not credit due to the failure of Taylor to inform Braddy that she had such authority or could exercise such authority. Further, neither Braddy nor Yarbough ever called in off-shift employees to work for overtime or fill in purposes. Both Braddy and Yarbough worked shorthanded whenever their crew sizes were reduced by absence, illness, or lack of sufficient employees to work overtime.

All employees have seniority based on their date of hire and their seniority gives them shift preferences. Neither Braddy nor Yarbough possesses any authority to transfer employees off their respective shifts for any reason. As Taylor testified, Braddy knew that she could not effect the transfer of a recalcitrant employee so she had to learn to put up with the inconvenience of the employee. Employee Collins credibly testified that she asked Yarbough for a transfer to the first shift and Yarbough told her she would have to see Hobbs or Jobes for permission to transfer. In addition to the lack of authority to transfer employees, the record is silent on the exercise of any such authority by either Braddy or Yarbough.

Respondent offered evidence of the authority of both Braddy and Yarbough to reward employees by recommending wage increases. The evidence was employee status change forms signed by Braddy and Yarbough for several employees. There is no dispute that the status change forms were executed by Braddy and Yarbough and turned in to their foreman or the personnel office. The mere execution of the form, however, does not establish the authority to grant wage increases or the authority to effectively recommend a wage increase. The additional record evidence shows clearly that all hourly employees are paid according to a wage policy composed of four increments from hire-in rate to maximum rate for each classification of employee. Each increment is effective for an established period of time. The passage of that time and an acceptable level of performance qualifies the employee for the stated wage increase. The work performance of inspectors and boxers is measured against a standard set by upper management. Inspectors must inspect 7 tubes in 7 minutes (of the size mostly produced) and boxers must box 1000 tubes per 8-hour shift to be performing at an acceptable level. Both Braddy and Yarbough maintain daily records of each employee's performance, which are turned in at the end of each shift. Simple arithmetic determines whether an employee is at standard or below. Braddy credibly testified, and without contradiction, that the office sent the employee status change forms to the department for each employee at the appropriate time. Braddy simply verified the employees' performance and the next wage increment within the established wage policy. Braddy did not determine any employees' eligibility for a wage increase nor the amount of any such increase. Both eligibility and amount are predetermined by the established wage policy. Yarbough credibly testified that whenever employees were ready for a wage increase within the predetermined wage policy, Jobes told her to fill out a wage form for the employee and give it to him. Jobes credibly testified that only he or Hobbs decided the wage increases of employees and did not testify that Yarbough had authority to recommend pay raises. Although Hobbs testified that Yarbough had recommended several employees for wage increases and that employees knew that Yarbough had to recommend them for wage increases only one such instance was evidenced in the record. The record evidence as a whole is contra to Hobbs' statement of Yarbough's authority to recommend wage increases. Yarbough was never informed that she had authority to recommend pay increases for boxing employees nor were the boxing employees told that Yarbough had such authority. Yarbough credibly testified that she told Jobes that Collins, a trainee, was boxing up to standard before her training period was completed and should be getting more than the training rate. Jobes told Yarbough to write a note to him and Hobbs and turn it in to him. Jobes and Hobbs decided whether Collins would get her wage increase increment early. As Hobbs stated in his testimony, whether a boxer is performing up to standard is not controlling. The controlling factor is the accuracy of that performance and he alone determines whether the employee is accurate enough to get a raise in pay. It is clear that neither Braddy nor Yarbough had authority to grant wage increases or to effectively recommend wage increases for employees. It is equally clear that neither exercised such authority. The mere filling out of a status form within the framework of the personnel procedures falls short of the independent judgment required by the statute. It is nothing more than a clerical function, which is later acted on independently by Hobbs, Jobes, or the personnel department and within the established wage levels policy.

Respondent's policies on absence and tardiness are applied uniformly throughout the plant. Individual employee reports of absence or tardiness are made to General Foreman Taylor, Production Superintendent Newsome, Shipping Manager Hobbs, Shipping Supervisor Jobes, or the personnel department as directed by the policy. The recordkeeping for Respondent is accomplished by the employee attendance information form. Both Braddy and Yarbough credibly testified, and without contradiction, that they filled out the forms at the direction of Taylor and Jobes. As the forms indicate, they record the information relative to an employee's attendance. Taylor's testimony that Braddy had authority to approve absences or tardiness is contrary to the testimony of other witnesses as well as his additional testimony. Taylor takes the calls from employees reporting an absence or tardiness and at that time tells the employee what to do. Taylor then notifies Braddy of the circumstances and directs her to complete the employee attendance information form. Braddy acts as nothing more than a clerk for Taylor. Any employee absent due to illness must conform to the Company's policy of bringing a doctor's release when returning to work. With the release, the employee's absence is excused; without the release the absence is unexcused. In such a case, Braddy, when filling out the form, is merely following an established policy and performing a ministerial act. In addition, the recording by Braddy is neither approval nor rejection because the record form is subsequently acted on by management and the personnel department. Yarbough, likewise, did not receive employee reports of absences or tardiness. Jobes or Hobbs took the calls during the first shift. Most days Yarbough learned of an absence or tardiness when she had a vacancy at a work station. Nonetheless, the recordkeeping chore fell to Yarbough. She recorded the information about the employee, which she received from Jobes. As Jobes stated many times when Yarbough reported an employee-related circumstance to him, "You know the procedure, fill out a form and turn it in." A more clerical function could not be devised. Yarbough was trained to fill out the forms and turn them in to Jobes. Jobes took for granted that Yarbough was trained and knew her position and never told Yarbough she was a supervisor or that she had any supervisory authority. The objective evidence offered by Respondent to reflect exercise of supervisory authority by Yarbough is not probative of the issue. A September warning by Yarbough for an employee's refusal to follow instructions was predicated on a daily chore of cleanup. When Yarbough reported to Jobes that the employee refused to do the cleanup, he directed Yarbough to write up the employee. An 8 May 1984 warning for absenteeism was executed by Yarbough several months before she was placed on salary and purportedly became a supervisor. A 15 May 1984 warning for reporting under the influence of alcohol occurred not only several months before Yarbough became salaried, but resulted from Yarbough's telephonic report to Jobes at home and his return to the plant to handle the situation. The following day Jobes executed the warning but signed Yarbough's name merely to record the fact that the incident occurred on Yarbough's shift. An 18 May 1984 warning for refusal to follow instructions (again several months before the date of supervisory authority for Yarbough) was issued by Yarbough but at Jobes' direction. The instructions to the employee had been given by Jobes, and Yarbough reported the failure to act when asked by Jobes and Jobes told her to write up the employee. Six additional employee attendance information forms and six employee warning forms offered to show Yarbough's exercise of supervisory functions were dated prior to Yarbough's supposed date of attaining supervisory status and therefore are not probative of the issue. They are, however, instructive to show that Respondent's claim of supervisory exercise by Yarbough comprises duties she exercised long before being salaried and claimed to be a supervisor. Thus, it is abundantly clear that Braddy and Yarbough have no authority to determine absences, tardiness, or work performances of employees but rather perform clerical or ministerial duties as instructed by their supervisors and within the specifications, set by the plant policies. Such duties do not require the use of independent judgment nor carry the force of an effective recommendation for employee conduct.

It is undisputed that timecards were initialed by Braddy and Yarbough whenever employees worked overtime and that employees would not be paid for the overtime if the initials were omitted. It is equally undisputed that both Braddy and Yarbough were instructed to initial the cards to confirm the overtime hours authorized by Taylor or Hobbs. Such a confirmation carries no weight of authority for the instance of overtime worked but simply records that previously authorized by someone else. The recordation is purely clerical and does not show the exercise of a supervisory function. Likewise, the execution of accident reports and workmen's compensation forms is more a clerical function than the exercise of a supervisory function. Both Braddy and Yarbough simply reduced to writing what the affected employee explained about the injury and whether the employee wanted to see a doctor. The forms were then turned over to Taylor or Jobes. Neither Braddy nor Yarbough had authority to release employees from work and neither assumed the exercise of such authority. Release of injured employees and transportation of injured employees was effected by Taylor or Jobes.

The pay differential between alleged supervisor and rank-and-file employees may be a consideration depending upon the dollar amount involved. In this case, the differential is insignificant due to the dollar amount. The significance of the differential is further diminished when contrasted with the pay differential existing between the alleged supervisors and their immediate foremen or managers. In addition, Braddy and Yarbough are in a nonexempt pay status as are the rank-and-file employees, whereas foremen and managers are in an exempt pay status. Respondent's contention that the salary classification is indicia of supervision is without merit since the entire quality control department is on salary rather than hourly wage. Generally, a salary pay status in opposition to an hourly pay status does not necessarily evidence a separation of supervision from rank and file. Moreover, the record evidence as a whole conclusively establishes that management seized on the salary classification merely to separate the unit employees from the nonunit employees. One can conclude from Respondent's lengthy refusal to delegate supervisory authority to Braddy and Yarbough that any recognition of their supervisory status was precipitated by the union organizational drive and nothing more. The multiple instances in this record when Respondent could have affirmatively enforced a supervisory status for both individuals, from their dates of hire to their dates of discharge, but did nothing, serves to buttress my conclusion that neither Braddy nor Yarbough functioned as, nor was meant to function as, a supervisor as defined in the Act. Newsome's evaluation of the lack of need for minor supervision on the first shift and Jobes' willingness to allow shipping employees on the second shift to work under the guidance of a senior rank-and-file employee applies equally well to the situations involving Braddy and Yarbough and further support my conclusion of nonsupervisory status for Braddy and Yarbough.[3]

[3] Frequently, the Board will consider the ratio of admitted supervisors to rank-and-file employees when the supervisory status of an individual is in question. This case, however, presents no such opportunity because the pleadings are silent on Respondent's supervisory hierarchy and no stipulations were offered by counsel to fill the void. The organizational chart offered in evidence by Respondent was admittedly drawn for use during trial and does not purport to be an administrative decree or departmental schematic.

The single theme that continuously emerges from the evidence in this record is that no one in management told Braddy and Yarbough that they were supervisors or that they had any supervisory authority. Albeit, Yarbough was later placed on salary, Hobbs' testimony clearly shows that his recommendation for her salary had nothing to do with her work functions. Further, Jobes' conclusion that Yarbough became a supervisor when she changed to salary is founded on a mere statement by his superior that Ray, when salaried on the first shift, was thereafter treated as a supervisor; a treatment unattended by the granting of any authority. The many attempts to show an exercise of supervisory function tend to show that Braddy and Yarbough were overloaded with paperwork and recordkeeping in addition to their undisputed manual tasks. Assuming arguendo, the evidenced exercise was both isolated and sporadic. The several instances of employees' recalcitrant conduct toward both Braddy and Yarbough also supports the conclusion that neither functioned as a supervisor within the definition contained in the statute. Accordingly, I conclude and find that Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough are not supervisors as defined in the Act and therefore are guaranteed the rights of employees enumerated in Section 7 of the Act. The discharges, as alleged in the complaint, are violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and I so find.

The coercive interrogation of Braddy and Yarbough amended into complaint paragraph 9, though denied by Respondent on the record, was not denied in the record testimony. Both Braddy and Yarbough credibly testified to interrogation about their union activity occurring in the months of August and September 1984. I conclude and find that the several instances of interrogation are coercive and therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I shall order that all violations be remedied.

ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, by interrogating employees Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough about their union activity during the organizational campaign of the Union, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Respondent, by discharging employees Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough because they engaged in union activity, has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[4]

Respondent, having discriminatorily discharged employees Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough, it must offer them full reinstatement to their former positions, or, if those positions no longer exist, to a substantially equivalent position, with backpay computed on a quarterly basis and interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and New Horizons for the Retarded,[5] from the date of discharge to the date of a proper offer of reinstatement.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, E. H. Mann, Inc., d/b/a Warrenton Rubber, Warrenton, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating employees about their union activity.

(b) Discharging employees for engaging in union activity.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough immediate and full reinstatement to the jobs from which they were discharged on 28 September, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges enjoyed, and make them whole for any earnings they lost, plus interest, as outlined in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its offices in Warrenton, Georgia, copies of the attached noticed marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the [4] The General Counsel in brief moved for a remedial Order containing a "visitatorial" provision authorizing "discovery," if necessary, to monitor compliance with the Board's Order. The need for such an order is not demonstrated. I therefore deny the General Counsel's motion.

[5] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[6] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes. The General Counsel's formal papers, in evidence as G.C. Exhs. 1(a)-1(l), although indexing the original of Respondent's answer to the complaint, does not contain the answer.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees about their union activities on behalf of General Teamsters, Local Union No. 528 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees for engaging in union activities on behalf of Teamsters Local Union No. 528 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough immediate and full reinstatement to the jobs from which they were discharged on 28 Sept. 1984, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify Eloise Braddy and Gloria Yarbough that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharges and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 9, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Philip P. McLeod issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, DMR Corp., Dallas, Texas, and Harrill Electrical Contractors, Inc., Mesquite, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We agree with the judge that the Fifth Circuit specifically rejected the Respondent's affirmative defense. NLRB v. DMR Corp., 795 F.2d 472, 477–478 (5th Cir. 1986). The Respondent's reliance on the Fifth Circuit's fn. 6 is misplaced. In leaving to compliance the issue of whether DMR employees suffered any harm by the Respondent's refusal to apply the Unions' contracts, the court was merely restating the general rule that issues relevant to determining the amount of backpay are left to the compliance stage of the proceeding. This standard compliance language does not open the door for the Respondent to relitigate issues already resolved against it.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PHILIP P. MCLEOD, Administrative Law Judge. On 30 September 1981, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order[1] finding, inter alia, that DMR Corp. and Harrill Electrical Contractors, Inc. are a single employer within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act); that DMR was created in order to avoid dealing with the bargaining representatives of Harrill's employees; and that employees of the two entities constitute a single employerwide bargaining unit. To remedy this unfair labor practice, the Board directed Respondent to make whole individuals who suffered because of the failure to honor the collective-bargaining agreements with the Union. This decision was affirmed in part and remanded in part by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in 699 F.2d 788 (5th Cir. 1983). Following this remand, on 13 February 1985, the Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Order again finding that employees of DMR Corp. and Harrill Electrical Contractors, Inc. constitute a single employerwide bargaining unit and ordering that employees be made whole as provided for in its earlier decision. The Board's decision on remand was affirmed and enforced by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in 795 F.2d 472 (5th Cir. 1986) (DMR II). The parties being unable to agree on the amount of backpay due under the terms of the Board's Supplemental Decision and Order, the Regional Director for Region 16 issued a backpay specification dated 16 June 1987. Respondent filed an answer admitting certain allegations and denying others.

A hearing was held before me on 20 August 1987 in Fort Worth, Texas. All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. At the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel amended the backpay specification in various particulars, which are discussed in greater detail below. Following the close of the trial, all parties filed timely briefs with me which have been duly considered.[2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

Through the backpay specification, Respondent's answer, and stipulations entered into by the parties at the hearing herein, it has been established (1) that gross backpay computations were computed by multiplying the number of hours worked by each employee with the applicable rate of pay based on the appropriate collective-bargaining agreement; (2) that net backpay computations were derived by subtracting interim earnings (which were the actual amounts paid each discriminatee by calendar quarter, as taken from employer payroll records) from the gross backpay computations; and (3) that the fringe benefits due (including health and welfare, annuity plan/pension, National Electrical Benefit Plan, apprenticeship and training, and national electrical industry fund) were as stated in the backpay specification as amended and were based on applicable rates in the appropriate collective-bargaining agreement. Two individuals, Bill Lance and Donald Ray Smith, were stipulated to be supervisors within the meaning of the Act and by agreement were, therefore, removed from the backpay specification because of their supervisory status. Respondent's challenge to the inclusion of other named individuals was withdrawn.[3] The only issue which remains for consideration is Respondent's affirmative defense.

Respondent's answer to the backpay specification sets forth an affirmative defense, which is elaborated on and explained in greater detail in its amended answer dated 14 July 1987. The amended answer states:

> Respondent denies that any backpay is due the individuals listed in the Specification. The Specification attempts to apply the collective-bargaining agreements negotiated between Local 59 and Local 116 and Harrill Electrical Contractors to projects constructed by employees of DMR Corporation. In bidding on those projects, DMR utilized a wage computation significantly less than that called for by the collective-bargaining agreement. Moreover, each job specification had a published wage rates [sic] for electricians which was significantly less than the collective-bargaining agreement's rates. This published rate was utilized by DMR as well as unsuccessful bidders to compute projected labor costs. Had DMR used the labor rates set forth in the collective-bargaining agreements, DMR's bid would have vastly exceeded the bid of other unsuccessful electrical contractors. DMR would not have obtained these projects if it had submitted a bid based on those wage rates agreed to by Harrill Electrical. Accordingly, a retroactive application of the collective bargaining wage rates to these projects worked by DMR would grant employees rights and awards they would not have been entitled to in the absence of any violation. Therefore, the imposition of the backpay called for in the Specification would be punitive to Respondent and is therefore unenforceable.

My reading of the Board's decisions in this case and even more so the decisions of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit leads me to the conclusion that Respondent's position before me was specifically considered and rejected by the court, and that Respondent is precluded from raising that position again before me. Nevertheless, Respondent was given the opportunity to fully explain its position and to place into the record all of its available evidence on this point so that Respondent's position may be considered in full on appeal. Respondent was also given the opportunity to file a posthearing brief, which Respondent did.[4]

In the decision of the Fifth Circuit enforcing in part and remanding in part the Board's initial decision in this case, the circuit court stated that its remand was for "a new hearing" on the appropriate unit question. After further hearing was held to receive evidence on this issue, the administrative law judge issued a supplemental decision which was affirmed by the Board. The Board's decision, in turn, was wholly enforced by the Fifth Circuit in DMR II.

In its posthearing brief, Respondent argues:

> At the hearing on the (unit) issue, Respondent took the unfortunate position that, notwithstanding the instruction from the Fifth Circuit, the Board was precluded from having a second evidentiary hearing. Based on this assertion that the hearing could not be lawfully held, Respondent refused to participate.
> In hindsight, it seems clear that the sharp difference between the public contract work done by some DMR employees with the other commercial electrical labor performed by both DMR and Harrill employees is evidence which should have been presented by Respondent at the (unit) hearing. . . . Respondent's failure to present . . . available evidence resulted in the Board's finding that DMR and Harrill constituted a single bargaining unit. [T]his determination . . . specified that individuals who suffered harm be "made whole." It did not mandate automatic application of Harrill's "inside wireman" agreement to all of DMR employees where Respondent could demonstrate that such an award would constitute a windfall to those employees.

In DMR II, the Fifth Circuit specifically considered the Board's remedy. The circuit noted that "to remedy Respondent's violations of the NLRA, the Board ordered Harrill and DMR to . . . make their employees whole for any losses suffered by reason of their failure to honor the collective-bargaining agreements with the Unions." The circuit then stated:

> Respondents claim that the Board erred in ordering make-whole relief. This claim is wholly without merit.
> . . . .
> The Board may properly prevent the Respondent from gaining an advantage by their unlawful conduct. An order requiring that the employees be made whole for the unlawful repudiation of a collective-bargaining agreement serves this end. [Citations omitted.]
> . . . .
> Similarly, mere prospective application of the contracts would permit the company to reap an unjust advantage from its unlawful conduct and would not adequately redress the employees' losses. The Board's order, "which deprives an employer of advantages accruing from a particular method of subverting the Act, is a permissible method of effectuating the statutory policy." [Citation omitted.]

Reduced to its simpliest form, Respondent's argument before me is that if Respondent had not committed the unfair labor practices it did, it would not have received the bids its did, and therefore employees would not have had the work they did. Respondent argues that as a result, to apply the terms of the appropriate collective-bargaining agreement to that work is an unjust "windfall" to employees. This is the very argument that was specifically rejected by the Fifth Circuit in affirming the Board's remedy.

[3] Respondent had contended that Riley F. Barber, Dennis Allen Crenshaw, David Wayne Davis, Lawrence Robert Pinzel, John Caleb Ryan III, and Rusty Leroy Sargent were laborers/helpers and not covered by the collective-bargaining agreements between Harril and the Unions. Respondent had also alleged that David L. Keller, Todd A. Liverman, Donald Kay Shankles, and Charles L. McFerrin were supervisors within the meaning of the Act and therefore not covered by the agreements. At the hearing, however, Respondent withdrew these contentions.

At one point during the hearing before me, it appeared that Respondent was not challenging the appropriateness of the relief ordered but rather which collective-bargaining agreement applied to the work that had been performed by employees and was the subject of the make-whole remedy. I noted that this could well be an appropriate issue to raise in a backpay proceeding. Respondent's counsel, however, assured me and counsel for the General Counsel that Respondent was not contending the wrong collective-bargaining agreement had been applied in computing backpay within the specification. Rather, as stated in its affirmative defense, Respondent was challenging the appropriateness of the backpay award itself.

As Respondent's case was developed before me, it appeared Respondents were essentially attempting to establish that Harrill Electric and DMR were operating in two, and perhaps more than two, different economic climates. I noted to Respondent that the Fifth Circuit specifically discussed Peter Kiewit Sons' Co., 231 NLRB 76 (1977), enf. granted 595 F.2d 844 (D.C. Cir. 1979), involving double-breasted operations where the issue of multiple economic climates is a crucial inquiry. The court specifically adopted the Board's finding that this case is not a double-breasted-operation case where the respondent was dealing in two different economic climates. Respondent responded by stating, "It's evidence which would have been very appropriate to have presented to the Board on the remand of the appropriateness of the single bargaining unit and it was not. But I also believe, of course, the Respondent's position that the evidence is also relevant to the appropriate make-whole remedy and that's the purpose of the introduction." Despite Respondent's assurance that it was not attempting to relitigate an issue that had already been decided against it, in its posthearing brief filed with me, Respondent argues, "This finding of liability should not now preclude Respondent from maintaining in the damage phase of this proceeding that even if it was liable, its actions did not harm those DMR employees who worked in a vastly different economic climate." It is clear to me that Respondent is indeed attempting to relitigate that which has already been decided against it, and I find that Respondent is not free to relitigate those issues at the compliance stage of this proceeding. Accordingly, I reject Respondent's affirmative defense, and I find that backpay is due the discriminatees in the amount claimed by the General Counsel as amended at the hearing.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The gross backpay formula used by counsel for the General Counsel is reasonable and appropriate.

2. The net backpay amounts set forth by counsel for the General Counsel in the backpay specification, as amended at the hearing, are accurate and correct.

3. The affirmative defense of Respondent DMR Corp. and Harrill Electrical Contractors, Inc. has been specifically considered and rejected by the Fifth Circuit in enforcing the Board's Order in this case, is without merit, and may not be appropriately raised again at this stage in the proceeding.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, DMR Corp., Dallas, Texas, and Harrill Electrical Contractors, Inc., Mesquite, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall satisfy its obligation to make whole employees by paying them the net backpay amounts set forth in the backpay specification, as amended at the hearing, plus interest thereon accrued to the date of payment computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987),[6] minus any tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws, plus amounts due on behalf of such employees for fringe benefits as set forth in the backpay specification, as amended at the hearing, plus interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On March 8, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Harold B. Lawrence issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.[2]

The judge found that in negotiations for a contract with the Union, the Respondent failed to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by engaging in delay and formulating and adhering to proposals designed to stall negotiations, avoid reaching agreements, and undermine the Union as bargaining representative. We reverse, finding that on the facts of this case the Union did not test the Respondent's willingness to bargain and that the Respondent's conduct cannot therefore be found unlawful.[3]

The operative facts follow. On June 22, 1981,[4] the Respondent agreed to recognize Local 6 (the Union) as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees previously represented in two separate units by two locals that at some point had merged into Local 6. The Union waited 6 weeks before contacting the Respondent about a date to meet and bargain. The parties met, as agreed, on August 18. The Union presented its standard form contract, the provisions of which were previously included in the contracts between the Respondent and the now merged locals. The Union also presented economic demands. The Respondent indicated that the Union's demands were too high and that the Respondent would review the proposed contract and get back with the Union.

The Respondent's negotiators, President Biagio Musso and his counsel, Pinto, met some time thereafter and worked on counterproposals. In late August or early September, Union Negotiator Darwin Lanyi called Pinto to arrange a second meeting. Pinto indicated the earliest date available for himself and Musso was late October. Lanyi sought an earlier meeting but agreed to the October date proposed by Pinto.

The October 22 meeting lasted 3 hours. Pinto opened by stating that the Union's proposals were far too expensive. He reviewed each provision of the Union's standard form contract and proposed substantial deletions or revisions. Action on the Union's proposed "Present Practice" clause was deferred pending resubmission of a list from the Union enumerating the practices, privileges, and benefits the clause would obligate the Respondent to maintain.[5] Concerning economic matters, Pinto said the Respondent's terms "would be a step backwards," that there would be no increase in pension or insurance contributions, and that, if anything, there would be a 25-percent reduction in wages. Pinto said the Respondent was not prepared to give specific counterproposals to the Union's economic demands. The meeting closed with the parties agreeing to meet again in November.

The November 17 meeting was held as scheduled. Lanyi indicated that the Respondent's suggested changes to the Union's standard form contract were, in the majority, out of line and unacceptable. The Union came without the list of "Present Practices" the Respondent had requested. The Respondent did not have the specific economic counterproposal sought by the Union. In fact, neither side made concrete proposals and no progress was made.

The fourth bargaining session, scheduled and held December 22, lasted about 2 hours. The Union again indicated that the Respondent's requested text changes to its standard form contract were unacceptable. Lanyi admitted that there was some give and take on these provisions. According to Lanyi, the Respondent made a "big thing" of wanting the Union to provide the list of "Present Practices." Lanyi said the employees would know

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We deny as untimely the General Counsel's request for backpay to remedy a unilateral reduction in wages made by the Company following the parties' final bargaining session. No violation based on this conduct was alleged in the complaint, and the General Counsel sought relief with respect thereto for the first time in exceptions to the judge's decision. The Company was therefore never given an opportunity to litigate this issue.

[5] Although not discussed by the judge, this fact is reflected by Pinto's notes of the October 22 meeting, which Lanyi testified accurately reflect the changes proposed by the Respondent.

this information better than he would and he did not have such a list. The Union adhered to its proposed wage increases and renewed its request for economic counterproposals. The Respondent said it was losing money, that it could not come up with the increases, and asked for a 50-percent wage cut for all employees.[6]

Either at or after the December 22 meeting, the parties agreed to get together after the holidays. No meetings occurred during the month of January, however, due to Musso's illness. Thereafter, neither party attempted to contact the other.[7]

We do not agree with the judge that these facts show the Respondent breached the obligation it shared with the Union under Section 8(d) of the Act to "meet at reasonable times and confer with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." The judge found that the Respondent exhibited "inordinate delay" in coming to the bargaining table by virtue of its request that the second bargaining session be held 1-1/2 months after the date of the Union's call to arrange such a meeting. The Respondent told the Union its proposed date was the earliest available for its only two negotiators. The Union, which itself had waited an equivalent period after the Respondent agreed to bargain before attempting to arrange the parties' first meeting, did not contest the explanation offered and, in fact, acceded to the meeting schedule the Respondent proposed. Although we do not encourage such prolonged delay between negotiating sessions, particularly one so meagerly explained, we do not find this single unchallenged request to schedule a meeting on the first date all negotiators were available supports the judge's finding of inordinate delay by the Respondent.

Also lacking evidentiary support is the judge's finding that the Respondent engaged in delay at and after the second meeting. Like the first two meetings, the third and fourth proceeded without delay or rescheduling by either side. At the second meeting the Respondent made counterproposals to the Union's standard form contract. The third meeting was devoid of proposals by either side. By the close of the fourth meeting the Respondent had yielded on some of its proposed changes to the Union's standard form contract and had made a specific wage proposal as the Union had requested. For its part, the Union had yielded on some of the Respondent's proposed changes. The Union had not, however, compiled the list of "Present Practices" important to, and repeatedly sought by, the Respondent. Following the fourth meeting and Musso's January illness, neither party contacted the other to pursue negotiations further. On these facts, no charge of unlawful delay can legitimately be levied against the Respondent.

Nor do we find that when negotiations ended prematurely through the default of both parties after the December 22 meeting, the Union had sufficiently tested the Respondent's proposals to permit us to assess the latter's willingness to bargain in good faith. In this regard, the judge's finding that the Respondent rigidly adhered to its proposals for substantial contract revisions and wage reductions predictably unacceptable to the Union is not supported by the record. The Respondent's proposed revisions to the standard form contract made at the second meeting were criticized as being "out of line" by the Union when the parties next met. The Union made no counterproposals until the fourth meeting, however, when, as the Union admits, some give and take occurred. At the first negotiation session, the Respondent had termed the Union's demand for annual wage increases too high. The Respondent's first specific counterproposal regarding wages, given on December 22, was a starting point for future negotiations. The Respondent neither stated nor suggested by its conduct that it intended its first wage offer to be its last.[8] To the contrary, it is uncontested that the Respondent's wage offer was on the table, awaiting a response, at the close of the parties' fourth and final bargaining session. An anticipated fifth meeting, at which wages and other outstanding issues might have been discussed, never materialized due to the mutual neglect of the parties.

[6] The judge found the Respondent's December 22 economic proposal to be "spurious" in nature and independent evidence of a lack of good faith because it required a wage reduction that would have put the employees below the legal minimum wage. The record, however, is far from clear exactly what hourly wage rate employees in each unit classification earned or what they would receive as a result of the Respondent's wage reduction proposal. Even where dollar figures are mentioned, there is no indication whether these figures include tips, gratuities, and meals, all relevant to the determination of the hourly wage rate of the subject employees. See generally Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 201-219. Further, the record fails to support the judge's finding that "[t]he parties at the hearing accepted it as a given proposition" that the Respondent's proposed reduction would have brought employees below the legal minimum wage. The subject of minimum wage was raised at the hearing by counsel for the General Counsel, who asked Musso if he realized that "if the union agreed to the proposed cut or wages, that it would have put the wages of the employees below the minimum wage?" Musso said he was being advised by counsel that "I was paying for Darwin Lanyi, that he took the last Labor Department minimum; that's what he could do." Counsel for the General Counsel then sought clarification by asking Musso whether he was saying that "if the 50-percent cut would have put the wages below the minimum wage scale, as required by the government, you were not aware of it." The Respondent's counsel objected to this question on the grounds that Musso had testified to what his lawyer advised him. The judge sustained the objection, noting, "I think the point is made." No further testimony regarding minimum wage was elicited by any party. Although counsel for the Charging Party asserted in summation, as does the General Counsel in her brief to the Board, that the Respondent's wage offer was below the legal minimum, we do not find the above testimony, the only evidence of record on the subject, sufficient to support a finding that the Respondent's wage offer would have brought employees below the legal minimum. In addition, Musso's testimony that the Respondent's proposed 50-percent reduction would have put employees on a par with the average wage paid by nearby restaurants is uncontradicted. On these facts we find the evidence fails to establish that the Respondent proposed reducing employees' wages below the legal minimum.

[7] The judge found that following the December 22 bargaining session, Lanyi testified that he called Pinto to set the parties' next meeting date; that Pinto promised to talk to Musso and get back with Lanyi to schedule a date to resume negotiations; and that when Pinto failed to do so by January 13, the Union, believing the Respondent was "dragging its feet" in setting up a fifth meeting, filed the charge initiating the instant proceeding. Contrary to the judge, the record establishes that the charge was filed on December 2 after the parties' third bargaining session. Further, Lanyi did not testify that he called Pinto after the fourth and final December 22 meeting. Rather, at one point, when Lanyi was claiming that the December 22 meeting never occurred, he testified that he might well have had a telephone conversation with Pinto in early January, but he "didn't know." Later, when Lanyi was recalled and testified that the December 22 meeting did in fact occur, he denied calling Pinto after the December 22 meeting. Accordingly, Lanyi's testimony does not support a finding that the charge was precipitated by the Respondent's dragging its feet in setting up a fifth meeting. Rather, it supports our finding that after plans for a January meeting were abandoned due to Musso's illness, the parties failed to contact one another, and thus must share responsibility for the fact that a fifth meeting never occurred.

The bargaining process in this case reveals that the normal give and take of negotiations had just begun when the Union, soon after the parties' initial exchange of proposals, filed the instant unfair labor practice charges. Only one more meeting followed before the parties drifted apart, leaving the Respondent's proposals on the bargaining table. Under these circumstances, and absent evidence that the Respondent engaged in any unlawful conduct away from the bargaining table that might have affected the negotiations, we cannot find the facts establish that the Respondent exhibited an unwillingness to reach agreement.

Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD B. LAWRENCE, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me on September 30, 1982, at New York City. The charge was filed on December 2, 1981, by Local 6, Restaurant and Club Employees and Bartenders Union, AFL–CIO (the Union). On January 13, 1982, a complaint and notice of hearing was issued alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by reason of the Respondent's alleged failure to bargain collectively in good faith with the representative of its employees. The case is based on the contention that, though the Respondent met with the Union for negotiations on several occasions, it did not bargain in good faith with the intention of reaching an agreement, as evidenced by the fact that the Respondent made proposals calling for the elimination of numerous provisions contained in earlier collective-bargaining agreements that Respondent had had with predecessor unions, the making of unreasonable wage counterproposals, and delaying of the negotiations.

The Respondent's answer denies all allegations of wrongdoing and statutory violation and places in issue the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board in this case.

The Respondent alleged as a first affirmative defense that employees in another restaurant owned by the owner of Respondent had rejected Local 6 as their bargaining agent in a Board-supervised election and that the instant action was instituted after filing of a petition for an election, by the employees of the Respondent without knowledge or participation of Respondent's management. A second affirmative defense alleged that each of the restaurants does less than $500,000 gross annual volume.

The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Posthearing briefs have been filed on behalf of the General Counsel and on behalf of the Respondent.

On the entire record and based on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and the manner in which they gave their testimony, and after consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

In its answer, Respondent admits that it and Musso's 860-2 Rest., Inc. are corporations wholly owned by Biagio Musso, which operate seafood restaurants in New York City at 410 Avenue of the Americas (Captain's Table) and at 860 Second Avenue (Musso's), respectively, and that both are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent also admitted, and stipulated at the hearing, that the aggregate purchases made by each restaurant from points outside New York State exceeded $10,000 per year. Respondent disputed the Board's jurisdiction in this case, however, on the ground that the businesses are separate and independent entities. It alleged that each restaurant's gross receipts were less than $500,000 per annum. Although the Respondent's answer is unclear and seems to read as an admission on this point, Respondent established at the hearing that Respondent's gross receipts for the fiscal year ending August 31, 1982, had amounted to $337,623 and that its annual gross receipts in the preceding year had been only slightly higher, and Respondent argued that this had to be considered independently of the gross receipts of Musso's, which had amounted to $1,099,841 for the fiscal year ended October 31, 1981.

[8] Musso in fact testified that the 50-percent wage cut was proposed to see how low the Union would go and where the parties were going to meet. He indicated that the Respondent was willing to give more and awaited the Union's response.

The factual issue is therefore squarely presented whether the management of these enterprises is characterized by the kind of centralized control of labor relations and other incidents of common or integrated operation that warrant consideration of the aggregate income of both enterprises in determining whether jurisdictional requisites have been met. The important factors are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations, and common ownership.[1] Centralized control of labor relations has long been regarded as the critical factor.[2]

Musso has operated Captain's Table since 1971 and Musso's since 1977. The purchase of Musso's was consummated by taking title in the name of Nagio Restaurant, Inc., the Respondent, which as part of the purchase price assumed a security agreement covering the restaurant equipment. Subsequently, because his accountant changed his mind about how the transaction should be structured, Musso purchased all the stock of the owning corporation, Musso's 860-2 Rest., Inc. for $30,000 payable by a series of notes over the course of several years.

Each restaurant has its own manager, who concerns himself with the details of daily operation. Musso spends his time at Musso's. That restaurant receives its supplies from overseas and from the Fulton Fish Market. It has 18 employees and is open Monday through Friday from noon to 3 p.m. for lunch and from 5 to 11:20 p.m. for dinner. On Saturday it is open for dinner only. Captain's Table has had a complement of 12 employees since its inception. It is closed on Monday instead of Sunday, and is open from noon to 11 p.m. on the other six days of the week. Musso's accepts American Express, Visa, and Master Charge credit cards, while Captain's Table accepts Visa, Master Charge, and Diners Club. The bank accounts, payrolls, insurance policies,[3] and liquor licenses are separate. The two salaried managers operate independently of each other and there is no interchange of personnel between the two restaurants. Each restaurant pays for its own deliveries.

Despite this superficial veneer of independence, however, it is apparent that Biagio Musso is the controlling influence in the operation of each restaurant. He is the sole stockholder of each corporation and he and his wife are the sole directors and officers. The prescribed days and hours of operation have never been varied by the local managers. Musso testified that slight fluctuations in the number of employees at Respondent's restaurant would be left to managerial discretion, since the managers hire and fire personnel, but any substantial change would have to be cleared with him. At Musso's, the manager and Musso jointly hire and fire employees and determine the number needed. Mrs. Musso signs checks for payment of bills of both restaurants from their separate bank accounts. One accountant services both corporations. A statement of joint control is incorporated in the tax returns of both corporations pursuant to regulations of the Internal Revenue Service.

Musso's testimony left no doubt that he has complete control of labor relations for both restaurants. The respective managers have never participated in the negotiation of collective-bargaining agreements covering the restaurants' employees; this has been handled solely by Musso. Musso entered into collective-bargaining agreements with union locals that were predecessors of Local 6, and a subsequent agreement recognizing Local 6 as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees after the merger of those unions into Local 6. It was conceded that although the manager at Captain's Table is not expressly required to do so, he does in fact consult with Musso from time to time regarding the assignment of work to employees at that restaurant, work hours of particular employees, and assignments to particular work stations. These are precisely the types of matters that would normally be left to the sole discretion of a manager on the spot. Musso also testified that he personally decided to cut wages of employees at Captain's Table because it had been losing money for 2 years and that he personally explained the cut to the employees, citing wage scales in neighboring restaurants. In addition, Musso continued to draw $26,000 per annum as chief executive officer, which I regard as considerably weakening Musso's contention that his role in the operation of the restaurant was almost nil.

I conclude from this evidence that Musso was intimately involved in the management of Captain's Table notwithstanding the presence of a manager on the scene. In addition, it is uncontroverted that ultimate authority with respect to its management rested with Musso.

On the basis of the proven common ownership, common financial control, common direct and ultimate control of operations by Musso, and Musso's admitted control of labor relations for both restaurants, I find that they constitute a single enterprise for jurisdictional purposes and that their aggregate receipts bring them within Board jurisdiction.[4] I find that at all material times here, Respondent has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that at all times material here the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

The employees at Captain's Table had been represented by two unions, with which Nagio Restaurant, Inc. entered into collective-bargaining agreements. Local 22, Chefs, Cooks, Cafeteria, Food, Beverage & Service Employees Union, AFL-CIO represented chefs, relief cooks, and dishwashers employed by the restaurant. Local 1, Restaurant Employees Union, affiliated with Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO represented employees in a unit described as follows:

> All captains, waitresses, waiters, busboys, busgirls, cashiers, floor walkers, hostesses, food checkers, dining room employees, employed at the restaurant, excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Local 1 and Local 22 subsequently were merged into Local 6. Local 6 filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Respondent. On June 22, 1981, the proceeding was settled by means of an agreement whereby Respondent agreed to bargain with Local 6 on request as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative "of our employees with respect to their rates of pay, wages, hours of employment and other terms and conditions of employment." That agreement defines the appropriate bargaining unit involved in this case, which in any event would comprise the units defined in the earlier collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the two merged unions.

III. THE REFUSAL TO BARGAIN IN GOOD FAITH

A. History of Negotiations

Representatives of the Respondent and the Union met for the purpose of negotiating a new collective-bargaining agreement on four occasions, from August through December 22, 1981. All the meetings were at the offices of Respondent's attorney, Pinto. Darwin Lanyi, an administrative aide employed by Local 6, arranged the meeting of August 18, but it was attended by John F. Leaver, an executive vice president of the Union. Leaver met with Musso and Pinto for about 1 hour. He presented them with a proposed standard form contract covering both kitchen and dining room personnel. This contract had been drawn up by Local 6 with the object of combining in the Local 6 contract features of the contracts formerly used by Local 1 and Local 22. The contract was thus a recodification of the terms of the Local 22 contract, covering kitchen workers, the Local 1 contract covering waiters, and the Local 6 contract covering bartenders, but while it incorporated many provisions of the earlier agreements, and sought renewal thereof, the contract itself was not one that had been previously seen or signed by Respondent.

There is no conflict in the testimony respecting this first meeting. Leaver presented the contract as a proposal and orally stated a number of economic demands, that Pinto wrote down: a $30 raise for kitchen employees and a $10 raise for dining room employees for each year of what was proposed as a 3-year contract, increases in welfare and pension plan, bereavement pay, and vacation and sick leave. No negotiations took place. Musso and Pinto responded by saying that they thought the demands were too high, and that they would review the contract and get back to him. No date was set for the next meeting.

Musso testified that, following this meeting, he met with Pinto and they worked on counterproposals.

In late August or early September, Darwin Lanyi, who had become responsible for further negotiations, telephoned Pinto for a response to the proposals. He received none and, despite his efforts to fix an early date for negotiations, was unable to persuade Pinto to fix a meeting date earlier than October 22. Pinto insisted that that was the earliest date when both he and Musso could be available.

Accordingly, the second meeting took place on October 22. Lanyi met with Pinto and Musso for almost 3 hours. According to Musso, Pinto communicated counterproposals and presented management's position. Musso testified that he advised Lanyi that he would consider changes to the Union's proposals, by which I understand him to mean that he would give serious consideration to them in modified form. Lanyi, however, presents a picture of a meeting characterized by unmitigated recalcitrance on the part of Pinto and Musso. He quotes Pinto as stating that the proposals were "far too expensive" and depicts his review of the Union's standard contract clauses as something akin to putting the pages through a paper shredder: "and he just proceeded to shatter it." Pinto made no economic counterproposals and said nothing other than that the Union's proposals were far too expensive and that Respondent's terms "would be a step backwards." There would be no increases in the pension and insurance contributions and there would be a 25-percent reduction in wages. Most of the meeting was spent going through the standard form contract. Pinto wanted to eliminate most of the standard clauses, which according to Lanyi were boilerplate that had been carried over from the earlier agreements to which Respondent had been a party. Pinto marked up a copy of the agreement and also noted the changes he wanted on a yellow pad. (The marked-up agreement and the memorandum of changes are both in evidence.)

Lanyi testified that he explicitly asked for counterproposals and was told by Pinto that Respondent was not prepared to furnish counterproposals at that time. I have noted that Musso testified that he had worked on counterproposals with Pinto prior to the second meeting. It is not apparent whether economic counterproposals were included in their discussions, but Musso also testified that by agreement with Lanyi negotiations respecting the economic provisions were reserved for a later meeting, and this was the reason why no economic proposals were made by Respondent until the fourth meeting.

At the conclusion of the second meeting, it was agreed that a third meeting would be held in November. Lanyi, Pinto, and Musso met on November 17. According to Lanyi, whose memory was fuzzy about this meeting, no counterproposals were presented by the Respondent and there was no progress, so they set a date for a December meeting, which never came about. He recalled having told Pinto that he had discussed the suggested changes in the standard contract terms with his supervisor and "that the changes he was proposing were, in the majority, out of line. We were not going to delete all of the things that he wanted out of the standard contract."

Lanyi then went on to testify that a further meeting was scheduled for December 22. Pinto telephoned him, however, either on that date in the morning or the day before, and stated that Musso would not be available and that Pinto would get back to him after the holidays. Later, Lanyi changed his testimony and asserted that he called Pinto on the morning of December 22 to let him know he was on his way to the meeting, whereupon Pinto said he was glad Lanyi called because Musso could not make the meeting, and he could not set an alternate date without conferring with Musso. He promised to contact Lanyi after the holidays.

There were no subsequent meetings, according to Lanyi, because the events of December 22, considered with everything else, convinced him that Respondent was dragging its feet. When Pinto failed to call by January 13, 1982, the charge was filed.

Musso testified that a fourth meeting had in fact taken place on December 22 and had lasted for 2 hours. Musso testified that at the third meeting, on November 17, "Mr. Pinto was asking for certain conditions and Mr. Lanyi did not come up with it." They agreed to meet further on December 22 and in fact did so, from 2:30 to 4:30 p.m. The persons present at this last meeting were Lanyi, Musso, Pinto, and Emil Bonati. Pinto made notes of the meeting, which are in evidence. Musso asserted that counterproposals were made, but his testimony makes it clear that during the fourth meeting, apart from the suggestion that the employees take a deep cut in pay, he had no economic counterproposals in mind. He testified that because the restaurant was losing money, he offered a 50-percent cut in pay, but that Pinto at the same time acceded to union demands regarding vacation, sick pay, and holidays. He asserted that he was willing to have further meetings, but he was waiting for the Union to come up with a counteroffer to his proposal for sweeping cuts in pay. It was apparent to me that Musso failed to recognize that the burden of making a responsible counterproposal respecting wages was on him, the Union having presented its position on wages at the very first meeting.

Lanyi's memory improved considerably after Musso testified. He then testified that at the fourth meeting, on December 22, he had set forth the union position that the requested contract textual changes were unacceptable. (Musso had testified that only economic terms had been discussed and that there was no discussion of other changes in the standard form contract.) Lanyi also testified that "we were still asking for a response to the wage proposal that we had asked for and which we had not gotten at the two previous meetings." He cited rising living costs. When it came time to set a date for a further meeting, a date could not be set because Musso had medical problems.

Unquestionably, Musso was compelled by medical problems to spend the entire month of January 1982 away from work. He underwent surgery, which hospitalized him at the beginning of the month and required him to recuperate at home for the last 3 weeks of January, by which time the charge here had been filed.

I credit Lanyi's version of the events which transpired at the final meeting, despite his memory lapse, and I do not credit Musso's assertion that the Union agreed to wait quiescently for a response to its economic demands and to sit through several meetings watching Pinto tear up the standard forms.

I also credit Lanyi's testimony that early in January he telephoned Pinto, who promised to get back to him with a date for resumption of negotiations. It is the type of conversation that would logically take place under such circumstances. The date when Musso would be physically capable of resuming negotiations was within Musso's and Pinto's knowledge. They made no effort to suggest a date although in September 1981, they had been able to fix a meeting date 6 weeks ahead of time.

B. Analysis

The issue is whether in the circumstances of this particular case, the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met.[5] It has been observed that surface-bargaining cases present problems of great complexity and that no case can be a determinative precedent for another: "It is the total picture shown by the factual evidence that either supports the complaint or falls short of the quantum of affirmative proof required by law."[6]

In the present case, there was inordinate delay on the part of the Respondent in coming to the bargaining table. The meeting in August 1981 involved more than presentation of the Union's demands. The Respondent's counsel put off negotiations until the latter part of October without adequate explanation of the need for such a lengthy delay. Pinto's statement that it was the first available date both he and Musso could attend was no explanation at all. Musso did not amplify it in his testimony and Pinto did not appear at the hearing. There can be no argument about Respondent's obligation to meet with the Union upon some reasonable timetable; that is, the statutory mandate. Respondent's failure to do so is one of the factors that may be considered with the totality of conduct to determine whether it was engaging in good-faith bargaining as required by the Act.[7]

The delay continued at and after the second meeting. The Union's form contract and economic demands, whether acceptable to Respondent, have never been claimed by Respondent to have been unreasonable or outrageous, yet no response to the economic demands was forthcoming until the fourth meeting, on December 22, 4 months after their original presentation to Respondent. The process of excision of standard clauses carried out during the second meeting was tantamount to wholesale expurgation of standard form provisions which in many cases were nothing more than carryovers from earlier collective-bargaining agreements to which Respondent had been a party.

The Respondent conceded[8] what is apparent from the documentary evidence: that the Respondent sought elimination of features that had existed in earlier agreements with the separate union locals which had merged into Local 6 and that did not in any manner impinge on economic problems of the Respondent. Respondent offered almost no justification for its sweeping attack on the noneconomic provisions of the contract. Musso attributed the idea of eliminating the union-security clause to remarks made by the administrative law judge who had been involved in settlement of the charge filed earlier by Local 6. Musso asserted that, not only was that idea not original with him, but the Union had not found it objectionable when suggested by the judge. Nevertheless, that would hardly be justification for the broad attack on the other provisions or for assuming the justification of the demand for elimination of the union-security clause in the present circumstances.

Each party blames the other for the delay in negotiating the economic proposals, and each party seeks to cast the onus on the other for producing counterproposals. Lanyi testified that he kept pressing for an economic response; Musso says it was understood that that would be left for last. It may be argued that Lanyi's failure to recall the December meeting should be regarded as a serious qualification of his credibility, but I do not accept it as such. I regard it, rather, as a true lapse which requires that his testimony regarding some of the details of the meetings be accepted only with great care. It does not weigh half as much on me as does the impression, on these facts, that much of the Respondent's preoccupation with the form contract was a stall to avoid coming to grips with the economic demands. That impression is reinforced both by the extreme nature of Respondent's objections to the standard form contract and by the spurious nature of the economic counterproposal,[9] which Musso admitted was made purely to compel the Union to come forward with another proposal and did not at all reflect what he was willing to negotiate. He waited for the Union to negotiate against itself instead of making a bona fide counterproposal.

Lack of good-faith bargaining is also indicated by Respondent's advancement of an illegal proposal. The parties at the hearing accepted it as a given proposition that a 50-percent reduction would have brought the employees' wages below the legal minimum wage. Musso excused himself on the basis that he acted on advice of Counsel but that does not explain why such a proposal was made in the first place. He did not bring his attorney in to explain it. This proposal is also indicative of lack of good-faith bargaining when viewed from another standpoint. An employer's insistence on making proposals to a newly certified union, which are less than what the employees are currently receiving has been held to be, in the proper overall context, failure to bargain.[10] Thus, the Respondent's argument that the contract presented to it by the Union was an altogether new contract and not a renewal is seen not to be helpful at all to the Respondent. In any event, however, the same logic has been held applicable to negotiations involving renewals, it being held that one of the factors to be considered in determining whether an employer is bargaining in good faith is whether its proposals would reduce the employees' existing working conditions or wages, an inference unfavorable to the employer being permissible if reductions are something more than de minimis.[11]

Consideration of all the circumstances of the present case makes it apparent that the Respondent did not simply adhere to a bargaining position that was unpalatable to the Union but formulated and maintained a position designed to stall negotiations, avoid reaching an agreement, and undermine the position of the Union as the representative of the Respondent's employees. Musso and his attorney had to have known that their proposals, economic and otherwise, would encounter serious resistance from the Union.[12] It is well settled that rigid adherence to proposals of a type which are "predictably unacceptable" to the Union may be considered with other evidence "as evidencing a predetermination not to reach agreement."[13] The same is true of proposals advanced in expectation of union rejection by an employer's negotiator who is "well schooled in the realities of collective bargaining."[14] The Respondent, in effect, called on the Union to abdicate its normal right to represent the employees effectively,[15] and "a violation is made out when, as here, the employer demands a contractual provision which would exclude the labor organization from any effective means of participation in important decisions affecting the terms and conditions of employment of its members."[16]

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The violations of the Act herein found to have been committed by the Respondent have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees of the Respondent except guards and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

4. The Union is the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid unit for the purpose of collective

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice by reason of its refusal to bargain in good faith with the Union with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist from such conduct and that it be required, on request of the Union, to negotiate with respect to such subject matters and, if an agreement is reached, embody the same in a signed agreement.[17]

[17] This is the relief requested by the General Counsel (G.C. Br. 12) and suffices to effectuate the policies of the Act. I considered the propriety of recommending backpay in view of the delay in bargaining combined with actual implementation by Respondent of a 50-percent reduction in wages, but concluded on the basis of evidence in the record that such relief would not effectuate the purposes of the Act, might be injurious to the interests of all parties, and would be better left to the discretion of the parties in the course of the collective bargaining which is here directed to proceed. Such a remedy was invoked by the trial examiner in Freeman Co., 194 NLRB 595 (1971), but the Board reversed his finding that Sec. 8(a)(5) had been violated. See *Steelworkers v. June 9, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 28, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, W.A.D. Rentals, Limited d/b/a Kelly's Private Car Service, Queens, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Lyn Neugebauer, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Stuart M. Kirshenbaum, Esq. and Sanford E. Pollack, Esq. (Marshall M. Miller Associates, Inc.), of Hewlett, New York, for the Respondent.

David Stolow, Esq. (Donald F. Menagh, P.C.), of New York, New York, for the Charging Party.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On the basis of a charge filed on 2 July 1985 by Local 3036, Taxi Drivers and Allied Workers Union, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC (Union or Charging Party), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 29, Brooklyn, New York, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on 16 September 1985, against W.A.D. Rentals, Limited d/b/a Kelly's Private Car Services (Respondent) alleging that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). On 26 September 1985 the Respondent duly filed an answer to the complaint, in substance, denying the material allegations. In its answer to the complaint, the Respondent raised the following affirmative defenses.

1. The Complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted pursuant to any of the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.
2. Any claims asserted against the Respondent, irrespective of their veracity, are in any event time-barred and must be dismissed pursuant to the six (6) month statute of limitations set forth at Section 10(b) of the Act.

On 30 December 1985, the Respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment alleging that an objective basis existed for the Respondent to believe that the Union no longer had the support of a majority of the employee drivers because there has been several layers of turnover of employees in the past 5 years, and therefore the Respondent had no continuing obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union or to execute a written collective-bargaining agreement on demand; that the Union had abandoned representation of unit employees; and that the Union did not make a timely demand for bargaining. The Respondent sought dismissal of the complaint in its entirety. By Decision and Order dated 9 April 1986, the Board denied the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment for the reason that "the Respondent has not met its burden of demonstrating the absence of a genuine dispute as to the material facts in issue."

A hearing was held before me in Brooklyn, New York, on 14, 15, and 24 July 1986.[1] All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. At the opening of the hearing the Respondent renewed its "motion for a summary judgment. Predicated largely on [Section 10(b)]'s statute of limitations [sic] at 6 months imposed under the Act." I reserved decision on this motion. At the close of the General Counsel's case the Respondent renewed its motion to dismiss the complaint for various reasons,[2]

[1] On 24 June 1986 the Respondent filed a petition to quash subpoenas. The General Council opposed such petition in writing filed on 10 July 1986. The Respondent also filed a petition to revoke subpoena ad testificandum and subpoena duces tecum on 14 July 1986. At the opening of the hearing I denied the Respondent's petitions. At the close of the General Counsel's case, however, the Respondent amended its answer to admit "commerce jurisdiction," in effect resolving this issue. Moreover, on 9 June 1986 the Respondent filed a motion and demand for a bill of particulars. The General Counsel filed a reply in part and opposition in part to motion for bill of particulars on 30 June 1986. By letter dated 3 July the Respondent renewed its request for a bill of particulars, asserting that the General Counsel's reply was inadequate. The General Counsel thereafter filed an amended reply in part and opposition in part to motion for bill of particulars on 10 July 1986. At the hearing I found that "the information that was supplied to the Respondent's counsel adequately satisfies as much of the request for the bill of particulars as is warranted."

[2] Briefly, the reasons set forth by the Respondent as the basis for dismissal of the complaint are: That any claim of an unfair labor practice is time-barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act; that the refusal of the Regional Director to issue a complaint in a previous case based on a charge filed by the Union involving the same parties and factual background and considered with any additional facts, the "entirety of those matters are now [Res Judicata] and compose the law of this case with respect to these dealings between the employer and the union"; that the Union is guilty of laches since it failed to demand bargaining or execution of a written contract for 15 months after the parties allegedly reached agreement on all which will be fully discussed. I denied the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint. The Respondent again renewed its motion to dismiss the complaint in its entirety at the close of the hearing on the same grounds, in substance, as previously asserted. I reserved decision on the motion. Thereafter, the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Union all filed briefs in this case. In its brief the Respondent seeks dismissal of the complaint, "For all the foregoing reasons and those depicted on the evidentiary record." For the reasons set forth, I grant the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint in part, and deny its motion to dismiss in other part.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and on my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, at all times material, has been a New York corporation with its principal office and place of business at 212-35 42d Avenue, Queens, New York, engaged in the business of providing private car transportation services. In the course and conduct of its business operations during the preceding 12 months, these operations being representative of its operations at all times material, the Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000. During the same period of time, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its place of business gasoline, automobile parts, and other products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from other enterprises, located within the State of New York, each of which other enterprises had received these products, goods, and materials directly from points outside the State of New York. The complaint alleges, the Respondent admitted to the above as fact at the hearing,[3] and, therefore, I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The complaint also alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that William Kelly, the Respondent's president, at all times material has been, and is now, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and an agent of the Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act.[4]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges that Local 3036, Taxi Drivers and Allied Workers Union, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The Respondent in its answer denies this allegation on the basis of lack of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief thereon. On 5 February 1982, the Board certified the Union as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining regarding rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditione of employment, after a union victory in a Board-conducted election. Moreover, the Union has an industrywide collective-bargaining agreement with the Medallion Taxicab industry. I therefore find and conclude that Local 3036, Taxi Drivers and Allied Workers Union, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[5]

III. THE APPROPRIATE BARGAINING UNIT

The complaint alleges that the following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time drivers employed by the Employer at its Queens garage, excluding all office clerical employees, dispatchers, bookkeepers, management personnel, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

The Respondent denies this allegation. In a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election dated 15 December 1980, signed by the Respondent and the Union and agreeing to a Board-conducted secret-ballot election of its employees, the Respondent accepted as appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining this very same unit. The Board certified the Union on 5 February 1982 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the same described unit. The Respondent offered no evidence to refute the appropriateness of this unit for purposes of collective bargaining.

Therefore, I find and conclude that:

> All full-time and regular part-time drivers employed by the employer at Queens garage, excluding all office clerical employees, dispatchers, bookkeepers, management personnel, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

contractual terms; that the Respondent had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status at the time it withdrew recognition of the Union, founded on objective considerations, namely, the abandonment of the unit employees and the "several layers of turnover of employees during the almost 5 years since the Union's narrow 15-14 election victory in December 1981"; and the General Counsel's failure of proof in this case.

[3] Although the Respondent amended its answer at the hearing to admit the jurisdictional allegations in the complaint as fact, it continued to deny the legal conclusion that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[4] The evidence shows that Edward Kelly, son of William Kelly, and the Respondent's vice president, is a part owner of the Respondent and the Respondent's manager, and at all times material has been, and is now, a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act, and an agent of the Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges that since on or about 13 June 1985, the Respondent has failed and refused, and continues to fail and refuse, to execute a written collective-bargaining agreement embodying the terms and conditions of employment agreed on between the Respondent and the Union about 16 January 1984, although requested to do so by the Union; and that about 13 June 1985, the Respondent withdrew its recognition of the Union as the exclusive-bargaining representative of its employees in an appropriate unit, and since that date has failed and refused, and continues to fail and refuse to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of such employees, and by such acts the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and continues to interfere with, restrain, and coerce its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and the Respondent has also refused to bargain collectively and is refusing to bargain collectively with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations.

A. Background

The Respondent operates a taxi service whose business mainly consists of providing passenger fare service to and from the Long Island Railroad Station in Bayside, Queens, New York. This is a family-owned business whose owners include William Kelly, his son Edward Kelly, and, at the time of the events, another relative, Carmello Forame. For the past few years and for all intents and purposes, Edward Kelly has run and managed the business due to debilitating medical illnesses affecting his father, William Kelly, and uncle, Forame. The Respondent's business operation differs from the New York City medallioned taxicab industry in that it is a private car service or livery business, whose drivers may not accept street fares, passengers who hail a cruising cab from the sidewalk for a metered ride. Instead, all riders are obtained either by telephone calls directly from customers or by picking up passengers at the Long Island Railroad Station in Bayside. Cars are dispatched either from the Respondent's headquarters or by two-way radio communication. Fares are set by the Respondent and are not subject to regulation by the New York City Taxi and Limousine Commission.

The Union began its organizing campaign among the Respondent's drivers in 1980. The Respondent and the Union executed a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election on 15 December 1980, and the ensuing Board-held secret-ballot election on 9 January 1981 resulted in a 15 to 14 vote in favor of the Union. The Regional Director for Region 29 certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining on 5 February 1982. Thereafter, and at the Union's request, the parties entered into negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement.

B. The Evidence

The record shows that the Respondent and the Union held approximately six or seven negotiation meetings at the Traveller's Inn near LaGuardia Airport in Queens, New York, commencing on 26 April through 3 November 1982. At these negotiations, the Respondent was represented by Edward Kelly and Carmello Forame, part-owners, and Brian Tunney, Esq.,[6] while the Union representatives were Gasper Pecorella and Michael Rosenthal, the Union's vice president and recording secretary, respectively, Stuart Bochner, Esq.,[7] and two bargaining unit employees, Milton and Connors.

At the first negotiation meeting on 26 April 1982, the Union presented its list of proposals for inclusion in a collective-bargaining agreement and, for use as a guideline in negotiating the agreement, proffered a copy of an agreement between the Union and the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade, the Union's "master contract."[8] Rosenthal testified that with Tunney and Bochner acting as spokesmen for the Respondent and the Union, respectively, the parties discussed the following items: dues checkoff, which was proposed by the Union and opposed by the Respondent; arbitration, the Union seeking the New York State Mediation Board and the Respondent asserting the American Arbitration Association as arbitrator; union security, the Union requiring a union-security clause and the Respondent rejecting this demand; health, welfare, and pension plans, with the Union offering to include management representatives in the plans, subject to the legality of this arrangement.

Although the record is unclear regarding the specifics, the evidence shows that the Respondent and the Union continued to meet and discuss the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement at several subsequent negotiation sessions through October 1982. The parties met again on 3 November 1982.[9] Rosenthal testified that they reviewed "topics" that had been agreed to at the previous bargaining sessions and negotiated to agreement various other issues such as: some aspects of the driver work shift schedules, vacations, jury duty pay, car wash responsibility, interior car care; breakdown pay,[10] the noncommissionable portion of the fare rate;[11]

[6] During these negotiations, the Respondent was represented by the law firm of Putney, Twombly, Hall and Hirson, Esqs., and Tunney was "of counsel."

[7] At the time, Bochner was a partner in the law firm of Menagh, Trainor and Bochner, Esqs., which represented the Union in collective-bargaining negotiations.

[8] While Kelly raised an objection to the use of the master contract as a guide in the negotiations because some of its terms were not applicable to the type of car transportation service operation run by the Respondent, he did, although reluctantly, allow it to be used in such a manner.

[9] Although Rosenthal testified that Bochner was present at this meeting, Tunney disputed this in his testimony. Moreover, although Bochner testified as a witness, he neither confirmed nor denied his presence at this meeting.

[10] When a car in service becomes disabled, the driver receives an hourly rate up to 4 hours or, on repair of the automobile, whichever is less.

[11] The Respondent receives an amount that "comes off the top of the fare," which is not subject to driver commissions.

seniority; leaves of absence; bulletin boards; a credit union; and a 3-year contract term. Rosenthal stated that other items discussed, but not fully agreed to, were: driver commissions, gasoline charges, radio charges, union security, dues checkoff, a final driver work shift schedule, and arbitration. Rosenthal recounted that at the negotiations agreement regarding particular issues was signified by Bochner and Tunney stating so, and that there was no initialing or "signing off" of the item in any written proposal, or the master contract or in any notes kept by the parties.

Regarding the 3 November 1982 negotiation meeting, Tunney testified that:

> [I]t was a rocky session as the last session always is; at the conclusion of which, having agreed on such things as commissions and whatever other terms, a great number of terms, the parties shook hands and went off their separate ways. The expectation being that a document would be prepared by the Union . . . within a reasonable time . . . and the parties would have to work out the language and—and any other miscellaneous terms. . . . I expected a tough drafting session after I got the first draft, that's what I expected as I left the room in November of '82. . . . The sense—and what I'm trying to point out is, we—I anticipated a contract to be forthcoming and we would look forward to what kind of language would be worked out in that agreement so that we could say all right yes, that is exactly the agreement.

Tunney also testified, however, that not all the issues discussed at this meeting had been resolved. We stated:

> [T]he master agreement had many many terms, many of which did not apply to us. But we went through each of those terms deleting some of them, talking about others and on some of them, we put a hold. At the time that we concluded our negotiations in November of '82, there was still a number of items that was still a hold.

Bochner testified, in substance, that by the end of negotiations in November 1982, agreement on a full collective-bargaining contract had been "about 90 percent done." Left "open" for resolution was some aspect of the "commission package" and shift scheduling. Bochner added that, "all of the non economic, non wage related items were fairly well set," most of the "scheduling was agreed to," "hospitalization was taken care of," as well as pension, major medical, and sick days.

Moreover, it is uncontested that at the conclusion of this meeting the Union agreed, at the Respondent's request, to prepare a draft collective-bargaining agreement and send it to the Respondent for review.

Rosenthal testified that there was no contact between the Respondent and the Union until January 1984 for the reason that starting in October 1982, the Union had been engaged in negotiating a new collective-bargaining agreement with the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade, a new master contract affecting the Medallion Taxi fleets, and that covered the Union's entire membership with the exception of Kelly's employees. Rosenthal related, "The entire focus of the Union became an attempt to get that contract. It's the only contract we have." While the master contract had expired on 16 November 1982, the parties thereto had agreed to extend it until 10 March 1983 while they met to negotiate a new agreement. However, Rosenthal added that despite the Union's preoccupation with its efforts to negotiate a new master contract, he attempted to contact Tunney by telephone "5 to 10 times" during the period from January through March 1983 in order to continue contract negotiations, but was unable to reach him, being told that either Tunney was ill, unavailable at the time, or out of the office. Although Rosenthal related that he left messages with Tunney's secretary for Tunney to call him back, Tunney never in fact returned his calls.

Rosenthal related that from March through July 1983, the Union was engaged in sporadic selective strikes throughout the taxicab industry that totally absorbed its time and effort. He testified:

> In July 1983, pretty much everything fell apart. We were just about ready to begin our election period for our union officers who are elected every 3 years, and 6 of our vice presidents decided to run against the incumbent leadership, including Mr. Pecorella who was the primary person dealing with Kelly's.
> From July 1983 through November 1983 nothing was accomplished. We had no contract with the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade so we couldn't do anything with them. We were totally immersed in the election and could not do anything else.

Rosenthal continued that in and around Thanksgiving 1983, the Union reached agreement with the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade on a new bargaining contract and that, "The period of December 1983 was taken up with the ratification of the contract."

Tunney testified that "after negotiations in November of '82, there was no contact that I recall for a substantial period of time; six months, eight months, nine months." According to Tunney, he then received two or three telephone calls, "all in late '83," presumably from Rosenthal, who on one occasion told him that the draft of the bargaining agreement was almost complete, and Tunney requested that a copy be sent to him when it was finished. Tunney related that during another of these calls Rosenthal told him that the Union was having an "internal union election problem," a problem with the "Medallion Cab Industry" negotiations and a strike, and that he was "sorry it's taking so long; I'll get back to you," with reference to the draft of the collective-bargaining agreement.

Rosenthal testified that in early January 1984, Bochner contacted Tunney and a meeting was scheduled for 16 January 1984 and held at Bochner's office in Manhattan, New York.[12] Present at this meeting were Bochner and Rosenthal for the Union, and Tunney on behalf of the Respondent. Neither Kelly nor Forame attended the meeting.[13] Bochner testified that the purpose of the meeting was "to finalize" all the terms and conditions of employment to be included in the collective-bargaining agreement. His account of what occurred is as follows:

> We did discuss all of the terms which the Union believed had been agreed to prior to that time, and did discuss the terms that were close to agreement and eventually reached agreement that day. . . . Brian Tunney had made his notes and I made my notes and we went through all the items and then finalized it with a substitute set of notes . . . the notes that I made at the end of the meeting when we finalized everything. . . . Tunney and I agreed that after we had all the items set forth that I would draft a proposed agreement embodying those things for his review. That was the way we left it at that meeting. We didn't sign off on each other's notes or anything like that. . . . There wasn't any initialling [sic].[14]

Rosenthal testified similarly regarding what had happened at the meeting and added that the meeting closed > with handshakes all around, congratulating ourselves for a clean, fair negotiation. Each side felt that they had done the best they could. There was some discussion with regard to which attorney would actually draft the language, but it was clear at the end of the meeting that Mr. Bochner was supposed to draft the language. We left agreeing to contact each other when the language was ready.

Tunney's recollection of the 16 January 1984 meeting was that its primary purpose was to update Bochner regarding what had been agreed to between the parties so that Bochner could prepare a written draft of the proposed collective-bargaining agreement, since he had not attended the last negotiation meeting in November 1982. Tunney stated that they discussed the terms of the proposed contract, "such things as the commission rates, the three year agreement, the many other terms that had been spoken about, many of which had in fact been agreed to during the '82 negotiations." Tunney maintained that this meeting was not a negotiating session because he would not conduct any negotiations without his client, Kelly, being present at the meeting. Tunney added:

> As we concluded what at best could be described as an attempt at a drafting session, it lasted less than an hour, Mr. Rosenthal, whom I have affection for, in truth . . . said to me, "Brian, when we get the agreement to you, do you think you'll have any problem having Kelly sign it?" And I said, "Mike look, it's been 14 months, please get the agreement to me and we'll see what happens," and I left it at that.[15]

Kelly testified that he was unaware of the 16 January 1984 meeting at Bochner's office because Tunney had not advised him about it, nor did Tunney apprise him of what had occurred at the meeting or discuss this with him. Kelly stated that he had attended all the prior negotiating sessions through November 1982. He added that although he had never told Tunney that Tunney could not negotiate on the Respondent's behalf without Kelly being present also, they in fact had never discussed this at all. Moreover, Kelly denied that the parties had reached agreement to most or all the items to be includ-

session on 3 November 1982, since Bochner had not attended that meeting and this would perhaps facilitate the negotiations and the preparation of a draft bargaining agreement. Although Bochner could not recall if he or Rosenthal had arranged this meeting with Tunney, he did testify that, "for a period prior to January 1984" he had attempted to contact Tunney in order to finalize the agreement but unsuccessfully.

[13] Although Tunney testified that he had no authority to negotiate a new bargaining agreement without Kelly's presence, Bochner testified that Tunney had told him that he had authority to bind the Respondent in such negotiations and that was also "evident from the prior negotiating sessions, and from the fact that [Tunney] agreed to sit down at the [16 January 1984] meeting and finalize the contract." However, both Bochner and Rosenthal also testified that the issue of Tunney's authority was never raised by them nor did it come up for discussion in any manner during the negotiations or at the 16 January 1984 meeting, although at the latter meeting Kelly, for the first time, failed to appear at a negotiation session. Moreover, on cross-examination, Bochner stated that Tunney had in effect made representations regarding his authority since "[Tunney] was their spokesman and there were Kelly's present when he . . . said we have agreement on those points and no people who I knew to be Kelly's had contradicted him." Rosenthal also testified that throughout the negotiations it was Tunney who spoke in authority for the Respondent at all times.

[14] According to the testimony of Bochner and Rosenthal the parties reached agreement on the previously unresolved issues and reviewed those items previously agreed to including: shift scheduling, medical benefits, vacations, an agency shop clause, no payroll dues deduction, the American Arbitration Association as arbitrator, a 41-percent commission for drivers, a 40-cent noncommissionable amount, and no driver gas or radio use charges, jury duty pay, no driver carwash charges; and the Union withdrew its demands for pension, major medical coverage, and sick leave days.

[15] Tunney testified that the proposed draft bargaining agreement was expected to contain the items agreed on during the negotiations and those items left on "hold" to which agreement between the parties had not yet been reached. The Respondent and the Union would then sit down and discuss the acceptability of the language regarding the terms already agreed to and "further talk" about those provisions about which final agreement had not been reached so that a complete agreement could then be signed. He stated:

> In my lexicon, there is no agreement [until there is] full agreement. . . . I don't think on the economic side, while we talked about everything, and we were real close . . . there were still many questions about how that would be phrased on the economic side. On the [non]economic side of things, there were many open gaps. . . . So was there complete, full, final binding agreement. . . ? No. Had the parties had a meeting of the mind on many terms? Yes.

Moreover, on cross-examination, Tunney was referred to the parties "last negotiating session" and asked if agreement had been reached on specific contract terms. We acknowledged that the parties had reached agreement on the amount of driver commissions, welfare and hospitalization benefits for employees, but not for dependents thereof, breakdown pay, call-in pay, jury duty pay, vacation pay, carwash charges, arbitration and grievance procedure, union security, and a "sense of an agreement" regarding driver work schedules. He continued that no agreement had been reached on the inclusion of a credit union provision, no agreement on dependent coverage under the health and welfare benefits programs, no agreement for the Respondent to provide an electric dryer for the drivers or bullet proof partitions in the motor vehicles used, and no agreement on the contracts effective dates although the parties had agreed to a 3-year contract term.

ed in the bargaining contract, and maintained that the last negotiation session between the Respondent and the Union occurred in November 1982.

On 5 February 1984, by letter to the Respondent's unit employees, Rosenthal notified the employees that negotiations between the Respondent and the Union had been concluded with "many new benefits and improvements contained in the proposed contract." The employees were advised that a draft agreement was being prepared and that a copy would "be given to the workers for their approval."[16] Thereafter, by letter dated 8 March 1984 Bochner notified Tunney that he had finished drafting a collective-bargaining agreement embodying "all of the terms agreed to at our meeting of January 16, 1984 at our office," and requested a meeting "to go over the Agreement and have it executed by our clients." Bochner testified that he never received a written response from Tunney regarding his letter and when he telephoned Tunney's office thereafter he was advised that Tunney was ill. Bochner related that he also sought Rosenthal's assistance in contacting Tunney in an effort to have the parties review and execute the bargaining contract.

Rosenthal testified that from March through June 1984, he telephoned Tunney's office between 10-20 times but was unsuccessful in reaching him, Rosenthal leaving messages for Tunney, "saying that we were ready to sit down and put our signatures on the contract and could we set up a meeting date," to which Tunney never responded nor contacted Rosenthal. By letter dated 12 June 1984 Rosenthal advised the Respondent that a draft of a proposed bargaining agreement was completed, and that the Union had been unable to reach Tunney to arrange a meeting; he requested that the Respondent contact the Union within 10 days to do so or the Union would "refer this matter to the National Labor Relations Board." Rosenthal added that on 27 June 1984 he telephoned Edward Kelly and was informed by Kelly that Tunney had left Putney, Twombly, Hall and Hirson, Esqs., and that the Respondent intended to obtain new legal counsel.[17] After Rosenthal advised Kelly that if this matter was not "resolved very soon" the Union would file a charge with the Board, Kelly hung up on him.

On 17 July 1984, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Respondent with the Board alleging that the Respondent had refused to bargain with the Union as the "certified bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees" by refusing to sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.[18] During the investigatory stage of the charge, the Union, by mailgram dated 14 September 1984, sent to the Respondent, demanded "immediate negotiations to complete the collective bargaining agreement."[19] In a letter to Rosenthal dated 25 September 1984, Tunney requested that the Union "forward to me for review, whatever draft you may have prepared in connection with our negotiations." By letter dated 8 October 1984, Rosenthal informed Tunney that Bochner was on vacation at that time and, on his return, the Union would forward the proposed bargaining agreement to him.

On 12 October 1984 the Regional Director for Region 29 notified the Union by letter that he had refused to issue a complaint in this matter because an investigation of the charge had shown that the parties agreed in January 1984 that the Union would draft and present to the Respondent a written contract for the Respondent's signature, but that the Union had failed to do so at the time of the dismissal of the charge in October 1984.[20]

Bochner left the law firm representing the Union on 17 January 1985. Although Bochner maintained that he had drafted and completed a proposed collective-bargaining agreement based on the negotiations between the Respondent and the Union, he did not recall whether it had been typed or remained in longhand, or whether it had been misplaced, lost, or somehow inadvertently destroyed, since it was never located despite a search for the document engaged in both by Bochner himself and David Stolow, Esq., another attorney at the Menagh law firm, who replaced Bochner regarding representing the Union in this matter. Be that as it may, no copy of Bochner's proposed draft agreement was ever sent to or was received by the Respondent.

Stolow testified that after he "inherited" the Kelly Private Car Service file in mid-January 1985, Bochner told him that although he had prepared a draft bargaining agreement previously, it could not now be located nor had a copy been sent to the Respondent, therefore Bochner and Tunney had never had the opportunity to review the draft. Stolow stated that he then attempted to contact Tunney "about three or four times" in late January or early February 1985, but unsuccessfully. Stolow continued that finally in late February 1985, he was able to reach Tunney, and Stolow advised Tunney that Bochner had left the Menagh law firm, that he was now handling the matter between the parties, and that he would attempt to prepare a draft agreement based on Bochner's notes, if this was acceptable with Tunney. Stolow recounted:

[16] The Union used the Excelsior list (election eligibility list) prepared in December 1980 in the representation proceeding (Case 29-RC-5223), in which the Union won certification, to establish the names and addresses of the Respondent's employees to whom such notices were sent.

[17] Tunney testified that he became associated with the law firm of Putney, Twombly, Hall and Hirson, Esqs., in May 1976 until February 1984. He stated that "From February of '84 through May of '85, I was a part-time consultant for the firm."

[18] Case 29-CA-11312. The Union notified the Respondent's employees by letter dated 24 July 1984 that it was filing a charge against the Respondent with the Board because the Respondent had refused to meet with the Union to sign the collective-bargaining agreement.

[19] Rosenthal explained that what he meant by "immediate negotiations to complete the collective bargaining agreement," was that the Respondent should "sit down and sign a contract." When asked why he had not used the latter language in his mailgram instead of "immediate negotiations to complete," Rosenthal replied, "Because I knew what I meant and I assumed Mr. Tunney would. Maybe I was mistaken."

[20] The Union also notified the Respondent's employees by letter dated 17 October 1984 of the Region's dismissal of its charge and promised to "explore further action" to compel "Kelly to live up to the agreement he agreed to." Again, by letter dated 20 December 1984, the Union advised the employees that there were "no new developments in our dispute with your employer."

> Mr. Tunney said that he was waiting and that I should put a draft together and send it to him and he'd go over it with his client. I asked Mr. Tunney to be patient in that I was going to have to now piece together an agreement that I was not privy to the negotiation of . . . I'd have to recreate what had happened and get that down on paper and if I left anything out or added something in that Mr. Tunney didn't think was correct, he should just let me know and we would straighten it out and he said that was okay—that's where he and I left it.

Stolow related that, thereafter, on 18 March 1985 he met with Rosenthal and, using Bochner's notes of the 16 January 1984 meeting, Rosenthal's recollection of the negotiations based on his notes and remembrances, a copy of the "industry-wide agreement" with Bochner's notations and markings, and a letter from Bochner to Board Agent Kevin Kitchen in the fall of 1984 that set forth what Bochner alleged was the agreement between the Respondent and the Union reached on 16 January 1984, Stolow began to prepare a draft of a collective-bargaining agreement.[21] On 17 April 1985 Stolow forwarded a draft of a bargaining agreement to Tunney for review. Stolow stated that after being apprised by Rosenthal a few days later that there were two errors in the draft agreement, he notified Tunney of the proposed corrections by letter dated 22 April 1985.[22] Also by letter dated 22 April 1985, the Union notified the Respondent's employees that a draft bargaining agreement had been forwarded to the Respondent and that the employees should, "Demand that Kelly sign the contract now." Stolow recounted that failing to hear from Tunney regarding the draft agreement, he attempted unsuccessfully to contact Tunney, "once or twice" in late April or early May 1985. Stolow wrote to Tunney on 16 May 1985 requesting a meeting "to finalize the written memorialization of its Collective Bargaining Agreement with Kelly's Private Car Service." By letter dated 21 May 1985 Tunney responded to Stolow's letter advising Stolow that he had reviewed the draft agreement, would shortly meet with the Respondent concerning it, and would contact Stolow "shortly thereafter regarding same."

Stolow continued that he telephoned Tunney on 3 June 1985 and Tunney advised him that he had discussed the draft agreement with the Respondent and that > the draft was basically correct, it was accurate, there were one or two things he thought had to be added to it. . . . We said I had gotten most of it—that it was pretty good. . . . My response to that was since I in fact was coming into this as I was that that would probably prove to be the case and we discussed actually sitting down so that we could get into a room with the draft—that would just end the proceedings then and there because if there was something left out Tunney would point it out and we'd have a contract.

Stolow suggested that the parties meet including Tunney and "some principal from Kelly's" and Stolow and Rosenthal for the Union and "put the finishing touches on this thing and get a signed contract." Tunney agreed and a meeting was scheduled for 10 June 1985 at the Traveller's Inn for 10 a.m. On the following day, 4 June 1985, Tunney contacted Stolow and the meeting was rescheduled for 13 June 1985. Stolow continued that when he and Rosenthal arrived at the Traveller's Inn on 13 June 1985 only Edward Kelly appeared for the Respondent, and Kelly advised them that Tunney was no longer the Respondent's attorney and that Kelly "couldn't meet with us or sign anything without an attorney." Rosenthal then told Kelly that the Union would wait 2 weeks for Kelly to obtain a new attorney and "then get back to Mr. Kelly to see where we go from here."[23]

Tunney testified that on receipt of Stolow's draft bargaining contract in "April of '85," he reviewed the document "page by page, line by line," comparing its provisions with "my notes, the master agreement, whatever else," and "marked up (the agreement) in great detail as to any terms that were incorrect or that I didn't like or question marks or whatever else," and that these notations were substantial. Tunney related that some of the contract language did not reflect what had been agreed to on particular issues, and that other provisions included had never been discussed or agreed to at all and had "no place in this document in terms of our agreement." He testified:

> Some items in here were hold, meaning the parties have never concluded negotiations. Some items that are in here, the parties explicitly had agreement to delete and they're back in here. It's a whole spectrum of reasons why many parts of this document are not in fact the agreement arrived at . . . between the parties in November of '82. . . . We're talking of a document that finally arrives two and a half years later. I frankly wouldn't know what to do with some of the terms that are now in the agreement.[24]

[21] Stolow testified:

> I thought I understood what had been agreed to and that I would then draft using language from the industry-wide agreement to the extent that either it had been agreed to or just as a practical matter where there had been no specific language referred to but some concept agreed to make it look like a taxi industry contract and I would get that draft to Mr. Tunney and Mr. Rosenthal.

[22] These changes involved jury duty pay and the address of the credit union.

[24] Regarding the proposed draft agreement sent to him by the Union in April 1985, Tunney testified that: the recognition and union-security clauses were accurate; while there was agreement on a bulletin board provision, this was not accurately reflected in the proposed contract; the "cooperation" section does not conform to what was agreed to; the commission and surcharge provision needs clarification regarding the 25-cent noncommissionable amount to the employer; art. 7, sec. 2(B),VI is not applicable to tile Respondent's operation; the vacation clause was accurate; the jury duty clause was amended by the Union by letter dated 22 April 1985 (Tunney could not recall what the agreement on jury duty pay was); the bereavement clause was accurate; the leave of absence clause was correct except for some minor additions or amendments; the breakdown pay amounts in art. 12 of the proposed contract were incorrect as to what was agreed to; Tunney could not recall if the call-in pay provision accurately reflects what was agreed to although the parties had agreed "to something"; there was agreement on the seniority clause, but

Tunney related that he sent a copy of the draft agreement with his notations thereon to Edward Kelly. By letter dated 21 May 1985 Tunney acknowledged receipt of the draft agreement from Stolow and advised Stolow that he would meet with Kelly and then contact Stolow. Subsequently Tunney met with Kelly to discuss the proposed agreement and at this meeting he advised Kelly that he was leaving "Putney, Twombly" and taking a position with the New York City Transit Authority. Tunney stated that he and Kelly "were going to set up another meeting with the union to talk about this draft, but shortly after that, everything fell into place, I was leaving the firm . . . [Kelly] discharged the firm or retained other counsel." Thereafter a meeting was arranged between the parties for 13 June 1985 to be held at the Traveller's Inn. Tunney began his employment with the New York City Transit Authority on 17 June 1985.[25]

> there were some points that were the same points we had discussed in negotiations but there were some very very critical points that we had discussed and I had taken a negative view on that I did not want in there that were in there and I couldn't believe that they would be in there so it didn't really resemble any kind of document that I was going to sign.[26]

Kelly denied that agreement had been reached between the Respondent and the Union on work shift schedules, regarding the effective date of the agreement, jury duty pay, and health and welfare benefits for dependents of employees. He stated that the terms of a bargaining agreement negotiated back in 1982 would not all be acceptable in 1984 or 1985 because of "certain changes within my industry and certain economic changes within the country," i.e., a 3-year contract term. He added that the Union's proposed agreement was, "not the agreement that I felt in substance that I had agreed to in '82."

Rosenthal testified that on 18 June 1985, in the late morning, he, the Union's president, Goldberg, and Union Business Agent Chyla appeared at the Respondent's place of business and spoke to the Respondent's employees who were "on line waiting for fares at the railroad station." According to Rosenthal, Kelly came out of his office, refused to discuss his efforts regarding a new attorney or to speak to the union officials at all, and then returned to his office. Rosenthal stated that after they spoke to "five or six drivers" and distributed some union leaflets, the union officials left the premises. Rosenthal related that on 27 June 1985, the same union officials returned to the Respondent's business location and again spoke to the drivers present. This time, Forame appeared from out of the office, demanded that they discontinue talking to the employees and leave the premises, threatened to run them down with his automobile when they refused to do so because they were on a public street, and called the police. Rosenthal continued that after the police arrived, a compromise was worked out regarding where the union officials could locate themselves regarding speaking with the employees. He added that after the union officials broke for lunch and returned, apparently Forame had directed all drivers to leave the area so that the Union could not communicate with them. The Union then filed a charge with the Forame in the instant case alleging unfair labor practices on the Respondent's part.[27]

Moreover, Kelly testified that of approximately 20 to 27 employees who had voted in the Board's election back in 1981 only 3 employees remained employed in 1986; William Butler, Charles Walters, and Benjamin Carpino.[28] Kelly stated that since the election in 1981 and until the Respondent had received a copy of the draft bargaining agreement from the Union, in 1985 there had been an employee turnover rate of "over 500 percent." He acknowledged, however, that such a high turnover of employees was "characteristic of the industry in general" since most people "don't want to drive a taxi for the rest of their life."

Additionally, Kelly testified that "in the course of events after, lets say 1982," a majority of the Respondent's employees had indicated that they did not support the Union. He stated:

> My office is a small office and all employees sometime in the course of the day see me and speak to me and in that long span of time, numerous occasions, drivers would come and speak to me about, you know, whatever happened to the union? . . . Because there are so many people that are working for me that have no idea that a union election was held in '81 and what the results of those elections would have brought. They just had no idea that there was—as far as they were concerned, there was no union in my office. . . . I see every employee . . . . And on numerous occasions, someone would bring up a union non-related to 3036 and someone would get on the topic of the three members—three people still working for me that were

Tunney thought that there were some amendments needed in the language of the draft agreement; art. 15, p. 23—"Safety and Sanitary Conditions"—Tunney acknowledged agreement to sec. 1, could not recall if there was agreement to sec. 2-7, and denied there was agreement on sec. 8 (floor-to-ceiling bullet resistent partitions in cars); there was agreement on radio charges, carwash charges, and gasoline charges although Tunney could not recall "which way it went" on some of these. Moreover, Tunney stated that the credit union provision in the proposed contract was never agreed to; the proposed contract included health and welfare coverage for employee's dependents, which was never agreed to; and a provision to supply an electric dryer for the employees' use, which was never agreed to.

[25] Tunney acknowledged that he had never apprised Stolow or the Union of the possibility that he might not be representing the Respondent regarding these negotiations in the near future.

[26] Kelly testified that he had not compared the draft agreement with the notes he made at the negotiating sessions when he made this assessment of the contract.

[27] By letter dated 1 July 1985 the Union advised the employees of this incident of some of the bargaining agreement terms and of the charge filed with the Board in this case. Additional letters were sent to the employees on 18 December 1985 and 26 February 1986 regarding the status of the case.

[28] Kelly also testified that as of 1984, "four or five" of the employees who had participated in the Board's election in 1981 were still in the Respondent's employ.

> on the Excelsior list, something—some joke would be brought up about the taxi union or whatever, about them not being there. So I know that when someone would say "What union, what are you talking about?" that they knew nothing of a union being in my office.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The 10(b) period

Section 10(b) of the Act provides "That no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made . . . ." Section 10(b) is a statute of limitations and is not jurisdictional in nature. It is an affirmative defense that must be pleaded and, if not timely raised, is waived.[29] The Respondent has timely raised such a defense contending in its brief:

> In November, 1982, the parties scheduled a negotiating session wherein many of the parties' concerns seemed largely resolved. . . . Rosenthal promised to provide a draft agreement to Kelly's. He never did so. . . . In calendar 1983, the parties had no further negotiating sessions whatsoever. The union and its attorneys absolutely failed to forward a draft agreement at any time in 1983. . . . In January, 1984, the union apparently asked for a meeting in Stuart Bochner's office to review what had been discussed in November, 1982, some fourteen (14) months earlier. . . . Utilizing either one of the two pivotal dates, the unfair labor practice complaint must be dismissed as time-barred under the six month limitations period congressionally imposed under the Act. . . . Even assuming arguendo that this later point is utilized as a predicate, the union's failure to proffer a writing embodying a collective bargaining agreement until some fifteen (15) months later in April, 1985 further depicts that the union's claims are time-barred under the Act.

I do not agree.

In Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960), the Supreme Court of the United States held that when occurrences within the 6-month limitations period in and of themselves may constitute, as a substantive matter, unfair labor practices, earlier events may be utilized to shed light on the true character of matters occurring within the limitations period.[30] The Supreme Court further held at 417 and 422:

> [W]here conduct occurring within the limitations period can be charged to be an unfair labor practice only through reliance on an earlier unfair labor practice . . . the use of the earlier unfair labor practice is not merely "evidentiary," since it does not simply lay bare a putative current unfair labor practice. Rather, it serves to cloak with illegality that which was otherwise lawful. And where a complaint based upon that earlier event is time-barred, to permit the event itself to be used in effect results in reviving a legally defunct unfair labor practice. . . .
> [A] finding of violation which is inescapable grounded on events predating the limitations period is directly at odds with the purposes of the Section 10(b) proviso.[31]

The Union's charge in this case, filed with the Board on 2 July 1985, alleges that since on or about 17 April 1985, the Respondent has unlawfully "refused to bargain collectively with the certified representative of its employees by":

> [F]ailing and refusing to bargain in good faith over the terms and conditions of employment of employees; by failing and refusing to bargain in good faith over the language to be included in a written contract setting forth agreements previously reached between the parties and by failing and refusing to execute such a written contract.

Since the Union's unfair labor practice charge allegations are based on events which occurred subsequent to its forwarding a copy of a draft collective-bargaining agreement to the Respondent on 17 April 1985, albeit events arising prior thereto were used "to shed light on the true character of matters occurring within the limitations period,"[32] the charge was timely filed.[33] When an employer's obligation to bargain arose before the 10(b) period, but the refusal to bargain occurred during the 10(b) period, a complaint is not time barred.

Also, both the courts and the Board have held that the 6-month limitations period does not begin to run until the aggrieved party has received actual or constructive notice of the conduct constituting the alleged unfair labor practice.[34] Moreover, as the Board stated in Strick Corp., 241 NLRB 210 fn. 1 (1979), "[N]otice, whether actual or constructive, must be clear and unequivocal, and that the burden of showing such notice is on the party raising the affirmative defense of Sec. 10(b)." Given the facts of this case, especially because of the Respondent's continued willingness to meet with the Union and to accept and to review a proposed collective-bargaining agreement until the events of 13 June 1985 and thereafter, despite the substantial passage of time since the date of the Union's certification, it would be unreasonable to assume, nor has the Respondent shown, that the Union knew or could have known of the Respondent's refusal to bargain.[35] The allegations in the complaint are not barred by Section 10(b) for this additional reason.[36]

[30] The Supreme Court stated, supra at 416, "[F]or that purpose Section 10(b) ordinarily does not bar such evidentiary use of anterior events."

[31] The Supreme Court noted in Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, supra at 419, that the policies underlying Sec. 10(b) "are to bar litigation over past events 'after records have been destroyed, witnesses have gone elsewhere, and recollections of the events in question have become dim and confused,' and of course to stabilize existing bargaining relationships."

Because of all the above, I find and conclude that the Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of showing that Section 10(b) bars consideration of the charges alleging unlawful conduct on its part and, therefore, I deny the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint as being time barred under the Act.

2. Res judicata

The Respondent asserts in its brief that:

> In the summer of 1984, Local 3036 initially filed a Section 8(a)(5) charge against Kelly's alleging the failure to bargain in good faith by reason of Kelly's failure to execute a collective bargaining agreement with the union. The union's filing of the unfair labor practice charge occurred subsequent to both the November, 1982 negotiation and the January, 1984 meeting with Brian Tunney which had been conducted in Stuart Bochner's office. Regional Director Kaynard investigated the charge and found no reason to believe that the Act had been violated. The Regional Director's finding was sustained on appeal. It is clear then that whether the predicate date is November, 1982 (the final negotiating session) or January, 1984 (the date of the meeting in Mr. Bochner's office) the instant Section 8(a)(5) charge is merely a regurgitation of the 1984 charge and is either time-barred under section 10(b) of the Act or is controlled by the Regional Director's determination in 1984 not to issue a complaint.

Res judicata is defined as a

> [r]ule that a final judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction on the merits is conclusive as to the rights of the parties and their privies, and, as to them, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action involving the same claim, demand or cause of action.[38]

It is well settled that the dismissal of a prior charge by a Regional Director, even where the identical conduct is involved, does not constitute an adjudication on the merits, and no res judicata effect can be given to these actions.[39] Moreover, it should be noted that the Union's previous charge in Case 29–CA–11312 filed on 17 July 1984 alleged a refusal to bargain because the Respondent "among other things it has refused to sign a collective bargaining agreement containing provisions previously agreed upon." The Regional Director refused to issue a complaint on this charge because the Union had failed to send a draft of an agreement to the Respondent for its approval and signature, although obligated to do so. The Union's charge in the instant case alleges a refusal to bargain by the Respondent, "by failing and refusing to bargain in good faith over the language to be included in a written contract setting forth agreements previously reached between the parties and by failing and refusing to execute such a written contract." This later charge was filed with the Board on 2 July 1985 after a copy of a draft agreement had been sent to the Respondent in April 1985, and the refusal to execute the contract occurred thereafter, in June 1985.

Accordingly, from all the above I find and conclude that the Regional Director's prior dismissal of the charge and refusal to issue a complaint does not mandate dismissal of the complaint.

3. The Respondent's refusal to sign an alleged agreed on collective-bargaining agreement

As set forth in Fred Tuch Buick, 199 NLRB 876, 880 (1972):

> Section 8(d) of the Act includes among the elements of good-faith bargaining required of representatives of parties to negotiations "the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by any party." In contemplation of this statutory mandate the refusal to incorporate into a written agreement the terms of a bargain orally reached has consistently been prescribed by the Board[9] and the courts.[10]

Further, it is well settled that a collective-bargaining agreement arises only after a meeting of the minds on all material terms of the contract.[40] That the parties plan later to sign an agreement does not preclude prior formation of the contract by signifying assent to an unsigned paper; the issue is one of intention.[41] The burden of proof on the issue of whether the requisite "meeting of the minds" occurred is on the General Counsel.[42]

Additionally, as the Ninth Circuit stated in NLRB v. Donkin's Inn, 532 F.2d 138, 141 (9th Cir. 1976):

> In the context of labor disputes, and particularly section 8(a)(5) violations, however, the technical question of whether a contract was accepted in the traditional sense is perhaps less vital then it otherwise would be. Rather, a more crucial inquiry is whether the two sides have reached an "agreement" even though that "agreement" might fall short of the technical requirements of an accepted contract.[43]

The parties all agree that the Respondent is obligated to execute the draft of a collective-bargaining contract that correctly reflects the agreed-on terms, if complete agreement in fact had been reached, and that the Respondent would have violated the Act by not doing so. The General Counsel and the Union both contend that an agreement was reached. The Respondent argues that full agreement regarding all the terms of a bargaining contract was never reached. The record evidence clearly shows that the Respondent and the Union reached agreement on a substantial number of bargaining contract terms, apparently extensive enough so that the parties believed that a written draft of a collective-bargaining agreement could be prepared by the Union. In April 1985 the Union sent a draft bargaining agreement to the Respondent for review and consideration. In support of its contention that the parties never reached full agreement, the Respondent argues that the "many inaccuracies" contained in the agreement demonstrate that "no meeting of the minds on all substantive issues" ever occurred.

Generally, inadvertent errors contained in a written contract do not indicate lack of agreement between the parties and the need for minor alterations and language changes in the agreement does not relieve the parties of the obligation to execute the contract agreed to, particularly when the other party indicates a willingness to make such alterations.[44] That errors existed in the Union's draft bargaining agreement is conceded by the Union, i.e., the Union's brief states:

> While errors did exist the Union's representative had at all times expressed a willingness to sit down and correct these errors. In fact, the Union's attorney conceded that errors were likely given his lack of familiarity with the bargaining history.

In reviewing and considering the behavior of the parties during the negotiations, the record evidence, the Union's draft collective-bargaining agreement, and the arguments of the parties, I do not believe that the General Counsel has sustained her burden of proof in showing that the parties reached full agreement on a bargaining contract. Applicable to the circumstances present in the instant case is the Board's holding in Luther Manor Nursing Home, 270 NLRB 949 fn. 1 (1984), affd. sub nom. Food & Commercial Workers Local 304A v. NLRB, 772 F.2d 421 (8th Cir. 1985):

> As we indicated in Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908 (1981), 696 F.2d 931 (11th Cir. 1983), the duty to bargain includes the obligation to assist in reducing an oral agreement to writing. That obligation, however, arises only after a meeting of the minds on all substantive issues has occurred. Here, the parties' disagreement transcended a dispute as to contract language, and involved a disagreement over the substance of certain contract terms. Thus, the requisite meeting of the minds as to all substantive matters did not occur.[45]

In the instant case the Respondent asserts that

> [T]here were dozens of terms and provisions in this agreement that were never agreed to by the parties. There were terms in the 1985 draft that were neither discussed at all or ever agreed to. . . . The proposed Taxi and Limousine Commission language did not apply to Kelly's operations and had not been discussed.

Although some of these assertions are not substantiated by the evidence here,[46] others are. The Respondent more particularly alleges that the Union's draft agreement provided for health plan coverage for employee's eligible dependents, a credit union, and safety floor-to-ceiling bullet resistant partitions in the Respondent's vehicles, all of which the Respondent never agreed to. This assertion has merit.

In this regard, the Respondent's witnesses, Brian Tunney and Edward Kelly, testified that these contract provisions had either been discussed by the parties and placed on "hold" for final resolution during the parties review of the draft agreement, or had never been discussed and agreed to by the parties at all during the negotiations. The General Counsel's witnesses, Michael Rosenthal and Stuart Bochner, testified that all the items in the draft agreement had been resolved by either the Union's acceptance of the Respondent's proposals there or by "trade-offs" between the various proposals.

[46] For example, the Respondent alleged that agreement between the parties had never been reached on driver's work schedules, radio charges, and jury duty pay. Tunney, the Respondent's own witness, however, acknowledged such agreement although he also indicated that "there was some language to be worked out," and that the draft agreement did not always reflect accurately what the agreement on that item was. The Respondent also alleged that:

> The April, 1985 draft unilaterally proposed a three (3) year term commencing on June 1, 1985 and terminating on May 31, 1988. The agreement's effective dates were never discussed in 1982 nor would Kelly's have agreed to a three (3) year agreement in April 1985.

The parties had agreed on a 3-year term for the bargaining agreement and had left the start and end dates open. Neither the Union nor the Respondent had insisted on these dates as being important or crucial to the negotiations. It appears that Stolow's inclusion of those particular dates were merely for the reason that they coincided with a time period within which the draft agreement was completed and mailed to the Respondent and within which the Union believed the agreement could be reviewed, discussed, and executed. Moreover, the fact that the substitution of the dates anticipated by the Respondent (November 1982 or January 1984) would have meant that most of the contract's term had elapsed, it still would not have alleviated the parties' obligations to sign the agreement if such obligation existed. Operating Engineers, Local 30 & 30A (Hyatt Management), 280 NLRB 205 (1986).

In resolving this issue, first I have carefully considered the record evidence and, basing my findings on my observations of the witnesses, the weight of the respective evidence, established and admitted facts, inherent probabilities, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from the record as a whole, I credit Tunney's testimony.[47] Tunney testified in a forthright manner[48] and, most importantly, his testimony was consistent with other evidence in the record and therefore believable. Moreover, at the time he testified as a witness in this proceeding, Tunney was no longer employed by the law firm that had represented the Respondent during its negotiations with the Union, having left that law firm over a year before, and he would, therefore, have no biased interest in the outcome of this case.[49] This is not to say that I disbelieved all the testimony given by Rosenthal and Bochner in this proceeding. In truth, I believed much of what they said except, as in this instance, when it conflicted with the testimony given by Tunney.[50]

Although I was not unimpressed by their general demeanor as witnesses, yet I found Rosenthal's testimony at times to be guarded, defensive, and evasive on cross-examination and on occasion not entirely plausible, i.e., Rosenthal's testimony regarding the circumstances surrounding Bochner's alleged preparation of a draft bargaining agreement back in 1984 and Rosenthal's seeming indifference to his own lack of awareness thereof, and whether Bochner actually did send a copy of a draft agreement to the Respondent and the reason for his failure to do so. Bochner's testimony regarding his inability to explain what happened to the draft agreement he allegedly prepared and why another draft agreement was not completed and sent to the Respondent did not ring true; nor was his testimony believable that after preparing the draft agreement he then decided not to send a copy to the Respondent because it was the usual procedure in contract negotiations for the Respondent's attorney to prepare the draft, especially in light of the fact that the Union had twice agreed to prepare the draft agreement, once by Rosenthal in November 1982 and thereafter by Bochner himself, in January 1984, and he never conveyed his change of mind to Tunney so that Tunney might draft an agreement on the Respondent's behalf, or apparently to Rosenthal, his own client.[51]

Second, other evidence in the record supports the Respondent's assertion that there was "no meeting of the minds on all substantive issues" of a collective-bargaining agreement. The documents in evidence that Stolow used to prepare the Union's draft agreement sent to the Respondent in April 1985 are significant in this regard. The Union's "marked copy" of the collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade, Inc. (master contract), used as a guideline by the parties during the negotiations and reviewed at the 16 January 1984 meeting, shows that the provisions there entitled "Health and Welfare," "Credit Union," and "Safety and Sanitary Conditions," where section 12 provides for a "floor-to-ceiling bullet resistant partition" in vehicles, were all designated as "hold" items, and this designation was never changed. Moreover, Bochner's notes of the 16 January 1984 meeting, in which it is alleged that the parties reached full agreement on all the terms of a bargaining contract, is silent regarding any agreement reached on the credit union or safety partitions in the Respondent's vehicles, and while indicating that "Full Hospitalization" was agreed to does not show whether this provision includes employee's dependents in the coverage.[52] Bochner's notes do reflect agreement on other substantial contract items such as driver commission rates; the noncommissionable charge; no radio or carwash charges; breakdown, call-in, and jury duty pay; vacations; arbitration; a 3-year contract term; union security; and driver shift schedules.

Additionally, when Rosenthal and Bochner were asked both on direct and cross-examination to set forth the various items that had been agreed to by the parties during the negotiations, they never once mentioned dependent coverage under the hospitalization and medical plan, although they referred to the health benefit provision and the safety partition provision, and only Rosenthal mentioned agreement on the credit union. Even after Tunney had testified that no agreement had been reached between the parties on these particular provisions, the General Counsel and the Union continued to rely on the general testimony of Rosenthal and Bochner that all terms of the draft agreement had been resolved. Also, admittedly, the draft agreement contained errors both in language and content. In fact, the Union on its own, amended the draft agreement by letter dated 22 April 1985.

As the Board held in Automatic Plastic Molding Co., 234 NLRB 681 (1978):

> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that the contract submitted by Martin to Bonnheim

[48] Although on occasion Tunney could not recall whether a particular provision of the draft bargaining agreement language-wise reflected accurately what the parties had agreed to, to whether full agreement had been reached on a particular provision, it was obvious that his inability to remember the details was due solely to the long passage of time since the events occurred, rather than a deliberate attempt to hide information for an ulterior purpose or in favor of a party. Additionally, at times his answers seemed to reflect a refreshing candor, because they could be construed as being helpful or harmful, alternately, to either side in this proceeding.

[49] It should also be remembered that Tunney had not volunteered his testimony; he was a subpoenaed witness, albeit for the Respondent.

[50] As Judge Learned Hand stated in NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749, 754 (2d Cir. 1950): "It is no reason for refusing to accept everything that a witness says, because you do not believe all of it; nothing is more common in all kinds of judicial decisions than to believe some and not all."

[51] I am not unaware that prior to his testifying in this matter, Bochner also had left the law firm that represented the Union during the negotiations and currently in this proceeding, and in which he was a partner, as regards his disinterest as a witness. For the reasons stated above, however, I still credit Tunney's testimony over his. Moreover, concerning Edward Kelly, I found his testimony to be less reliable on the whole than the other witnesses who testified. For example, he testified, in substance, that there was very little agreed to between the parties during the negotiations. This is contrary to the weight of the credible evidence in the record and conflicts with the testimony of the Respondent's other witness, Tunney.

> for signature contained discrepancies. Thus, as set out by the Administrative Law Judge, Martin had added to Respondent's seniority proposal language which seriously altered its meaning. In addition there was a minor discrepancy in the sick leave language and a possible discrepancy in the shift starting time provision. The contract submitted by Martin contained a health and welfare proposal which reads in its entirety, "The Company shall provide each eligible employee coverage for health and welfare at a cost of $30.00 per month to the Employer." Respondent however had not proposed to provide such coverage but one to check with its insurance carrier to see what coverage could be provided at that cost.
> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that because of these discrepancies Respondent was not obligated to execute the document submitted by Martin. The issue here, however, is not whether the document submitted by Martin contained discrepancies but whether, in fact, an oral understanding was reached. . . . we find that no such agreement was reached. . . . Although which employees would be eligible under the Respondent's proposal could be inferred from the Union's proposal, other aspects could not be so inferred because of the differences in costs. Accordingly, we find that no understanding had been reached on health and welfare benefits.
> Health and Welfare benefits constituted a substantial and significant part of the proposed contract. . . . As there was no agreement with respect to a substantial provision of the proposed contract, we find that there was no orally agreed-upon collective-bargaining contract.

Because of all the above and applying the above law to the facts in this case, I find and conclude that there was no orally agreed-on collective-bargaining contract because the requisite meeting of the minds regarding all substantive matters did not occur.[53] Accordingly, the Respondent was not obligated to execute a collective-bargaining agreement, and when it refused to sign the Union's draft agreement, the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Therefore, I will recommend the dismissal of that part of the complaint applicable there.

4. The withdrawal of recognition

The Board's principles concerning an employer's burden of rebutting an incumbent union's presumption of majority status are well settled. A certified union, on expiration of the first year following certification, enjoys a rebuttable presumption that its majority representative status continues. An employer may rebut the presumption by demonstrating either that the union in fact no longer enjoyed majority status, or that its refusal to bargain is predicated on a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt of the Union's majority status.[54] Further, in order to sustain the second of these defenses, the employer must show that its asserted doubt is based on objective considerations and that it was not advanced for the purpose of gaining time in which to undermine the union.[55] Any doubt as to the continuing majority status must rest on a reasonable basis and may not depend on unfounded speculation or a subjective state of mind.[56] The Board's decisions, however, do not require an employer to meet a stringent "clear, cogent, and convincing" standard[57] in order to rebut the presumption of a union's majority status.[58]

Moreover, as the Board in Sofco, Inc., 268 NLRB 159 (1983), citing Celanese Corp., 95 NLRB 664 (1951), stated:

> By its very nature, the issue of whether an employer has questioned a union's majority in good faith cannot be resolved by resort to any simple formula. It can only be answered in the light of the totality of all the circumstances involved in a particular case.
> Thus, even when a particular factor considered alone would be insufficient to support a good faith doubt of a union's majority status, the "cumlative force of the combination of factors" may be adequate to support such a doubt.[6] In this regard, we note that a respondent does not bear the burden of proving that an actual numerical majority opposes

NFL Football League Player's Assn.*, supra. Moreover, I do not find the cases cited by the General Counsel and the Union to be persuasive in this matter. For example, in Fashion Furniture Mfg. supra, the Board held that an employer's refusal to execute a written agreement submitted by a union, which admittedly contained inadvertent errors, was unlawful when the refusal to sign the agreement did not hinge either on the inadvertent errors in the written agreement or a purported condition precedent, but rather on the Union's denial of an additional and belated demand for concessions in the agreement by the Respondent, especially because of the Union's willingness to correct such inadvertent errors in the agreement. In Ace Machine Co., supra, the Board affirmed an administrative law judge's finding that two inadvertent errors in a proposed bargaining agreement submitted to an employer does not excuse a complete refusal to execute the agreement previously reached when the errors could be easily corrected and were admittedly not fatal to the entire agreement, nor did the employer assert that these errors were the cause of the rejection of the agreement.

In Georgia Kraft, supra, the Board found that the parties had made specific proposals on all the outstanding contractual issues and that these proposals were still viable and available for acceptance when the union agreed to accept the employee's proposals. The Board also rejected the employer's argument that resolution of the contractual issues was also made contingent on the resolution of strike-related issues.

In Charles Sportswear Mfg. Co., 231 NLRB 797 (1977), the Board found that complete agreement on the terms of a bargaining contract had been reached by the parties, and that the employer had engaged in a protected period of bad-faith bargaining during the negotiations.

It is clear that these cases are all distinguishable in light of the difference in the circumstances present in the instant case.

Additionally, the Respondent must raise such doubt in a context free of unfair labor practices.[60]

The Respondent contends that its refusal to continue to recognize the Union as the bargaining representative of its employees in an appropriate unit was not in violation of the Act because the Union in fact did not represent a majority of the Respondent's employees at the time it withdrew recognition and/or that the Respondent had a good-faith doubt as to the Union's majority status based on objective considerations. Both the General Counsel and the Union contend that the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition of the Union was unlawful and violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Respondent asserts that substantial employee turnover, a lack of awareness by employees of the Board election, or that the Union represented them for purposes of collective bargaining, the Union's failure to forward a draft of a proposed agreement from November 1982 until April 1985 2-1/2 years later, and the Union's "total inactivity and abandonment" of the employees, constitute "unusual circumstances" that relieved the Respondent of "any further obligation to bargain with Local 3036 in 1984, 1985, or 1986," and provides "evidence of a sufficient objective basis for reasonably doubting the majority status of Local 3036 years after the certification year had long since expired." I do not agree.

The Respondent states in its brief:

> [B]y 1984–1986 Kelly's had experienced several distinctive layers of employee turnover. . . . [S]ince the January, 1981 election in which Local 3036 had prevailed by a 15–14 vote, Kelly's experienced a 500% rate of employee turnover with only three (3) eligible voters still in its employ in [1985].

That the Respondent experienced a 500 percent rate of turnover during the period 1981–1985, and that its work force at the time of the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union was completely different except for three employees, is not contested in the record. However, while both the Board and the courts have found employee turnover to be a factor in determining the existence of objective considerations sufficient to justify a withdrawal of recognition, the Board has ruled, with court approval, that turnover among employees cannot, by itself, be used as a basis for belief that a union has lost majority support since it is presumed that, absent evidence that would justify a contrary conclusion, new employees will support the union in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced.[61] Moreover, this is particularly true when high turnover is prevalent in the industry involved.[62]

The next "privotal" factor listed in the Respondent's brief is

> The Kelly's employees have neither indicated to management they are aware of a 1981 Board election or that Local 3036 represents them. They indicated instead, just the reverse.

The Respondent maintains that this indicates a lack of support of the Union by its employees and evidences the Union's "total inactivity and abandonment, by 1984, virtually of the Kelly's drivers." In this regard, testimony was adduced from the Respondent's owner and manager Edward Kelly to the effect that he believes a majority of the Respondent's employees no longer support the Union because on "numerous occasions," drivers asked him, "[W]hatever happened to the Union?" Kelly stated that there were "so many" employees who were unaware that the Union had won a Board election in 1981 that "as far as they were concerned, there was no union in my office." Kelly also testified that on "numerous occasions" employees would "bring up a union non-related to 3036," and that employees "joked" about the Union "not being there." Kelly added that when this occurred, other employees would ask, "What Union are you talking about?", and he therefore knew that these employees "knew nothing of a union being in my office."

While it is true that the Board has held that expressions of antiunion sentiment can constitute sufficient objective evidence to support a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt of a union's continued majority status,[63] the Board has also held that such statements must convey a clear intention by the employees not to be represented by the Union.[64] Clearly, the above statements would not constitute expressions of employee rejection of the Union as their bargaining agent. Additionally, Kelly's testimony about the various employee statements made directly to, or overheard by, him was in large measure speculative, conjectural, and vague, and lacking in specificity regarding the identity of these employees and as to the details and dates of the conversations or occurrences.[65] Moreover, much of Kelly's testimony in this connection constituted self-serving, general assertions by an employer that in its opinion the employees did not support the Union.[66] Importantly, the Respondent presented no evidence showing that any employee ever expressed a desire not to be represented by the Union.[67] Therefore, the Respondent has presented no adequate evidence to establish that a majority of its employees rejected the Union as their bargaining representative at any time relevant.

[59] Generally, several indicia of loss of majority support are required, and no one factor (e.g., high employer turnover or union dormancy) is determinative. Soule Glass & Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir. 1981).

The Respondent also lists as a factor in its brief:

> The union abandoned the drivers and totally failed to properly pursue the interests of the drivers by failing to forward to Kelly's a draft agreement for two and one half (2-1/2) years from November, 1982 until April, 1985.
> Closely aligned with the preceding point is the notion that under Board law, Local 3036 abandoned any representative interest that it may have had during its certification year in later years by reason of its laches, its failure to represent the drivers and the 500% employee turnover experienced at Kelly's.

The Respondent has sought to characterize the passage of time in this case as a waiver by the Union of its right to bargain, thereby allowing the Respondent to lawfully withdraw its recognition of the Union. Such a waiver, however, may only be proven by a clear and unequivocal evidencing of such intent by a labor organization.[68] Additionally, although the Board has recognized this criterion as one that may help to establish a good-faith doubt of the majority status of a labor organization,[69] the mere passage of time, by itself, does not constitute such proof of waiver, nor is it considered to be sufficient evidence of a dissipation of majority status.[70] The Act does not impose any time limit on good-faith bargaining.[71]

In the instant case the record evidence shows that after the Union's certification as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit on 5 February 1982, the Respondent and the Union held six or seven negotiating sessions from 26 April 1982, through 3 November 1982. At the close of the last meeting, the Respondent requested and the Union agreed to prepare a proposed draft collective-bargaining agreement to be sent to the Respondent for review. However, due to the Union's concentrating all its efforts into the renegotiation of its expiring master contract with the Metropolitan Taxicab Board of Trade affecting the Union's entire membership except for the Respondent's employees, and solving its internal union election problems, no further negotiation meetings were held between the parties at the end of 1982 or during the entire year of 1983 nor was a draft of a proposed bargaining agreement forwarded to the Respondent during this period.

Rosenthal testified that notwithstanding the Union's preoccupation with the master contract negotiations and internal union election problems, he attempted to contact the Respondent's attorney, Tunney, by telephone between 5 and 10 times January through March 1983, but was unable to do so because Tunney was never available and did not return Rosenthal's calls. Bochner testified that he tried calling Tunney "for a period prior to January 1984" in order to arrange a meeting to finalize the bargaining agreement but was also unsuccessful in doing so. Tunney, on the other hand, testified that after the last negotiation meeting in November 1982, several months passed before the Union contacted him, and then Rosenthal called him two or three times in late 1983 to explain the Union's delay in preparing and forwarding a draft bargaining agreement to the Respondent. Tunney's response each time was to request a copy of the proposed bargaining agreement and Rosenthal promised to "get back to him." Be that as it may,[72] either Bochner or Rosenthal did finally reach Tunney in early January 1984, and Tunney agreed to meet with them regarding the status of the negotiations.

The parties met to discuss negotiations on 16 January 1984. On 5 February 1984, Rosenthal, using the 1981 "Excelsior list" established for the Board's election in that year, notified the Respondent's employees on that list and still working for the Respondent, regarding the progress of the negotiations. By letter dated 8 March 1984 Bochner notified Tunney that the draft agreement was completed and requested a meeting between the parties to review the provisions and to have it signed. Tunney never sent a reply to Bochner's letter, and when Bochner attempted to contact Tunney by telephone, he was advised that Tunney was ill. Rosenthal now testified that from March through June 1984, he unsuccessfully attempted to reach Tunney by telephoning his office between 10 and 20 times, and Tunney never returned his calls although Rosenthal left messages for him to do so. By letter dated 12 June 1984 Rosenthal notified the Respondent that the draft bargaining agreement was ready and that, since the Union was experiencing severe difficulties in reaching Tunney, if the Respondent failed to contact the Union within 10 days to arrange a meeting to review the agreement, the Union would "refer the matter to the National Labor Relations Board." Not hearing from the Respondent, Rosenthal called Kelly on 27 June and was advised that Tunney had left "Putney Twombly" and the Respondent was seeking new legal counsel, whereupon Rosenthal told Kelly that if the negotiations were not "resolved very soon" the Union would file a charge with the Board.

[72] I credit the testimony of Rosenthal and Bochner regarding their unsuccessful attempts to reach Tunney in 1983. The record indicates that Tunney was, in fact, difficult to reach at the Putney, Twombly law firm, perhaps because of his changing relationship with his employer. Rosenthal, Bochner, and Stolow all testified regarding their difficulty in reaching Tunney, and Tunney's failure to return their calls, and for that matter so did the Respondent's witness Kelly, and Tunney's testimony did not, in substance, contradict or deny this, nor did Tunney offer any explanation in regard thereto.

On 17 July 1984 the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Respondent with the Board that was subsequently dismissed by the Regional Director for Region 29 on 12 October 1984, as detailed. The Union, using the same listing as used for its prior communication to the Respondent's employees, notified these employees by letter dated 24 July 1984 about the charge being filed and the reason therefor. During the investigation of the pending charge, the Union sent a mailgram to the Respondent dated 14 September 1984 demanding "immediate negotiations to complete the collective bargaining agreement." In response by letter dated 25 September 1984, Tunney requested that the Union send a copy of the proposed draft agreement to him for review. By letter dated 8 October 1984 Rosenthal informed Tunney that Bochner was on vacation and on his return would forward the proposed agreement to him. On Bochner's return, however, the proposed draft agreement that he professed he had completed could not be found in any form and, therefore, nothing was forwarded to the Respondent. On 17 October 1984 the Union notified the same employees it had contacted before about the Region's dismissal of the charge and promised to "explore further action" to compel the Respondent to "live up to the agreement." Again on 20 December 1984 the Union advised these employees that there were "no new developments" in the matter.

After Bochner left the law firm representing the Union on 17 January 1985, the drafting of the proposed bargaining agreement was assigned to another attorney, David Stolow. Stolow related that he attempted to contact Tunney "three or four times" in late January or early February 1985, but was unsuccessful in doing so. Stolow testified uncontradictedly that he was finally able to reach Tunney by telephone in late February 1985, and he advised Tunney that he would prepare the proposed draft bargaining agreement based on Bochner's notes, if that was acceptable with Tunney, and Tunney replied that Stolow should send the proposed agreement to him, when completed, for review with his client. On 17 April 1985 Stolow forwarded a copy of the completed proposed draft bargaining agreement to Tunney. Corrections to the agreement were sent by Stolow to Tunney on 22 April 1985. Failing to hear from Tunney regarding the proposed agreement and being unsuccessful again in contacting Tunney by telephone in late April or early May 1985, Stolow wrote to Tunney on 16 May 1985 requesting a meeting between the parties "to finalize" the collective-bargaining agreement. By letter dated 21 May 1985 Tunney advised Stolow that he had reviewed the agreement and would meet with the Respondent and then contact Stolow "shortly thereafter."

On 3 June 1985 Stolow telephoned Tunney and a meeting between the parties was arranged for 10 June 1985. This was rescheduled the next day by Tunney for 13 June 1985. As described in detail above, the parties met only briefly on 13 June 1985 because the Respondent had discharged "Putney Twombly" as its legal counsel as Tunney had now severed all connection with that law firm, and because Kelly himself had experienced difficulty contacting Tunney directly through that firm. On 18 and 27 June 1985, when union officials appeared at the Respondent's place of business to speak to the Respondent's employees, they were rebuffed by the Respondent's management representatives as set forth above, evidencing a clear intention by the Respondent not to deal with the Union as its employees' bargaining representative.

In applying Board and court law to the facts present in this case, I cannot find nor conclude that the Union "abandoned any representative interest" in the unit employees. Although the Union must accept responsibility for the lack of negotiations during 1983 since it failed to prepare and send a draft bargaining agreement to the Respondent, as agreed on in November 1982, its attempts to contact the Respondent's attorney during this period, while unsuccessful and seemingly tentative, perhaps due to the master contract negotiations and internal union problems, was still some evidence of the Union's interest in negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement as the representative of the Respondent's employees, and the Respondent must be perceived as having recognized this continued interest since it agreed to meet with the Union's representatives on 16 January 1984, without then raising any issue regarding the Union's majority status.

Moreover, the Union's subsequent actions dispel any notion that the Union abandoned its position as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees. Frustrated by being unable to reach the Respondent's attorney and to arrange a meeting between the parties, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board in July 1984. In September 1984, the Respondent requested a copy of the proposed draft collective-bargaining agreement. The Respondent continued to request the draft agreement through March 1985 and did, in fact, review the agreement in April or May 1985. Moreover, the Respondent, notwithstanding the long delay in receiving the proposed draft bargaining agreement, agreed to meet with the Union in June 1985, and at no previous time expressed any doubts about the Union's continued majority status. Additionally, the evidence does indicate that the Union also made attempts to maintain contact with the bargaining unit employees, although some question can be raised about the effectiveness of the steps it took to accomplish this.

In sum, the record evidence indicates that the Union maintained contact with the Respondent, or attempted to do so, and communicated with some bargaining unit employees with varying degrees of success. And although the Respondent may argue that the Union abandoned the employees because it failed to forward a draft of the proposed collective-bargaining agreement until April 1985, this argument becomes untenable when reviewed in light of the circumstances, the willingness of the Respondent to meet with the Union, its continuing requests for the proposed bargaining agreement, and its finally reviewing the agreement and acquiescing to meet with the Union for discussions in June 1985. Moreover, the Respondent's actions cannot reasonably be construed as those of an employer who has a good-faith doubt that a union continues to represent a majority of its employees.

From all the above I find that the Respondent cannot rely on the Union's inactivity to support a reasonably based doubt of continued majority support nor do I find that the facts support the conclusion that the Union abandoned its representative interest in the unit employees.[73]

Last, the Respondent asserts in its brief

> Moreover, for Kellys to continue to recognize and negotiate with a union which no longer represented an uncoerced majority of its employees would have represented a violation by Kellys of Section 8(a)(2) of the Act.

Because of my above findings, I conclude that this assertion has no merit.

In consideration of all the foregoing[74] I find and conclude that the Respondent has totally failed to affirmatively establish either that the Union actually lost its majority status, or that its alleged good-faith doubt was based on objective considerations and, therefore, when the Respondent withdrew its recognition of the Union, this constituted an unlawful failure and refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section IV, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

VI. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as the bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and to post appropriate notices.

Additionally, the General Counsel requests in her brief that [73] Lockheed Engineering Co., supra (the union's certification was over 7-1/2 years old, no collective-bargaining agreement had been signed, and there had been no bargaining between the parties for over a year); Club Cal-Neva, supra; Pioneer Inn, 228 NLRB 1263 (1977); Long Island College Hospital, supra; NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., supra.

Additionally the cases cited by the Respondent in support of its above contentions are clearly distinguishable. In Whisper Soft Mills v. NLRB, supra, the court held that although the presumption that new employees will support the union in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced, this presumption does not extend to strikers, as were involved in that case. Moreover, the Union throughout the strike demanded that the employer reinstate all the strikers, which would result in a loss of employment for a majority of the new employees. Thus it could not be presumed that these employees would support the union in any ratio, and turnover of employees became a significant factor. These circumstances are not present in the instant case. In Pipe Line Development Co., 272 NLRB 48 (1984), the Board held that the employer's receipt of a petition signed by a majority of unit employees, following expiration of the extended certification year, provided the objective consideration necessary to support a good-faith doubt of the union's majority status. There was no employee petition signed by a majority of the unit employees present in the instant case.

In U-Save Food Warehouse, 271 NLRB 710 (1984), the Board found that management's uncontradicted testimony regarding specifically identified employees disclosed unambiguous statements made at sufficiently identified prerecognition withdrawal periods of time, constituted highly probative evidence, and, along with the inactivity of the union, was sufficient evidence to rebut the resumption that new employees will support the union in the same ratio as those whom they replace. As indicated, in the instant case the evidence adduced by the Respondent in this regard was nonspecific regarding the identity of employees who made such statements and when and where they were made; and, importantly, the statements did not convey a clear intention by the employees not to be represented by the Union.

In Industrial Waste Service, 268 NLRB 1180 (1984), the employer received a petition signed by a majority of the employees stating, "We don't want the Union." This was sufficient to give the employer a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, again unlike the facts in the instant case. In Arkay Packaging Corp., 227 NLRB 397 (1976), the Board found that the employer had a reasonably based doubt of the union's majority status because the employer's communications to the unions involved advised that strikers, who were union members, were going to be replaced, that the unions failed to respond to the employer's letters and, after the replacements were hired, the unions made no effort to contact the employer or to police its collective-bargaining agreement. The Board held that to apply the presumption that new employees will be presumed to support a union in the same ratio as those whom they replace was unwarranted because of the circumstances therein and especially since strikers were involved. Again, the differences between the instant case and Arkay Packaging is obvious, i.e., strikers are not involved and I did not find sufficient evidence to support a conclusion that the Union abandoned its representation of the Respondent's unit employees.

Finally, in Colonial Manor Convalescent & Nursing Center, 188 NLRB 861 (1971), the Board found that the union's failure to attend the last scheduled negotiation session without any notice to the employer, and its failure to do anything for 3 months after it received notice of the dismissal of an employee decertification petition, established a reasonable basis for doubting the union's majority status. In the instant case, and although there was a lengthy passage of time before a bargaining agreement was drafted and sent, the Union still maintained contact with the Respondent sufficient to evidence its interest in representing the unit employees and it might even be strongly argued that the Respondent, in effect, waived the passage of time as a factor when it agreed to meet with the Union each time it was requested to do so after 3 November 1982 and agreed to review the draft bargaining agreement in April 1985 without raising this as a defense.

[74] In light of the circumstances discussed, I also do not find that the closeness of the Union's victory in the Board election affects my findings and conclusions.

> [T]he recommended remedial order include a visitorial [sic] clause, authorizing the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that it will be able to monitor compliance with the Board's order, as enforced by the court of appeals.[2]

Under the circumstances of this case, however, I find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Although the General Counsel makes a fine and detailed presentation of the historical and legislative background and general justification for such remedial relief, she has failed to demonstrate sufficient grounds for the need for a visitatorial clause in this case. Therefore, I deny the General Counsel's request for such a clause in the recommended Order.[75]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, W.A.D. Rentals, Limited d/b/a Kelly's Private Car Service, is now and has been at all times relevant an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 3036, Taxi Drivers and Allied Workers Union, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time drivers employed by the Employer at its Queens, New York garage, excluding all office clerical employees, dispatchers, bookkeepers, management personnel, guards, and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material, the Union has been and is the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees within the above-described unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. The Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to recognize and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

6. By failing and refusing to execute a written contract allegedly embodying an agreement reached between the Respondent and the Union with respect to terms and conditions of employment of the Respondent's unit employees, the Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[76]

ORDER

The Respondent, W.A.D. Rentals, Limited d/b/a Kelly's Private Car Service, Queens, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing or refusing to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of all its employees in the appropriate unit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit regarding rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at at its Queens, New York facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[77] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 11, 1986, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] in which the Board ordered the Respondent, inter alia, to make whole certain employees for any loss of earnings suffered as the result of the Respondent's unfair labor practices. On August 4, 1987, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit entered a judgment enforcing the Board's Order.[2] A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due under the Board's Order, as enforced by the court, the Regional Director for Region 25 issued and duly served on the Respondent a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due the discriminatees.

About December 28, 1987, the Respondent filed a response and objection to the backpay specification, asserting that the discriminatees were ineligible to work for the Respondent during the backpay period. The answer was not sworn to by the Respondent or its attorney, nor did it specifically respond to each allegation of the complaint.

On March 15, 1988, the General Counsel filed with the Board a "Motion for Order Transferring Proceeding to the National Labor Relations Board: Motion to Strike Answer of Respondent to Backpay Specification and Notice of Hearing, and Motion for Summary Judgment; or in the Alternative, Motion for Partial Summary Judgment," with exhibits attached. The General Counsel alleges that the Respondent's answer failed to conform to the requirements of Section 102.54(b) and (c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations in that the answer, inter alia: (1) was not sworn to by the Respondent or by a duly authorized agent with appropriate power of attorney affixed; (2) failed to admit, deny, or explain each allegation of the specification, or state that the Respondent is without sufficient knowledge to answer each allegation; (3) failed to fairly respond to the substance of any of the allegations of the specification; and (4) failed to dispute the accuracy of any of the backpay figures or the premises upon which they are based. Accordingly, the General Counsel requested that the answer be stricken and that pursuant to Section 102.54(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations all allegations of the backpay specification be deemed to be admitted as true and that summary judgment should be granted. In the alternative, the General Counsel requested that in the event the Respondent's answer is deemed to raise issues requiring a hearing, partial summary judgment should be granted finding that all allegations of the specification are true.

On March 18, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. On April 1, 1988, the Respondent filed a motion and amended response and objection to backpay specification which either admits or denies each allegation of the specification, and an affirmative defense which was similar to the Respondent's previous response and objections to the backpay specification. The motion, amended response and objection, and affirmative defense were sworn to and signed by the Respondent's president.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54(b) and (c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations states:

> (b) Contents of the answer to specification.—The answer to the specification shall be in writing, the original being signed and sworn to by the respondent or by a duly authorized agent with appropriate power of attorney affixed, and shall contain the post office of the address respondent. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each and every allegation of the specification, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. Denials shall fairly meet the substance of the allegations of the specification denied. When a respondent intends to deny only a part of an allegation, the respondent shall specify so much of it as is true and shall deny only the remainder. As to all matters within the knowledge of the respondent, including but not limited to the various factors entering into the computation of gross backpay, a general denial shall not suffice. As to such matters, if the respondent disputes either the accuracy of the figures in the specification or the premises on which they > are based, he shall specifically state the basis for his disagreement, setting forth in detail his position as to the applicable premises and furnishing the appropriate supporting figures.

> (c) Effects of failure to answer or to plead specifically and in detail to the specification.—If the respondent fails to file any answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate. If the respondent files an answer to the specification but fails to deny any allegation of the specification in the manner required by subsection (b) of this section, and the failure so to deny is not adequately explained, such allegation shall be deemed to be admitted to be true, and may be so found by the Board without the taking of evidence supporting such allegation, and the respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting said allegation.

As indicated above, the General Counsel filed a motion to strike the Respondent's answer in its entirety and to grant summary judgment on the basis of alleged procedural and substantive deficiencies in the answer. It is clear that the answer filed about December 28, 1987, standing alone, is procedurally deficient in that it is not sworn to by the Respondent or by a duly authorized agent with power of attorney. The Respondent's amended response and affirmative defense, however, were sworn to by the Respondent's president. The Board, under similar circumstances, has viewed such an attempt to cure the procedural defects of an initial answer to a backpay specification as a timely amended answer.[3] Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's Motion to Strike and Summary Judgment on the basis of procedural defects.

We further find that the answer is not substantively deficient. In addition to the general denial that is sufficient to place interim earnings into issue for both discriminatees, the Respondent denies gross backpay allegations to the extent that its affirmative defense specifically alleges that discriminatee Authur Craig Scheid was ineligible to work for the Respondent during the backpay period inasmuch as he was ineligible to work for the Postal Service and had misrepresented his driving record, and that discriminatee Mark S. Combs was also ineligible to work for the Respondent during the backpay period because of his excessive number of moving traffic violations and his misrepresentation of his driving record. The Respondent's affirmative defense, therefore, raises substantial and material issues as to the discriminatees' gross backpay warranting a hearing. Accordingly, we shall deny the General Counsel's motions and we shall remand this proceeding for a hearing.

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's motion to strike answer of Respondent to backpay specification and notice of hearing is denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment; or in the alternative, Motion for Partial Summary Judgment is denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 25 for the purpose of issuing a notice of hearing and scheduling a hearing before an administrative law judge to determine the backpay owed discriminatees Mark S. Combs and Arthur Craig Scheid.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 2, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

In this case, the Respondent, an admitted successor employer, withdrew recognition from the Union January 22, 1986. To justify that withdrawal, the Respondent had to show that on that date "the union had in fact lost its majority status . . . or that the refusal to bargain was grounded on a good-faith doubt based on objective factors that the union continued to command majority support." Harley-Davidson Co., 273 NLRB 1531 (1985) (emphasis added; citation omitted). The Respondent attempted to prove the second prong of this disjunctive test, i.e., that it had a good-faith doubt based on objective factors that the Union continued to command majority support. It argues, however, based on certain statements that the judge made in her decision that the judge erroneously required it to prove the first prong of the test, i.e., actual loss of majority status, in support of its reliance on the second prong of the test. We have closely reviewed the judge's decision, and we are satisfied that, although the judge made at least one finding that has no bearing on the issue of the Respondent's good-faith doubt (a finding concerning the accuracy of employee Gonzalez' trial testimony concerning what he knew about employee sentiment regarding the Union, as distinct from what he told the Respondent's agents about such sentiment), the judge nonetheless directly addressed the second prong of the test. She did not, in her analysis, improperly require the Respondent to prove actual loss of majority in order to establish good-faith doubt.

Furthermore, after carefully reviewing the record ourselves, we have also reached the conclusion that the Respondent has failed to meet either prong of the test for the lawful withdrawal of recognition. In so concluding, we have taken account of the various bases relied on by the Respondent and discussed by the judge, as well as Attorney Chevere's testimony concerning Union President Hernandez' January 21, 1986 comments to him, and we have also considered the cumulative force of the Respondent's offered reasons for withdrawing recognition. But we have not considered any post-withdrawal-of-recognition events offered by the Respondent.

Additionally, while not necessarily agreeing with them, we find that the present case is factually distinguishable from J & J Drainage Products Co., 269 NLRB 1163 (1984), and Sofco, Inc., 268 NLRB 159 (1983), on which the Respondent relies, in which the Board found that the employers had lawfully withdrawn recognition. In this regard, we note that in J & J Drainage the Board cited, as a factor justifying withdrawal of recognition, a statement by one of the union stewards to the employer's general manager that a majority of the employees were not interested in the union. Contrary to the Respondent, however, we do not see a close analogy in Union Delegate Gonzalez' remarks to Plant Manager Esteva. Gonzalez and Esteva each testified that there were two occasions on which Gonzalez conveyed to Esteva certain views regarding the Union—once after a representative of a rival union appeared outside the plant distributing cards and on another occasion after Gonzalez took a telephone call at the plant from union representatives, who requested that he come to San Juan to participate in contract negotiations with the Respondent. According to Gonzalez' testimony, he told Esteva on the first occasion that "people were negative towards the [rival Union] or the S.I.U. I told him on my own and notified him just as something personal of mine." Esteva's testimony about this occasion indicates that Gonzalez "commented that he didn't want to get involved in any kind of union." Gonzalez testified that on the second occasion, following

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We note that the judge found that the Respondent hired all four of the employees who had served as union delegates while employed by the Respondent's predecessor. Although the Respondent accurately points out in its exceptions that Jorge Gonzalez and Juan Alvarez were the only two employees that it hired who had served as union delegates, we do not find that the judge's misstatement is sufficient to affect the validity of her ultimate conclusions.

In adopting the judge's decision, we do not rely on her finding, based on Union Delegate Alvarez' testimony at the hearing, that "less than a majority of employees opposed union representation."

the phone call from union representatives that he received at the plant, he told Esteva that no employee wanted to travel to San Juan to participate in negotiations with the Union. Esteva characterized Gonzalez' comments as signifying that Gonzalez was not interested in going to the negotiating meeting and "he wasn't going to San Juan." Neither Gonzalez nor Esteva testified that Esteva overheard the actual phone conversation.

We conclude that Gonzalez' own testimony regarding the first incident is subject to many interpretations and is ambiguous. The testimony could indicate that he told Esteva that his personal opinion was that employees were negative to the Union. It could also indicate that he was conveying only his personal opinion to Esteva without so stating that fact. Further, it can be read to indicate that he was conveying a sentiment that applied to a number of employees, or that he was conveying a sentiment that applied to him only.[2] Gonzalez' testimony about the second incident only shows employee disinterest in attending a negotiating session and nothing more. Moreover, we stress that the above-quoted testimony by Esteva clearly shows that he viewed Gonzalez on both occasions as speaking only of his own sentiments. We therefore conclude that none of these remarks purports to represent whether a significant number of employees wanted to rid themselves of union representation.

In Sofco, the Board found that the respondent had a reasonably based doubt of the union's continued majority status based on evidence that 23 of 24 bargaining unit employees made the following kinds of comments to the plant manager: they wanted "to do away with the union, get away from the union, and be on our own"; they indicated "[if] Sofco [bought the predecessor], we could make out better without a union"; and they indicated "they were dissatisfied with the present union and that there was a lot of them that just plain wanted out." During his testimony in this case, the Respondent's plant manager, Esteva, named eight employees who he said had told him that either they were "dissatisfied with the [Union]" or "were not interested in any Union." Sofco Inc., 268 NLRB 159. However, two of the men whom Esteva identified, Rivera and Arce, expressly stated at the hearing that they did not inform Esteva of their union sentiments. Furthermore, when Esteva was asked if he could recall other employees who made similar comments to him, he simply replied that he would have to name most of the employees in the plant. On these facts, we find that Esteva's testimony regarding the unit employees' union sentiments is not as definite and detailed as the evidence of the employees' statements to the plant manager in Sofco. As the judge noted here, Esteva offered no details on his conversations and his comments that employees were "dissatisfied" with the Union or "not interested in any union" are vague. The judge aptly stated that "without a more precise description of what individual employees may have said, it is impossible to determine from Esteva's comments whether employees actually expressed anything more than disenchantment with the Union's past performance or a disinclination to be active Union members, as distinguished from a current desire to be rid of Union representation," or how many employees made such statements. We further note that in Sofco, the Board also relied on the presence of a number of antiunion signs posted in the plant and the employees' hostility toward the union steward as corroboration of the employees' dissatisfaction with the union. No such indicators are present here.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Destileria Serralles, Inc., Camuy, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge. Based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by the S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe & Latin-America (the Union or S.I.U.), on 14 March 1986, a complaint issued on 30 May 1986 alleging that the Respondent, Destileria Serralles, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union since on or about 1 November 1985 and continuously thereafter. Alternatively, the complaint alleges that on 8 November 1985 and on various dates thereafter, the Respondent recognized and agreed to bargain with the Union but on or about 22 January 1986 withdrew recognition from the Union in bad faith. At the hearing in this case held in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on 17, 18, and 19 November 1986, all parties were afforded full opportunity to participate. On the entire record,[1] from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and with careful consideration of the posttrial briefs submitted by counsel for the General Counsel (the General Counsel) and the Respondent, I make the following

[2] Indeed regarding the last possibility, we note that the followup question and answer to Gonzalez' testimony was:

> Q. You told him your own personal feelings regarding the unions?
> A. Well, I told him that I did not, in other words, that I was giving him this because I did not want to get involved again or anymore.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges and the answer admits that the Respondent is a corporation with its principal office and place of business at Mercedita in Ponce, Puerto Rico, and with other places of business in Puerto Rico, including a facility at Camuy. At all material times, Respondent has engaged in distilling, processing, bottling, distributing, and selling alcoholic beverages, liquors, distilled spirits, and related products. During the past calendar year, which is representative of its annual operation, Respondent produced, sold, and distributed from its facilities products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Accordingly, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

A. The Union's Representation Under P.R.D.

On 18 October 1985, Respondent purchased the assets, business, and goodwill of the Puerto Rican Distilleries (P.R.D.) pursuant to a contract in which Seralles disclaimed liability for a collective-bargaining agreement between its predecessor and the S.I.U., the bargaining agent for employees at the Camuy facility since 1964.[2] On that same date and without prior notice to the work force, P.R.D. ceased operations at its facilities in Camuy and Arecibo and discharged the employees.

The S.I.U. was last certified as the unit's exclusive bargaining representative in January 1982. Prior to and for a brief period of time after P.R.D. closed, Camuy employees were involved in union activities. For example, several employees participated in negotiations leading to the most recent collective-bargaining agreement effective from 2 March 1985 to 1 March 1988; a large percentage of the unit voted for four delegates (shop stewards) in early October 1985 and all unit members continued paying union dues through October 1985 pursuant to a checkoff provision in the contract. After P.R.D. was sold, six or seven employees joined union representatives in bargaining about the effects of the plant's closure, with a final accord reached on 7 November.

B. The Union Requests Recognition

On 18 October 1985, after learning of Respondent's acquisition of P.R.D., S.I.U. President Conrado Hernandez, wrote to Alberto Torruella, Respondent's vice president and secretary, to request that Serralles recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative for the Camuy employees and honor its collective-bargaining agreement with P.R.D. Hernandez also proposed that the parties meet on 21 October. Receiving no response, Hernandez again wrote to Torruella on 30 October renewing his earlier request that the Respondent recognize the Union and honor the collective-bargaining agreement.

Before Respondent received this second letter, Radames Torruella, Respondent's counsel,[3] telephoned the Union's counsel, Ginoris Vizcarra, explaining that Serralles recently retained him to represent the Company on labor law matters. He also stated that the Respondent had not yet decided how or to what extent, if any, it would operate the former P.R.D. facilities. In a followup letter to Hernandez dated 1 November, Attorney Torruella repeated these remarks and promised to contact the Union as soon as he had reviewed the situation. (G.C. Exh. 4.)

Several days later on 4 November, Alberto Torruella met with Attorney Torruella to discuss the Company's legal obligations in light of its indefinite long-range plans for the Camuy facility and consider S.I.U.'s request for recognition, given the possibility of a competing claim from another union, the U.G.T., which represented a bargaining unit at Serralles' facility in Ponce. According to Torruella, Respondent had not yet decided whether it would continue all operations previously performed at Camuy and, if it did, whether it would employ a work force composed of both Camuy and Arecibo employees or with Camuy employees alone. Alternatively, Respondent also was considering transferring the former P.R.D. bottling operations to its Ponce facility which had a sufficiently large production capacity, leaving only aging and storing operations intact at Camuy.

Torruella further testified that after the acquisition, Respondent discovered that the inventory for certain P.R.D. brands was low. Consequently, Respondent decided to commence operations in Camuy at least on a short-term basis and began hiring former P.R.D. employees under temporary employment contracts. Production started on 11 November 1985 with a work force of 17 former Camuy employees, a number that the parties agreed constituted a representative complement.

[1] By order dated 21 November 1986, the parties were directed to submit preliminary briefs on the question of whether Respondent could properly claim privilege for and refuse to produce a letter written by its vice president while acting in a legal capacity which had been disclosed inadvertently to the General Counsel prior to the hearing. Subsequently, the Respondent released the letter voluntarily. It was marked R. Exh. 11 and is admitted into evidence.

Respondent and the General Counsel also submitted a joint motion to correct the transcript. The motion is granted and made a part of this record as Jt. Exhs. 3 a–e. Hereinafter, the General Counsel's exhibits will be referred to as G.C. Exh; Respondent's exhibits as R. Exh; the Charging Party's exhibits as C.P. Exh; and joint exhibits as Jt. Exh.

[2] The S.I.U. contract with P.R.D. provided that the union agreement would be binding on any successor.

[3] Hereinafter, Respondent's counsel will be referred to as Attorney Torruella to distinguish him from the Company's vice president.

At the conclusion of their 4 November meeting, Respondent's vice president authorized counsel to meet with the S.I.U. and to commence bargaining, if he believed that a sound relationship was feasible. Several days later Attorney Torruella telephoned Ms. Vizcarra and arranged an exploratory meeting for 8 November. To prepare for this meeting, Alberto Torruella compared the S.I.U. labor contract with the U.G.T. agreement covering the Ponce employees. After completing this review, he identified for Attorney Torruella 11 provisions in the S.I.U. contract that he wished to renegotiate in order to conform them with the U.G.T. labor agreement.

C. The 8 November Meeting

As agreed, Vizcarra and Hernandez met with Attorney Torruella and his associate, Francisco Chevere, on 8 November. At the outset, Attorney Torruella handed Vizcarra and Hernandez duplicate letters which responded to the Union's written requests for recognition and acceptance of its P.R.D. labor contract in the following noncommittal terms:[4] "At least for the moment said meetings . . . must not be considered as one of negotiation, nor necessarily as evidence that we have already recognized S.I.U. as the exclusive representative of any employee who is hired in Camuy." (G.C. Exh. 6.)

Attorney Torruella next outlined the alternatives that Respondent was weighing with regard to continuing operations at Camuy or transferring them to Ponce. However, he indicated that employees would be hired at Camuy on a temporary basis to deal with a depleted inventory. He further informed them that the U.G.T. had requested certain information about Respondent's purchase of P.R.D. and might assert a representational claim at Camuy under an accretion clause in its collective-bargaining agreement.

Attorney Torruella then outlined specific clauses in the S.I.U./P.R.D. labor contract that the Respondent wanted to alter. Attorney Vizcarra did not oppose modifying the contract. In fact, without signifying assent, she stated that many of the proposed changes were not unreasonable. She then raised some concerns and suggestions about other terms in the agreement. At Vizcarra's request, Attorney Torruella agreed to reduce Respondent's proposals to writing and directed Chevere to prepare a draft that would be used as a basis for future negotiations. Vizcarra mentioned that although the S.I.U. constitution did not require employee ratification of collective-bargaining agreements, she preferred having members of the bargaining unit involved in negotiations.

D. Communications Between the Parties After 8 November

After some weeks had elapsed without further word from the Respondent, Vizcarra wrote to Torruella on 15 December reminding him that she had previously requested recognition and asked him to send the promised document without delay. Noting that the employees were working under temporary contracts, Vizcarra urged that the parties act quickly to formalize and stabilize their labor-management relations. (R. Exh. 5(b).) Attorney Torruella did not respond specifically to the request for recognition. Instead, at some undefined time, he told Vizcarra that recognition would be settled in the collective-bargaining agreement.

Chevere mailed a complete draft agreement to Vizcarra on 23 December. Apart from the modifications proposed by the Respondent, the contractual terms were identical to those in the S.I.U.-P.R.D. labor agreement, including a standard recognition clause. Vizcarra wrote to Respondent's counsel once again on 7 January seeking information about Respondent's current negotiations with the U.G.T. so she could compare S.I.U.'s bargaining position with those proposed for the Ponce employees. Chevere mailed the requested material to her on 16 January and included a copy of an authorization card that the U.G.T. organizer recently had attempted to distribute to Camuy employees. In a cover letter accompanying these materials, Chevere confirmed a previous telephone conversation with Vizcarra in which he offered to discuss the proposals over the weekend. Chevere explained that Respondent was interested in reaching an agreement with the Union as soon as possible, preferably before the employees' temporary contracts expired on 24 January.

On 17 January, Hernandez, Vizcarra, Chevere, and Torruella participated in a conference call to discuss arrangements for forthcoming negotiations. Attorney Torruella testified that during this exchange he mentioned that Respondent had heard rumors that the employees were not interested in union representation and were unwilling to attend a bargaining meeting. Chevere, whose recollection of this exchange was similar to that of Attorney Torruella's in most respects, explained that earlier in the week, a Serralles official told him that "an employee or some employees" had refused to attend the negotiations. Vizcarra insisted that such rumors were false and said that if there were any truth to them she would not continue bargaining. She assured Respondent's counsel that employee representatives would attend the negotiations.

Either during this conversation or possibly a few days later, Hernandez asked Attorney Torruella if he could enter the plant to speak to the employees as S.I.U. agents had done under P.R.D. management.[5] Torruella denied this request, relying on the fact that Respondent had refused to allow the U.G.T. to enter the plant and that no collective-bargaining agreement was yet in place to justify such visitation rights.

On Monday, 20 January, during extended telephone calls, Vizcarra and Chevere discussed the contract terms, clause by clause, omitting only matters such as the recognition clause, about which there was no dispute. Intermittently, Chevere conferred with Attorney Torruella or the Respondent's vice president about specific language to be included.[6] Vizcarra testified that she insisted that any contract for the Camuy bargaining unit must contain the same benefits offered to the Ponce employees. She also disagreed with the Respondent's position on a no-strike clause. After an exchange lasting some 4 hours, the attorneys reached tentative agreement on most items with only a few matters left unresolved. The parties scheduled 22 January to meet with two employee representatives present in the hope of concluding an agreement.

E. The Respondent Asserts Doubts as to the Union's Majority

The January 22 meeting never came to pass; it was canceled at the Union's request when Hernandez was unable to persuade any employee to attend.

Hernandez testified that he and Marcos Cordero, the union's service representative, traveled to Camuy on 21 January in order to personally invite S.I.U. delegates, Juan Alvarez and Jorge Gonzalez, to the bargaining meeting set for the following day. According to Hernandez, as employees left the plant for their lunchbreak, they greeted the union agents but seemed fearful when Alvarez approached. Over lunch, Hernandez told Alvarez of the bargaining meeting scheduled for the next day. Alvarez purportedly asked them if Seralles had recognized the Union and on learning that recognition had not been granted, said "that many of his workers were traumatized because of what had been done to them." Hernandez further testified that Alvarez feared reprisals by Serralles and asked them to obtain written recognition before he or Gonzalez attended a bargaining meeting. Cordero testified that Alvarez simply declined the invitation to attend the 22 January meeting by saying "he was not sure he would go since they were in a probationary period and it would be difficult for them to attend a meeting with us."

Alvarez, offering a wholly different reason for declining to attend the bargaining session, testified that he told the union officials his health prevented him from participating.[7] Relying on his credible testimony, I find it unlikely that Alvarez would have insisted on formal recognition as a prerequisite to attending the negotiations because he had decided to withdraw from union activities for personal reasons.[8] Moreover, if Alvarez had asked for some guarantee of recognition, Hernandez could have pointed to the unchallenged recognition clause in the collective-bargaining agreement which lacked little more than employee ratification to become final and binding.

Hernandez stated that he informed Vizcarra later that day that the employees were afraid to attend the negotiations unless Serralles recognized the S.I.U. On Vizcarra's advice, Hernandez then telephoned Chevere notifying him that the meeting on the following day would have to be canceled; that in fear of losing their jobs, the employees did not want to attend until they were certain that Respondent had granted recognition. Chevere reportedly replied that working with antagonistic employees was difficult and that he would communicate with his superiors to see what could be done.

Chevere offered a somewhat different account of his telephone call with Hernandez. Recalling the exact word that Hernandez used, Chevere stated that the union president told him that the employees were "trancados"; that is, "dead set" against coming to the meeting. When Chevere assured Hernandez that Respondent had authorized the employees to attend the meeting with pay, Hernandez replied "as a responsible union leader, I can do no more, if they have no interest." Attorney Torruella also testified to a similar telephone call with Hernandez who repeated that the employees did not want to come to a bargaining session and did not want to get involved. Neither attorney indicated that Hernandez specifically referred to a problem with recognition or the employees' insecurity about their jobs.[9]

Chevere testified without dispute that, later the same day, he was privy to a telephone conversation in which Alberto Torruella told Vizcarra that the employees' refusal to attend the bargaining meeting confirmed all the rumors management had received about employee dissatisfaction with the Union. Consequently, he advised her that Respondent had formed a good-faith doubt that the S.I.U. had the support of a majority of the Camuy employees. At this time, the work force consisted of 55 employees.

Both Attorneys Vizcarra and Torruella recalled an encounter several days later while they were working on another legal matter. In Torruella's opinion Vizcarra appeared frustrated that the Camuy employees refused to be involved in negotiations. Vizcarra recalled, however, that her comments to Torruella were far more adversarial in nature. She insisted that Respondent had to recognize and bargain with the Union and that by refusing to allow Hernandez entry to the plant, Respondent was making it very difficult to reach any agreement. Attorney Torruella then asserted that the Respondent had information that the S.I.U. had lost majority support. The Union did not request recognition or further bargaining after this date.

On 24 January the Respondent offered the Camuy employees regular employment contracts starting with a 90-day probationary period and, unilaterally instituted other terms and conditions of employment.[10] occurred on Friday, 17 January. Since she did not receive the U.G.T. materials until 16 January, it seems more likely that their lengthy exchange occurred on 20 January after Vizcarra had time over the weekend to review them.

[7] Alvarez explained at the hearing that the union agents knew he suffered from epilepsy.

[8] Although Alvarez spoke in Spanish, a language with which I am unfamiliar, I nevertheless found that he communicated much by way of demeanor. He was a sincere and unassuming witness who I am convinced would not distort the facts as he knew them.

[9] Hernandez may have alluded to his belief that the employees were fearful for this would explain why Chevere mentioned that the Respondent was willing to subsidize the delegates' attendance at the bargaining meeting.

[10] On 23 December Respondent hired a number of employees to staff a second bottling line in response to increased Christmas sales. Many of these workers were laid off on 27 January.

F. The Respondent's Grounds for Withdrawing Recognition

In marshaling evidence to show the objective grounds on which it relied to form a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority, the Respondent called on four employees, each of whom testified about his own and his coworkers' attitude toward the Union. Jose Gonzalez was a pivotal witness in this regard for he was the only employee to testify about his direct contacts with both Union and management.

Apparently, because Gonzalez had been elected by his peers to serve as one of four union delegates since October 1985, his fellow workers came to him with their complaints. Thus, he testified that when Serralles reopened the Camuy plant, employees told him "they did not want to be members of any union." In mid-December, after a U.G.T. representative from Ponce began to distribute authorization cards, the employees commented that "they did not want U.G.T. or S.I.U. because they were in temporary employment and in a new industry . . . they did not want to get involved with any labor union." Gonzalez showed one of the U.G.T. leaflets to his supervisor, Jaime Ayende, and to plant manager, Lorenzo Esteva, telling them that he no longer wished to be involved with the Union and that other employees also were "negative" to any union.

Gonzalez also testified about several telephone conversations with Hernandez. The first call came to his home some time in mid-December. On this occasion, Hernandez told him that the Respondent was going to recognize or negotiate with the Union. Gonzalez advised the union president that his coworkers were "negative" or "skeptical" toward the Union and assured Hernandez that these attitudes were not the result of pressure from the Respondent. Attorney Vizcarra then took the telephone and, in essence, asked Gonzalez how the employees could be so disloyal after the Union had worked so effectively for them and obtained severance benefits from the P.R.D. Gonzalez merely repeated what he had told Hernandez; that the employees were negative.

On a subsequent occasion, Hernandez contacted him at the plant, reaching him on a telephone in the plant manager's office. Esteva personally summoned Gonzalez to his office to take the call. When Hernandez invited him to a bargaining meeting to be held with Serralles, Gonzalez replied that "people were negative and nobody was willing to go to San Juan." Afterwards, Gonzalez reported this conversation to Esteva who assured him that the Company had authorized and would pay for the employees' attendance at the meeting.[11]

Three other employees, Angel Cortes, Rafael Arce, and Isidro Rivera,[12] testified that they and their fellow employees were dissatisfied with S.I.U. representation even before P.R.D. was sold, principally because they believed the Union was too slow in resolving their problems.[13] They also asserted that neither they nor their fellow workers wanted to be represented by any union after Serralles reopened the company facility.

Specifically, Cortes, an employee with 21 years' experience working for P.R.D., stated that when operations started under Serralles "since we were new there . . . . all of the employees said that we would not belong to any union." Although Cortes said that many of the employees complained about union representation, he could not recall any particular problem. Rivera also heard "plenty" of his fellow employees comment that they did not want to be represented by any union. Both Cortes and Rivera were certain they had not shared their views with any member of management.

Arce too, said that "several" employees did not want union representation. In fact, Arce stated that he could think of no employee who favored the Union or lauded its accomplishments. When asked why the employees were dissatisfied, Arce explained that the employees had problems that the Union could not solve and, therefore, they preferred to "remain without a union."

Arce was the only employee besides Gonzalez who testified that he aired his antiunion views directly with members of management. He stated that he spoke with his foreman and supervisor, but not with Esteva. In addition, both Arce and Rivera testified that their fellow workers expressed unfavorable opinions about the Union at times and places in the plant where they could have been overheard by management. However, I do not find Rivera's testimony reliable in this regard for he avowed in his pretrial affidavit that he knew of no instance when his or other employees' remarks reached management. His attempts to reconcile these contradictory statements at the hearing were unpersuasive.

Respondent presented one other witness, Camuy Plant Manager Esteva, who testified that he had heard either directly or indirectly from most of the Camuy workers that they did not want representation.

Esteva named eight employees who told him that either they were "dissatisfied with the S.I.U." or "were not interested in any Union." Two of the men who Esteva identified, Rivera and Arce, expressly stated, however, that they did not speak about such matters with Esteva. When asked if he could recall other employees who made similar comments to him, Esteva replied that he would have to name most of the employees in the plant. Esteva added that three of his supervisors also conveyed the employees' antiunion feelings to him and that he, in turn, transmitted such information to his superiors in Ponce.[14]

To refute Esteva's claims, the General Counsel called on Alvarez, the chief employee delegate, who testified that his coworkers' views toward the Union fell into three categories: some 20 to 25 employees told him they were not interested in being represented by any union; another 8 to 10 were indifferent about union representation; a third group of some 15 to 20 employees indicated that they preferred to withhold any comment that might affect their jobs. Although Alvarez did not specify into which category he fit, he acknowledged that he and other employees believed that the S.I.U. had represented the Camuy employees adequately.

[11] Although Hernandez did not remember calling Gonzalez at the plant, Gonzalez' and Esteva's testimony about this communication was too specific to be discounted.

[12] In accordance with Spanish custom, the metronymic surname of each employee also appears in the transcript.

[13] One employee also mentioned some difficulty in obtaining a medical plan, but admitted that the Union resolved this matter in 1978.

[14] In lieu of presenting testimony from two or three additional employees, Respondent offered to stipulate that their testimony would be cumulative to that of the four employees whom it already had called. The record does not clearly show whether the other parties agreed to this stipulation. Therefore, I can make no finding that this stipulation was admitted as evidence.

Soon after the Respondent had withdrawn recognition from the Union, Hernandez prepared a letter addressed to Alvarez and Gonzalez containing the following relevant passages:

> As you know, we made many efforts to continue representing you and to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement that would give you protection and job security. I assured you that you would not have any problems with your new employer, Destileria Serralles, Inc., and that we could guarantee you a reasonable collective-bargaining agreement.
> By the same token, I told you that I would obtain permission for one of you and another employee to attend the negotiations without any problem. We are surprised that employees who have enjoyed the benefits of their labor organization for years have reacted this way, not realizing that it is preferable to be represented by a union than to be defenseless and without any kind of representation. . . .
> I hope that you will reconsider it and that you will do it in time, since really, even though we are willing to represent you, I don't think you should make the Union incur additional expenses if you are not interested at all.

Hernandez concluded this message by urging the employees to sign and return a union authorization form printed at the bottom of the letter.

Cordero hand-delivered 50 copies of this letter to Alvarez who attempted unsuccessfully to distribute them to some of his coworkers. When these efforts failed, Alvarez left the copies inside the plant where the employees had access to them. He subsequently retrieved the copies finding that none had been taken. No authorization forms were returned to the Union.

Nevertheless, the union agents remained in contact with the Serralles employees and after a complaint in this case issued, wrote to them outlining the allegations therein.[15]

III. DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Respondent Granted De Facto Recognition to the Union

The complaint, which is framed in the alternative, first alleges that at no time did the Respondent accede to the Union's repeated requests for recognition. In determining the merits of this allegation, the parties do not dispute the applicable legal principles. Thus, they agree that NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972), the definitive statement of a successor's legal obligation to the bargaining representative of its predecessor employees, requires that a new employer must bargain with the union "when it selects as its work force the employees of the previous employer," but it is not bound by the terms of the predecessor's labor agreement. Id. at 278, 281-282.[16] The bargaining duty arises when the Union has made a demand for recognition and a representative complement composed of a majority of the predecessor's employees has been hired. Fall River Dyeing Corp., 272 NLRB 839, 840 (1984), enfd. 775 F.2d 425 (1st Cir. 1985).

Respondent admits that it was a successor to P.R.D. and that a representative complement of S.I.U. employees was working at the Camuy plant by 13 November 1985. Accordingly, Respondent acknowledges that its duty to recognize and bargain with the Union was fixed on that date.

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent disregarded its legal duty and consistently ignored the Union's repeated requests for recognition. Counsel further submits that the meeting on 8 November may not be regarded as valid evidence of recognition for Respondent's letter to the Union on that date expressly restricted the purpose of the meeting. The Respondent states to the contrary that its conduct at the 8 November meeting demonstrates that it implicitly recognized the Union and commenced bargaining.

The Board has no prescribed formula governing the manner in which a Respondent must grant recognition, and, in appropriate circumstances, will find that an employer's deeds speak louder than words as evidence of recognition. For example, in Harley-Davidson Co., 273 NLRB 1531 (1985), the employer refused to acknowledge that the union represented a majority of employees in the bargaining unit and did not explicitly grant recognition. However, it did agree to bargain. The Board concluded that "by conceding its obligation as a successor and agreeing to negotiate the Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union." Ibid.

Similarly, in Landmark International Trucks, 257 NLRB 1375, 1379 (1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds 699 F.2d 815 (6th Cir. 1983), the administrative law judge ruled, with Board approval, that by meeting with the union that had requested recognition and bargaining and agreeing to a date for subsequent meetings, the employer indicated "a recognition of the Union . . . [and] demonstrated an undertaking . . . to negotiate with the Union."

These precedents compel the conclusion that by its behavior the Respondent granted de facto recognition to the Union at the 8 November meeting. On that occasion, the Respondent presented specific proposals to modify the S.I.U.'s former labor agreement, agreed to prepare a written draft contract to be used at subsequent meetings and discussed other matters affecting the manner in which negotiations would be conducted. By these actions, which cannot be viewed as anything less than bargaining, Respondent waived the qualifications expressed in its 8 November letter. As Harley-Davidson and Landmark make clear, when, as here, a respondent engages in even the preliminary steps of collective bargaining, recognition is assumed.[17]

[15] Respondent points out that Hernandez omitted informing the employees of an allegation that Serralles had refused to recognize the Union. I do not regard the failure to include every allegation in the complaint as a serious omission. It appears that the Union President simply wanted to communicate some of the complaint's essential elements.

Respondent's subsequent actions were consistent with and lend weight to the conclusion that it impliedly recognized the Union on 8 November. As promised, Respondent prepared the draft contract and forwarded it to the Union on 23 December; provided requested information to the Union without protest or hesitation on 7 January; offered to negotiate over a weekend, and engaged in earnest bargaining on 20 January, ultimately reaching tentative agreement on that date about most terms of a revised contract. The recognition clause in the S.I.U.-P.R.D. agreement was never disputed and was preserved intact. Respondent indicated that it was willing to execute the agreement on 22 January, regarding the presence of employee representatives at this final session as a formality.

On these facts, I conclude that the Respondent recognized the Union on 8 November 1985, and continued bargaining with the S.I.U. until on or about 22 January. Accordingly, the allegation that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unlawfully refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union shall be dismissed.

B. Respondent withdrew Recognition without Sufficient Objective Criteria

By impliedly recognizing the Union, Respondent acknowledged that the S.I.U. presumptively represented a majority of its employees. See Harley-Davidson Co., supra at 1535. Respondent's subsequent challenge to that presumption as a basis for withdrawing recognition must be assessed in accordance with well-established precedent that holds that after the certification year, an employer may withdraw recognition of an incumbent union at any time if it affirmatively establishes either that (1) the union has lost majority support, or (2) had a reasonably grounded good-faith doubt based on objective, verifiable considerations, untainted by unfair labor practices, that the Union no longer enjoyed majority status. Id. at 1531;[18] Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480 (1969), enfd. 427 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1970).

The General Counsel maintains that by withholding recognition from the Union, denying the union agents access to the plant, and retaining employees under temporary contracts, the Respondent instilled fear in the workers causing them to detach themselves from the Union to appease their new employer. Consequently, counsel contends that Respondent is precluded from withdrawing recognition from the S.I.U. because its doubt of majority support was not asserted in good faith or raised in an atmosphere untainted by unfair labor practices.

The record leaves little doubt, and the General Counsel correctly observes, that the employees were fearful about the permanence of their employment. Alvarez may have expressed it best when he said that the employees were traumatized by what happened to them. But P.R.D. was as responsible for that trauma as Serralles. Without any formal notice, P.R.D. abruptly closed its facilities and discharged the entire work force. Although the Union succeeded in negotiating severance benefits for the discharged employees, it was unable to prevent the plant's closure and the Employer's exodus to the United States. After Serralles resumed operations at Camuy, the work force was reduced by more than 50 percent. Surely some employees feared that the Union could not prevent a future closure. It is in this context that the employees' ambivalence toward the Union must be examined. In its 4 February letter to the employees, the Union implicitly acknowledged the employees' apprehension and attempted to allay their fears by assuring them that the Respondent was cooperating in the bargaining process. At least at that time, the Union did not accuse the Respondent of bad faith.

Further, and contrary to the General Counsel's contention, Serralles did not unlawfully withhold recognition. As discussed above, Respondent constructively recognized and began to bargain with the Union as early as 8 November. It is true that Respondent did not extend recognition in an overt manner. Nevertheless, the employees had reason to know that their employer had agreed to bargain. Hernandez told union delegate Gonzalez as much. If the employees were unaware of the Respondent's willing participation in the collective-bargaining process, perhaps the responsibility lay in part with the Union's failure to better inform them.

The General Counsel and Charging Party submit that the Union's ability to reach and reassure the employees was impeded by Respondent's refusal to admit the S.I.U. agents into the plant. Clearly, Respondent could have authorized such a visit; the reasons offered to justify the Union's exclusion were meritless. By the same token, Respondent had no legal duty to grant access and did not violate the Act by refusing entry.[19]

Moreover, Respondent did not interfere in any other way with the Union's efforts to contact the workers. The record shows that Hernandez and Cordero met freely with the employees just outside the plant on a few occasions; the plant manager made his office available to Gonzalez to speak by phone with the union president, and Alvarez apparently did not hesitate to leave union literature in the plant where employees had access to it. Thus, even if Respondent's refusal to admit the union representatives into the plant was unreasonable, that act alone could not have affected "the Union's status, cause employee disaffection or improperly affect the bargaining relationship itself." Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 19 (Burger Pits) v. NLRB, 785 F.2d 796, 800 (9th Cir. 1986).

[17] See General Electric Co., 173 NLRB 253, 257 (1968), in which the Board ruled that preliminary arrangements for negotiations are mandatory subjects of bargaining and "are just as much a part of the process of collective bargaining as negotiations over wages, hours, etc."

[18] Harley-Davidson overrules prior case law that required a successor employer to bargain for a reasonable time even it alleged a good faith doubt of the union's majority support.

[19] Here, unlike the situation described in Triangle Plastics, 191 NLRB 347 (1971), denial of access to the plant did not prevent the S.I.U. agents from effectively serving the employees in collective bargaining.

The General Counsel relies on Alberto Torruella's 15 October letter to a credit institution as proof that Respondent had decided to hire 65 employees for the Camuy facility. From this, counsel reasons that Respondent was committed to operating the Camuy facility permanently, and, therefore, had no legitimate excuse for hiring workers under temporary employment contracts other than to breed fear and underscore their dependence on a new employer whose disposition toward the Union was unknown. Counsel attaches more significance and finality to this letter than is warranted. It is true that Torruella expressed an intent to open the Camuy plant. However, he also projected a work force composed of former P.R.D. employees from both Arecibo and Camuy. In fact, the Camuy facility reopened with a work force composed solely of former S.I.U. members. This departure from the plan set forth in Torruella's letter, supports Respondent's argument that decisions about Camuy's future were not cast in concrete at the time that operations began there.

The 15 October letter did not expressly state that closure was one of the options being considered for the Camuy plant. However, the letter does refer to future consolidation of operations. Further, as Torruella testified and as Plant Manager Esteva confirmed, the Ponce facilities were large enough to house the Camuy bottling operation. Therefore, transferring portions of the Camuy enterprise to Ponce was not out of the question. In fact, Esteva spontaneously volunteered that Respondent had experimented with performing certain bottling operations at Ponce that traditionally were accomplished at Camuy. Respondent abandoned the experiment after determining that these functions could be performed more efficiently at Camuy.

Torruella and Esteva agreed that Respondent decided to start production at Camuy on a trial basis after finding that the inventory there was low.[20] Under these circumstances, offering temporary employment contracts to employees whose skills were then unknown, does not seem to be an aberrant business decision.

The 15 October letter also refers to the possibility that the U.G.T. might seek to represent the Camuy employees. Thus, Respondent's concern about competing claims between the U.G.T. and S.I.U. was not bogus or recently invented to serve its ends in this litigation. Whether the U.G.T. would have prevailed had it pursued representational rights at Camuy is an altogether different question than whether such a claim would be asserted.

Having determined that the Respondent did not withdraw recognition in bad faith, a final question remains whether Respondent presented sufficient objective evidence that a majority of the 55 employees in the unit no longer desired union representation.[21]

In rebutting the Union's presumption of continued majority support, an employer bears a heavy burden of presenting "clear, cogent and convincing evidence" that indicates that a union's support has declined to a minority. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 19 v. NLRB, supra at 799. The Respondent has failed to meet its considerable burden.

In evaluating the numerous factors that Respondent has proffered to justify belief in a union's loss of majority support, the Board regards employee statements made directly to the employer as particularly probative. See Glosser Bros., 271 NLRB 710, 715 (1984). In the present case, Respondent predicates its doubt on the testimony of four employees and the Camuy plant manager. Careful scrutiny reveals that their statements are far from clear, convincing, or cogent.

Only two of the four employee witnesses acknowledge speaking directly with managerial personnel. Esteva recalled the names of no more than eight individuals with whom he spoke directly. Of these eight, two denied having talked to him. Thus, in a unit of 55 employees, Respondent's evidence, viewed in its best light, establishes that a small minority, six to eight employees in all, spoke individually and directly to management officials about their union sentiments.

Through the testimony of a few witnesses, however, Respondent attempted to prove that many other employees rejected union representation. Thus, Gonzalez testified that he informed Esteva that other employees joined in his decision to reject union representation, but he failed to discuss specific incidents or identify a single employee who shared his view. The Board does not favor such testimony. First, such comments are hearsay. See Roza Watch Corp., 249 NLRB 284, 287 (1980). In addition, the Board has observed that employees' statements "which purport to convey sentiments of employees other than themselves" might lead to a few antiunion employees providing "the basis for withdrawal of recognition when in fact there is actually an insufficient basis for doubting the Union's continued majority support." Dalewood Rehabilitation Hospital, 224 NLRB 1618, 1619–1620 (1976).

J & J Drainage Products Co., 269 NLRB 1163 (1984), is a departure from the Board's traditional rejection of such testimony. In that case, the Board adopted the administrative law judge's ruling that that an employer could rely in part on the comments of one of two union stewards who said that several of the 32 unit employees were disinterested in the union. Id. at 1171. I do not find that Gonzalez' remarks about the views of other employees deserves the same deference. Gonzalez, one of four delegates in a 55-man unit, attributed a single, uniform position to the unidentified, unenumerated employees for whom he purportedly spoke. Consequently, I had little confidence that he accurately presented the diversity of opinion that invariably exists in any group of 55 individuals. Alvarez, the main union delegate, testified in a more reliable manner, categorizing his fellow workers' views into three separate schools of thought. If Alvarez' estimates were correct, then less than a majority of employees opposed union representation.

[20] The General counsel suggests that Torruella and Esteva contradicted each other about when the Respondent determined that the inventory was depleted. In fact, no contradiction exists. Both men agreed that production started at Camuy in November, after Respondent determined that the inventory had to be replenished. Esteva explained that a second bottling line was opened at Camuy when increased sales required even greater production immediately prior to Christmas. In other words, I construe their testimony to mean that the inventory was insufficient in November and continued to fall short of demand, particularly as sales increased during the peak holiday season.

[21] The Respondent did not attempt to prove that the Union did not actually represent a majority of unit employees.

Supervisory reports to Esteva, involving double hearsay problems, were equally unreliable evidence on which to premise doubt of the Union's continued majority. As the Board found in Thomas Industries, 255 NLRB 646, 647 (1981), "supervisors' subjective estimates that a majority of the employees did not want a union add little, if anything, to the probative force of the employees' statements which constituted the only concrete evidence on which the supervisors' estimates were based."

Esteva's testimony regarding the alleged antiunion attitudes of most of the employees in the plant is equally troublesome. Like Gonzalez, Esteva offered no details. Instead, he stated generally that employees were "dissatisfied with the S.I.U." or "were not interested in any union." Without a more precise description of what individual employees may have said, it is impossible to determine from Esteva's comments whether, or how many, employees actually expressed nothing more than disenchantment with the Union's past performance or a disinclination to be active union members, as distinguished from a current desire to be rid of union representation. Thus, by invoking and relying on such conclusory testimony, Respondent failed to clearly delineate which employees may have unequivocally repudiated the Union. See Thomas Industries, supra at 647;[22] Dalewood Rehabilitation Hospital, supra.

The Respondent also based its doubt of continued majority support on the Union's failure to persuade any employees to attend the 22 January bargaining meeting. The Board consistently has rejected evidence of employee disinterest in union activity as an accurate index of the majority's union sentiments. Employee attendance at union meetings, like membership in or financial support of a union, does not necessarily signify that a majority of the work force opposes union representation.[23] Consequently, the Respondent may not rely on the employees' unwillingness to appear at negotiations as objective evidence that justifies withdrawing recognition.

In sum, Respondent has not adduced concrete and unequivocal expressions of antiunion sentiment from a sufficient number of employees or managerial personnel to support a reasonable doubt that the Union no longer enjoyed majority support on or about 22 January 1986. Id. at 653. Accordingly, the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union on that date was unwarranted and violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Destileria Serralles, Inc., is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The S.I.U. is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees including mechanics, messengers, and truckdrivers employed by the Respondent at its redistilling and bottling plant in Camuy, Puerto Rico, excluding all other employees, executive, administrative, and professional personnel, the chemist, the shipping and receiving clerks, office and plant clerical employees, foremen, guards, and supervisors, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material, the Union has been and is now the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. On 8 November 1985, the Respondent recognized the Union and bargained with it from that date until 22 January 1986.

6. By withdrawing recognition and refusing to bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit, since on or about 22 January 1986, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the above-cited violation of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom. Affirmatively, Respondent will be required to recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union and post an appropriate notice.

The General Counsel submits that a visitatorial clause is required in this case so that the Board may engage in discovery to properly monitor Respondent's compliance with the Board's Order. Based upon all of the circumstances in this case, and particularly on my finding that the Respondent did not act in bad faith, I do not agree that a visitatorial provision is necessary. Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion to include such a provision in the Order is denied.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record in this proceeding, I issue the following recommended[24]

ORDER

The Respondent, Destileria Serralles, Inc., Camuy, Puerto, Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

---

[22] The vagueness of Esteva's reports about the employees' antiunion attitudes may explain why the Respondent discounted them and remained willing to execute a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until 21 January, just 1 day before it withdrew recognition.

[23] See, e.g., Cut & Curl, 277 NLRB 1869, 1873 (1977); Orion Corp., 210 NLRB 633 (1974), enfd. 515 F.2d 81 (5th Cir. 1975).

[24] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with the S.I.U. de Puerto Ricco, Caribe & Latin America affiliated with Seafarers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees including mechanics, messengers, and truckdrivers employed by the Respondent at its redistilling and bottling plant in Camuy, Puerto Rico, excluding all other employees, executive, administrative and professional personnel, the chemist, the shipping and receiving clerks, office and plant clerical employees, foremen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with the S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe & Latin-America affiliated with Seafarers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described unit and, if an agreement is reached, embody that agreement in a signed contract. Post at its Camuy, Puerto Rico facilities, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[25] Copies of said notice on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24 of the National Labor Relations Board, after being signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps have been taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that allegations of the complaint that allege unfair labor practices not specifically found in this decision be dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain collectively with the S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe & Latin-America affiliated with Seafarers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL recognize and upon request bargain with the S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe & Latin-America affiliated with Seafarers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative of employees in the bargaining unit which includes:

> All production and maintenance employees including mechanics, messengers, and truckdrivers employed by Respondent at its distilling and bottling plant in Camuy, Puerto Rico, but excluding all other employees, executive, administrative and professional personnel, the chemist, the shipping and receiving clerks, office and plant clerical employees, foremen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize and on request bargain with S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe & Latin-America affiliated with Seafarers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative of our employees in the bargaining unit described above with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

[25] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Chas. S. Winner, Inc. and Local No. 115, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO.[1] Case 4-CA-14811

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On September 24, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Irwin Kaplan issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and supporting briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

Member Johansen, dissenting.

For the reasons set forth in my dissent in Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB 214 (1988), I find that the Respondent's employees' affiliation with Teamsters Local 115 was valid and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with Local 115, engaging in direct dealing with the employees, instituting unilateral changes, and refusing to discuss grievances. Additionally, I find that the Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act, as alleged, in its statements and conduct that conveyed it was futile for employees to support Local 115, and by resuming dues checkoff on behalf of OVSC, processing a grievance filed by OVSC, and bargaining and executing a new collective-bargaining agreement with that labor organization.

On May 11, 1984, the Respondent's employees voted 17 to 12, in a unit of approximately 30,[1] to affiliate with Local 115 and immediately thereafter voted unanimously to dissolve OVSC and to transfer the latter's treasury to Local 115. The election was the culmination of an investigation into the prospects of affiliating with another labor organization that was undertaken by OVSC members and officers more than a month earlier. Employees signed petitions authorizing Local 115 to represent them and a special notice was posted 1 week in advance of the May 11 meeting and vote. The employees voted by secret ballot. Accordingly, due process safeguards were met.[2] Consistent with my dissent in Western Commercial Transport, supra, therefore, I find that Local 115 obtained the majority support of the Respondent's employees. Indeed, a clear majority of all unit employees favored affiliation. Moreover, I find that Local 115 retains majority support despite employees voting to disaffiliate and to revive OVSC inasmuch as the subsequent election was the direct and desired result of the Respondent's unfair labor practices.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] In agreeing with the judge that there is no continuity of representative under the circumstances herein, we rely on the Board's recent decision in Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB 214 (1988).

In his decision, the judge discussed at length the potential applicability of Quemetco, Inc., 226 NLP.B 1398 (1976), to affiliation cases. The Board, at fn. 13 of Western Commercial Transport, supra, overruled Quemetco "to the extent that it holds that an amendment of certification may be granted notwithstanding evidence showing the absence of continuity of representative."

We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's discussion of the Respondent's collateral estoppel defense contained in fn. 17 of his decision.

Member Cracraft finds it unnecessary to rely on the judge's citation of RCA Del Caribe, 262 NLRB 963 (1982).

[1] All unit employees had an opportunity to vote.

[2] I reject the Respondent's contention that due process was not observed because the vote contravened a provision of the OVSC constitution requiring a two-thirds majority to amend the constitution. Whatever the ramifications of affiliation, it cannot be characterized as a constitutional amendment. Significantly, no employees complained that the constitution was disregarded or that the election was conducted improperly.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Irwin Kaplan, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard on April 22, 23, and 24, 1985, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The underlying charges were filed on 9 January 1985, by Local No. 115, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 115, Union, or Teamsters), and gave rise to a complaint and notice of hearing on 28 February 1985, amended at the hearing (G.C. Exh. 2), alleging that Chas. S. Winner, Inc.[1] (Respondent), engaged in certain conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5), (2), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).[2]

[2] As a result of a partial settlement at the outset of the hearing, the allegations contained in pars. 10, 11(a), 12(a), 15, and 18 of the original complaint were deleted.

289 NLRB No. 13

The essence of the outstanding allegations is that the Respondent unlawfully refused to accept the affiliation of the Organization of Vehicle Sales Counselors (OVSC) with the Teamsters by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Teamsters in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Further, it is alleged that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by dealing directly with unit employees over mandatory subjects of bargaining and bypassing the Teamsters; by making certain unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment without providing notice and giving the Teamsters an opportunity to bargain; and by refusing to discuss a discharge grievance under the then-outstanding collective-bargaining agreement with representatives of the Teamsters.

Correspondingly, it is alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act by its continued support and recognition of the OVSC following the affiliation, as well as, by negotiating and executing a new collective-bargaining agreement with that organization.

Still further, it is alleged variously that the Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by creating the impression to employees that their union activities were under surveillance; by informing employees that it would continue to recognize and bargain only with the OVSC and, conversely, that it would never recognize the Teamsters; by other statements, acts, and conduct conveying to employees that their efforts in support of the Teamsters would be futile; by threatening to close the facility if the employees supported the Union; and by conditioning increased employee benefits on their support for the OVSC and a corresponding abandonment of the Teamsters.

The Respondent filed an answer conceding, inter alia, jurisdiction, the labor organizational status of Local 115 and the OVSC, the appropriateness of the bargaining unit, and the statutory supervisory status of the individuals so alleged. Respondent denied that it committed any unfair labor practices. Affirmatively, Respondent challenges the validity of the affiliation in question, mainly, because it assertedly resulted in a break in the "continuity of representation" and, as such, it failed to comport with the outstanding Board and court precedents.[3]

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after careful consideration of the posttrial briefs,[4] I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a New Jersey corporation engaged in the business of selling new and used vehicles at its sole facility, which is located in Cherry Hill, New Jersey. During the past year, Respondent, in connection with its aforenoted business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of New Jersey.

It is admitted, the record disclosed, and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

It is admitted, the record disclosed, and I find that the OVSC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

It is admitted, the record disclosed, and I find that Local 115 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Sequence of Events

The Respondent voluntarily recognized the OVSC for a unit comprised of its new- and used-car salesmen in 1978. Since then, they have been parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements, the last of which by its terms is effective 27 March 1985 through 27 March 1989 (Jt. Exh. 2). The Teamsters first became involved around April 1984 or midterm of the previous collective-bargaining agreement, which by its terms was effective 1 September 1983 through 28 February 1985 (Jt. Exh. 3). In March or early April 1984[5] a number of Respondent's unit employees met and explored the prospects of replacing OVSC with another union as their collective-bargaining representative. Among the employees present at that meeting were the officers of OVSC: President William Francis, Secretary John Fearow, and Treasurer William Casey. A committee was formed, which included employee Leonard Baldino, to commence a search for an outside union.[6] The search for another union led to Teamsters Local 115, and meetings were conducted in April between the committee and representatives of the aforesaid Teamsters local. On 30 April, the committee informed Local Teamsters President Joe Yeoman and Business Representative Robert Henninger that a majority of Respondent's employees favored joining their organization. The Teamsters representatives informed the committee members of the mechanics necessary for union affiliation. Within the next few days virtually all of Respondent's employees signed Teamsters authorization petitions indicating their "desire" to become members of Local 115 and designating that Union as their collective-bargaining representative (Jt. Exhs. 8, 9, 10, and 11). On 2 May, employee Leonard Baldino dropped off these signed Teamsters petitions at the local union office. The following night Business Representative Henninger gave Baldino copies of a notice to post at Respondent's facility advising all the employees of a meeting and vote to be held on 11 May to determine whether to affiliate with the Teamsters (G.C. Exh. 3). The notice, which was posted about 4 May, in its entirety reads as follows:

---

[3] In its posttrial brief, Respondent made some subsidiary contentions. These too have been considered and will be treated infra.

[4] Respondent's unopposed motion to correct transcript is granted.

[6] The OVSC, the incumbent Union, is an independent union with its members comprised of only Respondent's employees.

> The Organization of Vehicle Sales Counsellors
> There will be a meeting held on Friday, May 11, 1984, at the Best Western Gloucester Inn, US Route 130 & North-South Freeway, Gloucester, N.J., to vote by secret ballot on the question of whether to affiliate the Organization [OVSC] with Teamsters Union Local No. 115.
> The meeting will begin promptly at 7:00 PM and the election will be held from 8:00 PM until 9:00 PM to give everyone an opportunity to vote.
> We look forward to seeing you on May 11.

At the outset of the 11 May affiliation meeting, the employees signed a sign-in sheet indicating their presence (G.C. Exh. 12). William Francis, the OVSC president, made some preliminary remarks noting that the employees were there to vote whether they wanted to affiliate with the Teamsters. Yeoman and Henninger also attended that meeting as representatives of the Teamsters to answer any questions from Respondent's employees. The affiliation election by secret ballot took place shortly after the Teamsters representatives left the room. The question posed on the ballot was: "Should the Organization of Vehicle Sales Counsellors affiliate with Teamsters Union Local No. 115 a/w the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America?" (G.C. Exh. 14.) Employees Edward Lipman and Jerry Graham acted as observers and in connection therewith checked off the names of employees from a voting list (G.C. Exh. 13) as employees came up to the table for their ballots. The ballots were counted that night and disclosed that 17 were cast for affiliation and 12 votes were cast against.[7] (G.C. Exh. 15.) After the votes were counted, Francis invited a motion from the floor turning over the assets of OVSC to the Teamsters and that the organization be deemed dissolved. The motion was made and carried.

The next morning Respondent's general manager, Joseph Marazzi, heard talk around the dealership and learned the result of the affiliation vote. Marazzi also acknowledged receiving from OVSC President Francis a letter addressed to John Hynansky, Respondent's president, dated 14 May, formally notifying him that "A substantial majority" of OVSC voted to affiliate with the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 7). About that same time Respondent ceased its monthly practice of deducting dues from employees' paychecks for remittance to OVSC.[8] Also, about that time, a check in the amount of approximately $3400, which represented the sum in the OVSC treasury, was turned over to the Teamsters.[9] Still in May, and approximately a week to 10 days after the affiliation vote was taken, Teamsters Local President Yeoman designated employee Leonard Baldino as the Local's representative for Respondent's employees. By letter dated 29 May, Respondent, by its counsel, Stephen Suflas, responded to the Teamsters letter of 14 May and, in essence, declined to bargain concerning the members of OVSC. (Jt. Exh. 8.) Attorney Suflas disputed the affiliation vote as legally defective because it contravened the provisions of the OVSC constitution and, also, on the basis that the purported affiliation created a break in the continuity of representation.[10] On 19 June, one of the unit employees handed Marazzi a written grievance signed by nearly all the employees in response to Respondent's refusal to recognize the Teamsters as the "successor and assign [of OVSC] under Section 7 of [the] collective-bargaining agreement."[11] (Jt. Exh. 9; Jt. Exh. 1, par. 7.) Marazzi brought up the subject of the grievance on Wednesday, 21 June, at a regularly scheduled weekly sales meeting and made arrangements for another meeting to be held with the OVSC committee to discuss that grievance. That meeting was held within a few days in the office of Thomas Hatzis, a co-owner of Respondent and its secretary-treasurer.[12] Hatzis along with co-owner and President John Hynansky and Marazzi attended this meeting on behalf of management; the employees were represented by Robert Esposito, Edward Stasny, Richard Wilson, Vincent Baldino, John Fearow, and Bill Francis, collectively, a so-called liaison committee of OVSC (Jt. Exh. 11).

Hynansky carried the bulk of the discussion and touched on a dialogue for revising three major ongoing concerns of the employees: the house deal or bone system, the phone-up system, and the pension plan.[13] A few days later Hynansky, Hatzis, and Marazzi met with the entire OVSC membership. Hynansky opened the meeting stating that it is the Company's position, under the advise of counsel, that the affiliation vote was not legal. Further, that the Company's bargaining obligation continued to be with OVSC and not the Teamsters. As such, Hynansky requested that the employees withdraw their grievance (Jt. Exh. 9) over the Company's refusal to recognize the Teamsters. During the course of that session Hynansky repeated what he had conveyed to the liaison committee a day or two earlier, to wit, that he was amenable to certain revisions in the phone-up and bone programs and the pension plan.

[7] There were 30 unit employees then employed. Thus, only one employee failed to cast a ballot. There is no contention, nor does the record tend to show that any unit employee was denied an opportunity to cast a ballot. Further, Respondent does not dispute that the ballots were cast in secret.

[8] The record is unclear regarding the individual who authorized this action.

[9] This check was commingled with the Teamsters local's general treasury as well as any dues to be collected from Respondent's employees. The Teamsters local also assumed the liabilities of OVSC.

[10] The Respondent relies on the provision in the constitution providing for amendments (art. XIX) that requires the approval of a two-thirds vote to amend provisions in the constitution (Jt. Exh. 4, pp. 7-8).

[11] Sec. 7 of the then-outstanding collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and OVSC provided: "This agreement shall be binding upon the Company and the Organization and their successors and assigns." (Jt. Exh. 3, p. 5.)

[12] The record is somewhat inconsistent and confusing with regard to the precise dates and events during the 6-day period commencing 18 June. However, a composite of the material facts during the aforenoted timeframe, as related herein, is essentially undisputed.

[13] A "bone" involves a car sold by a manager for which a salesman is given credit for commission purposes. The salesmen had complained about the manner in which bones were assigned. While no changes were agreed to at that meeting, the discussions thereon eventually led to, inter alia, revisions in the house deal system. Thus, after July, the bones were rotated among the salesmen. Similarly, the salesmen had complained that phone-ups were distributed unfairly. Phone-ups refer to a system by which customer phone calls are distributed. Formerly, the company telephone operator routed the call directly to the manager, who in turn, passed this call or potential sale to one of his salesmen. This system was revised (after July) by the operator bypassing the manager and paging the sales floor so that any salesman answering the page got the call. As for the pension plan, the Company later agreed to increase its contribution to 2 percent of the salesman's salary. Again, these items were only explored in June but not agreed to until July.

About 24 June, William Francis gave Marazzi a two-page document dated 23 June summarizing recent events dealing with the affiliation vote and union representation, which was signed by nearly all the employees (Jt. Exh. 11). The summary included an "understanding" that Respondent would make an "immediate response" to employee grievances dealing with phone-ups, house deals, or bones and the pension plan. The concluding paragraph in the summary document stated as follows:

> It was suggested and discussed among members attending this [liaison committee] meeting that the letter of the 18th [sic] of June be withdrawn and dialogues kept open on all issues above.

To Hynansky, the aforenoted document constituted "a withdrawal of the grievance" over the Company's failure to recognize the Teamsters. In early July, Len Baldino handed Marazzi another grievance under Section 7 of Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement with OVSC over Respondent's refusal to recognize the Teamsters as the assignee or successor to OVSC.[14] According to Hynansky, as Baldino was not a representative of OVSC, he would not discuss the grievance. By letter dated 6 July, Attorney Suflas responded to Baldino's grievance stating the Company's position as follows:

> [Y]our grievance was not properly filed and it is not arbitrable or cognizable under the terms of the Company's current collective-bargaining agreement with the Organization of Vehicle Sales Counselors [Jt. Exh. 14].

Along with the aforenoted response, Attorney Suflas provided Baldino a copy of his earlier letter to the Teamsters dated 29 May disputing the legality of the affiliation vote.

On 11 July, Hynansky once more addressed the entire sales force, at a meeting at Respondent's facility, over employee grievances and the subject of union representation. He continued to dispute the legality of the affiliation vote and expressed a willingness to deal only with representatives of OVSC over employee problems. Hynansky indicated that he was receptive to employee complaints about inequities in the house deal and phone-up programs and over the pension plan but only in a setting free of Teamsters representation. According to Hynansky, the two union situations generated much confusion and prevented any open dialogue with employees over their grievances and he therefore asked for a "vote of confidence." Hynansky left the room to permit the employees to decide by themselves whether to press for Teamsters representation or to open dialogue as OVSC members. This latter condition was clearly favored by Hynansky. However, the employees could not then agree on a course of action and decided not to conduct a vote.

On 12 July, Francis called another meeting of the OVSC membership and pressed for another election as urged by Hynansky. This was not without opposition as some employees considered the earlier affiliation vote designating the Teamsters as their bargaining representative as valid. A heated encounter between Francis and employee Edward Lipman (who opposed another election) ensued. Lipman challenged Francis' authority pointing out that he was no longer president and that OVSC no longer existed. Lipman, unable to prevent another election at that time, left the room in protest and did not vote. Len Baldino testified that, although he was with a customer at the time the vote was taken, he was told (by someone unnamed) that the employees voted 18 to 4 against Teamsters representation. In any event, it is undisputed that a majority of the employees voted against the Teamsters on that occasion. Later that day, Francis gave Hynansky a document signed by most of the employees abandoning their interest in the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 17). The document stated as follows:

> We desire to continue a direct dialogue with the Company on all issues regarding our employment. We do not wish to be represented by Teamsters Local 115. We hereby nullify the affiliation vote taken on May 11, 1984.

On 16 July, Hynansky, Hatzis, and Marazzi met with OVSC representatives and employees Francis, Wilson, Fearow, and Stasny and reached a memorandum of understanding (Jt. Exh. 31), which contained, principally, revisions in phone-ups, house deals, and an increase in the company pension plan contribution to 2 percent of the annual salary for each employee.[15]

In mid-July and within a few days of the employee petition rejecting the Teamsters, Lipman had a conversation with Respondent's general sales manager, Richard Cusato, after work, at Shepherds Inn in Cherry Hill, New Jersey, over company reprisals as a result of employee support for that union. While it is undisputed that the subject of reprisals had come up on that occasion, the respective accounts provided by Lipman and Cusato are vastly different.

According to Lipman, Cusato told him on the occasion in question that the Company knew the identity of the Teamsters supporters and maintained a "hit list" of those supporters it intended to fire. At that time Cusato also assertedly disclosed that he had a tape of an employee meeting at the Gloucester Inn where they had explored substituting outside union representation for the OVSC and decided to search for such a union. According to Lipman, Cusato convinced him that the Company had such a tape because he recited nearly word for word statements made by him (Lipman) and employee William Casey at that meeting.

[14] This grievance (Jt. Exh. 13) was signed by Baldino, as a Teamsters representative, unlike the earlier grievance (Jt. Exh. 9), which was signed by all the OVSC members. Baldino had been in Florida for a 2- to 3-week period in June and missed some of the events leading to withdrawal of the earlier grievance.

[15] According to Hynansky, the Company had intended to increase its pension contribution to only 1 percent at that meeting, but the "goodwill" generated by the employees in signing the petition on 12 July rejecting the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 17), encouraged the Company to fatten its contribution to 2 percent. Further, in that same spirit of "good will" it decided to rescind all prior employee disciplinary warnings contained in their personnel files.

On the other hand, Cusato testified that Lipman introduced the subjects of "hit list" and "tape recordings" in the conversation. According to Cusato, Lipman was under the impression that the Company had a list of employees (Teamsters supporters) which included Lipman's name targeted for dismissal. Cusato testified that he told Lipman that he had no knowledge of any such list or tape of any union meeting and in fact, asserted, that he has no such knowledge.

Lipman also testified, without corroboration, that around mid-July, he had a brief encounter with Marazzi over his support for the Teamsters. According to Lipman, and denied by Marazzi, the latter shouted at him and Len Baldino and told them that they were not going to tell him how to run his business. Further, during this conversation Marazzi also stated "You know, the cards are stacked against you guys. You should be smart enough to know you can't win this thing." Marazzi denied that any such conversation occurred.

On another occasion, as testified by Lipman, in late August, he had a much more lengthy conversation with Marazzi, in his office, about the Union. According to Lipman, he continued to press for Teamsters recognition without any success. Marazzi assertedly told Lipman that the owners would go to any length, including selling the facility, to keep that Union out. Marazzi on the other hand places this meeting in late October and, although he acknowledged that the subject of the Union came up, his version of what transpired at that session is substantially different from the account provided by Lipman. Marazzi testified that Lipman asked him why the Company refused to recognize the Teamsters and he, in turn, responded, that OVSC has always been the recognized Union and under the advice of counsel, the Company will continue to recognize that organization. He denied, inter alia, that he told Lipman that the owner's would close down the facility or go to any length to avoid dealing with the Teamsters. According to Marazzi, most of that session was devoted to Lipman's performance as a salesperson, which assertedly was not up to par.

In mid-October, Respondent resumed deducting dues from employees' salary for OVSC. That month, Francis, as president of OVSC, called the first membership meeting since July. According to Lipman, there was a good deal of confusion over the bargaining status of OVSC given the earlier Teamsters affiliation vote, the recent resumption of dues, and the fact that the OVSC had not conducted a membership meeting since July. A motion was made from the floor and carried to elect new OVSC officers. On 24 October, an election by secret ballot was conducted whereby Lipman and Bob Wyatt were elected president and secretary, respectively, and William Casey reelected treasurer.

Within a few days, Hatzis congratulated Lipman on being elected president and asked him to name the other officers. According to Lipman, Hatzis also pressed for the minutes of the OVSC meeting. This was denied by Hatzis. While Hatzis acknowledged that he referred to the minutes, he asserted that he did so because Lipman told him that he forgot who else was elected. According to Hatzis, he made inquiries regarding the identities of the new officers because it was soon time to commence negotiating a new collective-bargaining agreement and he wanted to know the identities comprising the union negotiating team. Hatzis and Lipman continued to disagree at that time whether the Company's bargaining obligation was with OVSC or the Teamsters, with Lipman, notwithstanding his elective office with OVSC, still supporting the Teamsters.

About 12 November, Marazzi met with Lipman and Len Baldino at the Hideaway Restaurant and the question of the Company's bargaining obligation, vis-a-vis, the Teamsters or OVSC was raised once again. According to Lipman and Baldino, the former urged Marazzi to recognize and bargain with the Teamsters. Baldino testified that he was asked by Lipman to attend that meeting because he was a Teamsters representative. While there was no tangible movement on the question of union representation, Marazzi testified that Lipman told him that if the OVSC leadership was happy with the outcome of contract negotiations, it would recommend that the sales force support the organization.

By letter dated 15 November, the Teamsters served notice on Respondent of its desire to terminate the collective-bargaining agreement due to expire 28 February 1985.[16] (Jt. Exh. 25.) Respondent was then involved in ongoing related Federal court litigation contesting, inter alia, the Teamsters' standing as a "successor" or "assign" to the OVSC.[17] By letter dated 20 November, Respondent restated its position, to wit, that it was not obligated to bargain with the Teamsters and would not negotiate with that Union as representative of its salesmen. (Jt. Exh. 26.)

In early December, Marazzi wrote to Lipman, in the latter's capacity as president of OVSC, about meeting to commence negotiations with the organization for a new collective-bargaining agreement (Jt. Exh. 27). Marazzi also requested a letter from Lipman "listing all of the newly elected officers of the organization."

[16] As noted previously, the Teamsters contends that after the affiliation, it replaced OVSC as a party to the collective-bargaining agreement by virtue of the Sec. 7 successors-and-assigns provision therein. The aforenoted notice was sent in compliance with sec. 30 of that agreement, which requires either party desiring to terminate the agreement to provide written notice at least 90 days before the expiration date. (Jt. Exh. 2.)

[17] On July 6, 1984, the Teamsters filed a demand for arbitration with the American Arbitration Association. The Respondent, on 9 August, filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey to enjoin this action (Jt. Exh. 22). On 7 March 1985, District Judge Stanley S. Brotman found, inter alia, that the Company was not bound by the collective-bargaining agreement to bargain or arbitrate with the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 23). Respondent contends that the Board is collaterally estopped from deciding the refusal-to-recognize-and-bargain allegations.

Lipman was discharged on 13 December. On 20 December, Lipman filed a grievance asserting that Marazzi discharged him without just cause in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement (Jt. Exh. 29). At that time, Lipman appeared at Respondent's facility accompanied by two Teamsters business representatives who asked Marazzi to discuss Lipman's discharge. Marazzi noted that the Company does not recognize the Teamsters and refused to discuss Lipman's grievance. A moment or two later Hatzis took the same position.[18]

In early January 1985, Richard L. Wilson was elected the new president of OVSC. Soon after, Hatzis approached Wilson with regard to commencing negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement.[19] The negotiations commenced about 10 January and, in all, there were five bargaining sessions culminating in the current collective-bargaining agreement effective by its terms 27 March 1985 through 27 March 1989 (Jt. Exh. 2).

B. Discussion and Conclusions

1. The 8(a)(5) allegations

It is undisputed that this case turns largely on whether the affiliation in question was valid. The General Counsel, in urging that the affiliation be upheld, contends, that the Board's requirements for "minimal due process" and "continuity of representation" were clearly met. In so contending, the General Counsel relies heavily on Quemetco, Inc., 226 NLRB 1398 (1976), asserting that the facts in the instant case "are identical in [many] respects to those in Quemetco."

Although it is undisputed that adequate notice of the meeting to vote on affiliation was provided, that all unit employees had an opportunity to cast secret ballots, and that a majority of them voted by a 17-to-12 margin in favor of affiliation, Respondent contends that the vote was nonetheless defective and fell short because, under the OVSC constitution, a two-thirds vote was required. However, Respondent's principal challenge to the validity of the affiliation relative to the allegations herein is that it assertedly created a break in the "continuity of representation." According to Respondent, the newly affiliated union (Local 115), with different officers, a substantially larger constituency of approximately 2500 members, and a different constitution and bylaws, constituted a new and separate entity that no longer ensured the employees of the continuity of their bargaining representative. As such, and in reliance on Gulf Oil Corp., 135 NLRB 184 (1962), and its progeny, Respondent denies that it was obligated to recognize and bargain with the Teamsters because the attempted affiliation, in the face of contract-bar principles (at best) prematurely raised a question concerning representation (QCR).[20]

Whether under Quemetco, relied on by the General Counsel, which involved a refusal-to-recognize allegation under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, or Gulf Oil, relied on by Respondent, which involved a motion to amend a certification under Section 9(b) of the Act (see also 29 C.F.R. 102.60 (b)), the Board, in dealing with affiliations, basically considers the same factors. See Independent Drug Store Owners, 211 NLRB 701 fn. 2 (1974); Newspapers, Inc., 210 NLRB 8, 9 fns. 2 and 4 (1974). In either situation the newly affiliated organization is seeking the Board's imprimatur as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. Newspapers, supra at 10 fn. 13.

The Quemetco approach perceives efforts to affiliate as essentially internal union matters so long as they allow for minimal due process "with respect to registering the desires of the employees." Quemetco, supra at 1399. Accord: Williamson Co., 244 NLRB 953, 955 (1979); see generally New Orleans Public Service, 237 NLRB 919 (1978). Under Quemetco concepts, once the employees' desires have been registered favoring affiliation, the only "legitimate interest" an employer has in "continuity of representation" is that the newly affiliated organization honor all the contractual commitments of its predecessor (the original contracting labor organization). Quemetco, supra at 1399.

On the other hand, in Gulf Oil, in which a majority of the employees of one local (Local 715) favored a merger with another local (Local 826) of the same International union and in which Local 826 expressed its willingness to honor the contractual responsibilities of Local 715, such factors were not enough to carry a motion to amend the certification. The Board rejected the motion stating as follows:

> [I]t appears that the changes contemplated by Local 715 are not simple administrative structural changes. There is no indication that the changes are designed to insure to the employees presently represented by Local 715 a continuity of representation. Rather it appears that the change would result in a complete loss of the identity of Local 715, and the substitution of a new and different local union as representative of the employees in the unit for which Local 715 was certified. From this, it is clear that the . . . motion constitute[s] an attempt to raise a question concern-

[18] Marazzi testified without contradiction that on 26 December, he discussed Lipman's grievance with the grievance committee of OVSC and they agreed with the Company's action. While the grievance was not processed further, the subject of Lipman's discharge was incorporated in the unfair labor practice charges filed in January 1985 and subsequently alleged as a discriminatory discharge within the meaning of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. As noted previously, certain of the allegations including Lipman's alleged discriminatory discharge were settled at the opening of the instant trial.

[19] According to Wilson, the affiliation vote designating the Teamsters as the employees' bargaining representative, which he supported, was valid, even during contract negotiations in 1985. However, he asserted that he reluctantly participated in those negotiations because, inter alia, the Company refused to recognize the Teamsters.

[20] The Board's contract-bar rule generally precludes an election or a QCR from being raised for 3 years or the term of the contract, whichever is shorter. General Cable Corp., 139 NLRB 1123 (1962). Respondent also devoted substantial attention to a trilogy of Third Circuit decisions, where, in each case the court refused to uphold the affiliation for a failure to establish continuity of representation. See United States Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 660 (3d Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Bernard Gloekler North East Co., 540 F.2d 197 (3d Cir. 1976); Sun Oil Co. of Pennsylvania v. NLRB, 576 F.2d 533 (3d Cir. 1978). With due respect to the court, while I have carefully noted these cases, I am also mindful of the fact that I am bound by outstanding Board precedent unless the Supreme Court has decided the matter in question. Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1963).

> ing representation . . . . The Act and the Board policy, however require that such matters be determined through a petition and secret ballot of the employees concerned [pp. 184–185, emphasis added].

Thus, given the aforenoted Gulf Oil considerations, unlike the more limited standards expressed by the Board in Quemetco, an employer may legitimately and successfully challenge the bargaining status of a merged or affiliated organization where the identity of the absorbed or original contractual organization has been lost or sufficiently changed. This is so, even where, as a concomitant of such change, there is a willingness to continue to honor all contractual commitments. The employer in such circumstances may refuse to recognize the new organization at least until it has timely established its majority status in a Board-conducted election. Accord: Independent Drug Store Owners, supra (involving an employer's refusal to recognize and bargain). However, while Gulf Oil considerations are still viable, Quemetco, which at times has been ignored, also has never been expressly overruled.[21]

Basically, I find in agreement with the General Counsel that the instant case closely resembles the circumstances presented in Quemetco. Thus, in both situations, inter alia, an independent labor organization, comprised solely of employees employed at a single facility, attempted to affiliate with the same International union, the Teamsters. Further, in both situations adequate notice was provided and all unit employees had an opportunity to cast secret ballots with a result favoring affiliation. Although the vote in favor of affiliation was unanimous in Quemetco; whereas, in the instant case, a majority voted to affiliate, the Board only requires that the proposed change be approved by a simple majority. See Williamson Co., supra at 955. Because in neither case were unit employees precluded from participating in the affiliation vote, the democratic voting procedures necessary to establish minimal due process were satisfied.[22] See NLRB v. Newspapers, Inc., 515 F.2d 334, 339 (5th Cir. 1975); Insulfab Plastics, 274 NLRB 817, 822 (1985); Williamson Co., supra at 955 fn. 10. Cf. Jasper Seating Co., 231 NLRB 1025, 1026 (1977) (nonmembers were not provided an adequate opportunity to vote); Amoco IV, supra.

Having found that minimal due-process requirements were met, the remaining question vis-a-vis a valid affiliation determination, is whether the change constituted a substantial break in the continuity of representation. Again, here, as well as in the Quemetco, the affiliated union clearly manifested its intention to honor all contractual commitments. As noted previously, inter alia, in Quemetco, the aforenoted factor is all that is necessary to satisfy this critical element. On the other hand, also as noted previously, a willingness to honor all contractual commitments falls short of satisfying the standards of Gulf Oil, and its progeny. Thus, the Board in treating "continuity," has taken into account such factors as whether the union has retained the same union leadership; whether it continues to administer the contract; and whether it has otherwise maintained autonomy over such matters as contract negotiations, strikes, and processing of grievances. Compare Hamilton Tool Co., 190 NLRB 571, 575 (1971) (affiliation upheld where the employer was informed that the officers would be the same), Newspapers, supra (merger upheld where "the same people who had represented [the affected employees] prior to the merger continued to do so after the merger") with Independent Drug Store Owners, supra (merger not upheld where all the officers were different). See also J. Ray McDermott & Co. v. NLRB, 571 F.2d 850, 858 (5th Cir. 1978) (upheld where, inter alia, autonomy, dues structure, and leadership remained unchanged); NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1111-1112 (1st Cir. 1975) (merger upheld, where, inter alia, the original local continued to negotiate contracts for the affected employees as well as administer the collective-bargaining agreements to which it was a party), New Orleans Public Service, 237 NLRB at 921 (affiliation upheld where, inter alia, the affiliating local retained the right to negotiate its own collective-bargaining agreement and process its own grievances through the same elected individuals).

Aside from noting that Quemetco involved a refusal-to-recognize-and-bargain allegation; whereas, the underlying document in Gulf Oil was a motion to amend the certification (which difference for reasons noted previously is not deemed material), the cases cannot really be reconciled. However, while neither case has been expressly overruled, the overwhelming weight of Board and court decisions tend to either ignore Quemetco or favor the Gulf Oil approach. For example, more recently, in Charlie Brown's, 271 NLRB 378 (1984), the Board refused to certify a local union that won a Board-conducted election but that had its International organization impose a trusteeship on a part of the winning union. There the Board determined that the change was structural and "raise[d] a question as to continuity of representation, requiring a showing that it reflects the employees' desires." The Board, citing Newspapers Inc., 210 NLRB 8 (1974), stated that employees' desires in such cases is our "primary concern." As the employees' desires with regard to the disputed change were either ignored or had not been demonstrated, the Board, set aside the election and dismissed the petition. In effect, the Board treated employees' desires as a threshold matter stating: "We therefore do not discuss the other factors that we would usually examine in determining continuity of representation." (Id. at fn. 4.)[23] As examples of such factors the Board cited Montgomery Ward, 188 NLRB 551 (1971), Canton Sign Co., 174 NLRB 906, 908 (1969), and significantly Gulf Oil.[24]

[21] See generally Baldor Electric Co., 258 NLRB 1325 (1981). The Board more recently has rejected the notion that affiliations are purely internal union matters. Amoco Production Co., 262 NLRB 1240 (1982), affd. 721 F.2d 150 (5th Cir. 1982) (Amoco IV). Amoco, however, is factually distinguishable from Quemetco, as all unit employees were not permitted an opportunity to vote. In any event the subject is not yet settled. See NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees Local 1182) Seattle-First National Bank) v. NLRB, 752 F.2d 356 (9th Cir. 1984), [affd. 475 U.S. 192 (1986)].

[22] I reject Respondent's contention that the affiliation vote was defective because it fell short of a two-thirds vote for any decision "to change or delete any part of the Constitution," as required by art. XIX of the OVSC constitution. Strict adherence to the constitution is not a controlling factor, where as here, all unit employees had an adequate opportunity to express their desires in secret and a clear majority voted to affiliate. See Newspapers, supra at 9 fn. 3; East Dayton Tool & Die Co., 190 NLRB 577, 579 (1971); see also Hamilton Tool Co., 190 NLRB 571, 574 fn. 8 (1971).

Noting the foregoing, I am persuaded that the Board is not yet ready to abandon Gulf Oil considerations. As for Quemetco, it is noted that even where treated approvingly, there are other factors in those cases tending to support "continuity" over and above a commitment to honor contractual obligations such as the retention of union leadership and organizational autonomy. Williamson Co., supra; New Orleans Public Service, supra. In Newspapers, Inc. (relied on so heavily by the Board in Quemetco), the Board there noted that the "same people" continued to represent the affected employees and, in pertinent part, added as follows:

> This factor, that the employees involved are assured the continuity of their present organization and representation, has been deemed of primary importance. . . . See The Hamilton Tool Co., 190 NLRB 571, Gulf Oil Corporation, 135 NLRB 184 [210 NLRB 8, 9, fn. 2, emphasis added].

Thus, while in order to establish minimal due process in affiliation-type cases, it is of primary importance to register employees' desires, the continuity principles (as noted above) have also been deemed to be of "primary importance." It is this latter element, where I find little or no support for the Quemetco approach.[25] I am therefore unpersuaded that reliance thereon, as urged by the General Counsel, is warranted. It follows then that the General Counsel has failed to satisfy the continuity principles by merely showing that the Teamsters had committed itself to honor all contractual obligations. Aside from the aforenoted factor, there is a dearth of evidence supporting this critical element. Indeed, if the affiliation were permitted to stand, it would have effectively obliterated all traces of the OVSC. The organization's funds and assets would have been commingled with the affiliated Teamsters, the OVSC leadership would have been fully replaced by Teamsters officers, and the OVSC union affairs would have been governed in accordance with the Teamsters' constitution and bylaws. As such, the Teamsters, for bargaining purposes, do not qualify as a successor organization, but rather constitutes a new and different union.[26] Given the contract-bar principles referred to previously (see fn. 20, supra), the Respondent was not under any obligation to deal with the Teamsters.

Accordingly, I find that the Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to recognize and bargain with the Teamsters in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.[27]

2. The 8(a)(2) allegations

These allegations are largely predicated on the premise that the purported affiliation was valid. The OVSC had transferred its treasury and assets to the Teamsters and Respondent had stopped deducting OVSC dues from its employees' paychecks. The Teamsters, assertedly, had become the successor to OVCS's representational and contractual rights. The OVSC, assertedly, had become defunct. According to the General Counsel, the Respondent, by making it known that it would deal only with the OVSC, thereby coercively conveyed to its employees the futility of their continued support for the Teamsters. As such, it is contended that the Respondent unlawfully induced employees to abandon the Teamsters and, correspondingly, after a 5-week hiatus, it also unlawfully contributed to the resurrection of the OVSC. According to the General Counsel, the "new OVSC" as reconstituted, after the 5-week hiatus, was a separate labor organization different from its predecessor of the same name.

Other 8(a)(2) allegations involve Respondent's statements, acts, and conduct in dealing with and favoring the "new OVSC" over the Teamsters. These include the resumption of dues deductions on October 16, the processing of Lipman's discharge grievance in December, and executing a new collective-bargaining agreement with the OVSC on March 27, 1985.

In rejecting these allegations, I rely principally on my earlier finding that the purported affiliation was invalid for bargaining purposes. Thus, the General Counsel's premise is faulty. Given the finding that the affiliated Teamsters did not constitute a "successor" organization, and noting that the Teamsters prematurely demanded representational rights in the face of an outstanding collective-bargaining agreement (contract-bar principles, fn. 20 supra), the Respondent's bargaining obligation extended only to the contractual party, the OVSC. See NLRB v. Marcus Trucking Co., 286 F.2d 583, 593 (2d Cir. 1961); Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB 1213, 1214 (1980); Universal Tool & Stamping Co., 182 NLRB 254, 259 (1970). If, however, the OVSC had effectively dissolved itself, as contended by the General Counsel, or if a schism was involved, such would have relieved Respondent from its bargaining obligations and raised a question concerning representation to be resolved at a Board election. See Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 NLRB 901, 911 (1958); Universal Tools, supra. The General Counsel makes much of the 5-week hiatus (from the May 11 affiliation vote to Respondent's meeting with the OVSC liaison committee about 21 June), in contending that the OVSC resurfaced as a new and different organization. On the total state of evidence before me, I cannot agree.

[23] This two-tier approach is not confined to Charlie Brown's. See, e.g., Port Chester Nursing Home, 269 NLRB 150 fn. 2 (1984); F. W. Woolworth Co., 268 NLRB 805, 806 fn. 6 (1984); Amoco IV, supra.

[24] Although both Montgomery Ward and Canton Sign represent cases in which the changes in question were validated, those cases are factually distinguishable from Quemetco. In Montgomery Ward, inter alia, the same business agent continued to service the affected employees. In Canton Sign, inter alia, the employer first recognized and then declined to further recognize and bargain with the so-called successor union.

[25] As pointed out by Respondent in its brief, even the Ninth Circuit in Financial Institution Employees v. NLRB, 752 F.2d 356 (1984), called into question the Board's Amoco IV approach (that affiliation procedures are not merely internal union matters), it is noteworthy that the court went to great lengths to define and explain the continuity of representation tests in terms consistent with the non-Quemetco cases.

[26] I am unpersuaded that the successors and assigns provision, as urged by the General Counsel, without more, contemplates the affiliation of the OVSC with another union, particularly, as the changes herein were not merely technical but would have resulted in a complete loss of identity of the OVSC.

[27] As the instant case involved representation case issues, I have rejected Respondent's collateral estoppel defense (fn. 17 supra). See, e.g., Port Chester Nursing Home, supra, fn. 3. I also reject Respondent's contention that it had a good-faith doubt regarding the Teamsters majority on the basis that the employees had repudiated that organization. The record disclosed that the employees repudiated the Teamsters only after the Respondent made it clear that it would only deal with the OVSC.

It has long been noted that "mere temporary inability to function does not constitute defunctness." Hershey Chocolate Corp., supra at 911. See also Harbor Carriers of the Port of N.Y. v. NLRB, 306 F.2d 89, 94 (2d Cir. 1962) (old organization deemed viable notwithstanding the defection of officers and the seizure of assets to the new organization). It is not surprising that the OVSC engaged in little or no formal union activity in the brief 5-week period following the affiliation vote because serious and legitimate questions were raised by the employer regarding the identity of the bargaining representative. See Universal Tools, supra at 260. The employer's action in bypassing the Teamsters and favoring the OVSC during this period of confusion and uncertainty appears vindicated given the finding that the Teamsters did not represent an organizational continuation of the OVSC, but rather a separate and different union.[28] After all, the OVSC was the contracting party, the incumbent union. As noted by the Board in RCA Del Caribe, 262 NLRB 963, 965 (1982), "unlike initial organizing situations, an employer in an existing collective-bargaining relationship cannot observe strict neutrality." This somewhat exalted position for an incumbent union is deemed to be in the interest of "industrial stability" and consistent with the purposes of the Act.

In the instant case, affiliation was opposed by a substantial minority, approximately 40 percent of the unit. Moreover, while the Employer stopped deducting OVSC dues from employees' paychecks shortly after the affiliation, there is no evidence tending to show that any OVSC member or unit employee requested this action. Further, given the rejection of the affiliation herein, it would appear that the OVSC constitution and bylaws remained intact. As for the attempted dissolution of the OVSC after the affiliation vote, this too must be assessed in an appropriate context. For example, as the Teamsters had no contractual standing as a successor or otherwise, the OVSC remained the contracting party. The employees clearly recognized the viability of that collective-bargaining agreement by filing a grievance thereunder, albeit, the document manifested support for the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 9). It is also noted that none of the OVSC officers formally resigned after the affiliation or at any time during the hiatus period. They, as well as the OVSC liaison committee were accessible and amenable to discuss unit problems and to administer the contract. This in fact was done commencing about June 21, after the brief 5-week hiatus. Under all the foregoing circumstances, I cannot find that OVSC became defunct or disappeared. Rather, after a temporary interlude, when it became clear that Respondent would not deal with the Teamsters (a legitimate position in the circumstances herein), the OVSC resumed its active role as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

As the incumbency remained viable, the Respondent was obligated under the Act, and consistent with contract-bar principles, to continue to recognize and bargain with the OVSC. In this regard, I find, inter alia, that the Respondent properly dealt with the OVSC rather than the Teamsters over such matters as Lipman's discharge grievance.

As for the resumption of dues deductions, it is noted that the then outstanding collective-bargaining agreement provided for the deduction of dues from the wages of all salesmen who had provided written authorization. (Jt. Exh. 3, p. 2.) As noted previously, the record is devoid of any evidence tending to show that any unit employee withdrew that authorization. As the General Counsel's contention is based on the faulty premise that the Teamsters were then the exclusive bargaining agent rather than the OVSC, I find that this allegation is without merit. The General Counsel contends, for essentially the same reason, that Respondent unlawfully executed the new collective-bargaining agreement on March 27, 1985. In the absence of having the May 11 affiliation vote upheld, the Teamsters did not have any standing at the time the new agreement was negotiated and executed. The Teamsters' support was dated and not cognizable having come at a time when the old contract still had some 9 months to run and no question concerning representation could be raised. There was no evidence of fresh or timely support for the Teamsters such as new authorization cards. In these circumstances, I find that the disputed collective-bargaining agreement was lawfully executed at a time when the Teamsters' interest did not comprise a substantial rival claim and raise a question concerning representation.

In short, I find all the 8(a)(2) allegations to be without merit and I shall recommend that these allegations be dismissed in their entirety.

3. The 8(a)(1) allegations

The record disclosed that on 11 July, Hynansky told his entire sales force that he was receptive to improving the house deal, phone-up program, and pension plan but only in a setting free of Teamsters interference. Hynansky also informed his employees on that occasion that he would only recognize and bargain with the OVSC and not the Teamsters. I find, contrary to the General Counsel, that Hynansky's statements, in the circumstances of this case, did not constitute violations of Section 8(a)(1).

Although Hynansky indicated a willingness on the occasion in question to improve the house deal and phone-up programs and pension plan, the record disclosed that these matters had been under discussion for months and before the advent of the Teamsters. In any event, contrary to the General Counsel, I have already found that the Teamsters did not have any representative standing vis-a-vis the unit employees at the time in question or at any time material herein. As Respondent was not then legally obligated to bargain with the Teamsters, the General Counsel's assertion that Respondent unlawfully bypassed the Teamsters cannot be maintained.

[28] As noted previously, Attorney Suflas, by letter dated May 29, notified the Teamsters that it deemed the affiliation ineffective because, inter alia, it "represent[ed] a break in the continuity of representation," (Jt. Exh. 8).

Similarly, I cannot find that Hynansky unlawfully conveyed to employees that it would be futile for them to support the Teamsters because Respondent would only deal with the OVSC. As I have previously rejected the attempted affiliation, the Teamsters did not become a successor to the OVSC for bargaining purposes. Neither the Respondent nor the OVSC ever repudiated the collective-bargaining agreement. Given the contract-bar principles discussed previously, the Teamsters could not then raise a QCR or a cognizable rival claim. In these circumstances, Hynansky was free to communicate the Company's legal position that it would only bargain with the OVSC. In short, I find that the Respondent, by Hynansky's statements, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) as alleged.

Additionally, certain statements were ascribed to General Manager Marazzi, that he conveyed to employees that it was futile for them to continue to support the Teamsters. In support thereof, the General Counsel relied principally on the testimony of Edward Lipman, a former employee. In this regard, Lipman testified that Marazzi told him on two occasions that "the cards were stacked against" employees supporting the Teamsters and that they could "never win." Further, Lipman testified that on the second of these occasions Marazzi warned him that the owners would go to any length and if need be, sell the business in order to keep the Teamsters out.

Marazzi, on the other hand, admitted only that he would not deal with the Teamsters on the advice of counsel and conveyed this position to employees including Lipman. He denied making the other statements ascribed to him by Lipman.

As noted above (Hynansky discussion), because the Teamsters were not a successor organization and could not raise a QCR at the time of Marazzi's remarks, I find that Marazzi could lawfully refuse to deal with the Teamsters and advise the employees of this position. With regard to the other remarks ascribed to Marazzi, they are disputed and rest solely on credibility.

I credit Marazzi's denials over Lipman's assertions. In doing so, I rely on demeanor as well as certain questionable actions taken by Lipman tending to cast doubt on the reliability of his testimony. For example, the record disclosed that Lipman joined nearly all the other employees in signing a document withdrawing an earlier grievance over Respondent's refusal to recognize the Teamsters (Jt. Exh. 11). According to Lipman, he signed this document without reading it or knowing what was contained thereon. Although Lipman characterized this action as a "mistake," this does little to dispel a perception of duplicity on his part. Thus I view with suspicion Lipman's later accession to the presidency of the OVSC. According to Lipman, he accepted the position so that he could turn over the reigns of the OVSC to the Teamsters. It appears to me that, however, Lipman was playing both ends against the middle in order to extract from the Company a more favorable offer for the new collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, I credit Marazzi's uncontroverted testimony that Lipman told him at a meeting on 9 November that if he were happy with the upcoming negotiations, he would recommend that the employees support the OVSC, but, if not, he would recommend that they support the Teamsters.

In these circumstances, I am unpersuaded that the General Counsel has established by credible evidence that Marazzi made the threats ascribed to him by Lipman, or that he otherwise violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend that these allegations be dismissed.

Still further, it is contended that General Sales Manager Cusato conveyed the impression to Lipman that the employees' activities in support of the Teamsters were under surveillance by Respondent. Lipman testified that at a meeting with Cusato in July at the Shepherd's Inn, the latter tried to dissuade him from supporting the Teamsters and referred to a "hit list" maintained by the Company of employees suspected of supporting the Teamsters. Further, Lipman testified that Cusato told him that the Company knew the identity of the employees who voted for the Teamsters in the affiliation election and that the Company had a tape of an April meeting where OVSC members discussed whether to search for an outside union. According to Lipman, while he did not believe Cusato at first, the latter proceeded to recite almost word for word what was stated at that April meeting.

As noted previously, Cusato provided a vastly different account. Aside from Cusato's denials regarding Lipman's main assertions, the former testified that it was Lipman (not Cusato) who introduced the subject of the tapes by asking Cusato whether he knew anything about it. Cusato testified that Lipman told him that employee Ed Stasny had a tape recorder at one of the meetings. According to Cusato, he had no knowledge of any "hit list" or tapes and conveyed that to Lipman.

I credit Cusato over Lipman in all material respects where their testimony is in conflict. As noted above in discussing the allegations relative to Marazzi, I found Lipman's testimony unreliable in material respects. On the other hand, I found Cusato to be responsive, forthright, and impressive. It is noted for example that Cusato did deny that the meeting in question took place or that the subject of tapes had come up. As Lipman had engaged in some questionable actions bordering on duplicity (noted previously), I find Cusato's account more likely, to wit, that Lipman introduced the subject of the tapes at the meeting. In crediting Cusato, it is also noted that the occasion in question was a chance meeting, and there is no other evidence linking Cusato with statements, acts, or conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(1). In these circumstances, I shall recommend that all allegations relative to Cusato also be dismissed as not supported by credible evidence.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The OVSC and Teamsters are and have been, at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent did not engage in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint, as amended.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[29]

ORDER

The complaint, as amended, is dismissed in its entirety.

---

[29] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Calloway and Company and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 934. Case 5-CA-19110

June 14, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 934, the Union, on September 16, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint against Calloway and Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging and/or laying off employee H. Larry Haga from its Bristol, Virginia jobsite for engaging in protected concerted and union activity. Although properly served copies of the charge and complaint, the Respondent failed to file an answer.

On April 11, 1988, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment and Memorandum in Support, with exhibits attached. On April 19, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent timely filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that a Board agent from Region 5 attempted to contact the Respondent's president, Roscoe Calloway, by telephone on February 1, 1988, and, Calloway being unavailable, left a message that the Respondent had not filed an answer, that an additional period of time for filing would be granted, and that unless an answer was received by February 16, 1988, a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed. By letter of February 1, 1988, served on the Respondent by certified mail, the Board agent repeated the above information, including the Regional Director's intention to file a Motion for Summary Judgment if no answer was received by February 16, 1988. No answer had been received and no request for an extension of time to file an answer had been made by April 6, 1988, the date of the General Counsel's motion.

As a response to the Notice to Show Cause, due and received May 3, 1988, the Respondent submitted a letter from Calloway in which Calloway "attempted to address all issues set forth in . . . [the] original complaint." Specifically, Calloway denies personal knowledge of any union activity on his Bristol, Virginia jobsite by alleged discriminatee Haga or any other person in his employ, and claims that Haga was laid off for cause, i.e., "slothful work attitude and behavior." The letter contains no explanation why the Respondent failed to answer the complaint despite appropriate notice and the warnings that if no answer was forthcoming by February 16, 1988, a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed. Nor does it explain why the Respondent never requested an extension of time in which to file an answer.

Because the Respondent has not explained why it failed to contact the Regional Office concerning an answer or request an extension of time for filing an answer, we find the Respondent has not shown good cause for failing to file a timely answer.[1] Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

1(a) At all times material, the Respondent, a Virginia corporation with an office and place of business in Chesapeake, Virginia, and a jobsite at Bristol, Virginia, the only site involved here, has engaged in the business of electrical contracting work.

(b) During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations described above in paragraph 1(a), provided services valued in excess of $50,000 directly for English Construction Company, Inc., a general contractor within the Commonwealth of Virginia.

(c) English Construction Company, Inc., located in Alta Vista, Virginia, is engaged in the business of general construction contracting work.

[1] Monroe Furniture Co., 231 NLRB 143 (1977). See also Urban Laboratories, 249 NLRB 867 (1980).

(d) During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, English Construction Company, Inc., in the course and conduct of its business operations described above in paragraph 1(c), directly derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for the performance of work outside the Commonwealth of Virginia.

(e) English Construction Company, Inc. is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

(f) The Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

About September 8, 1987, the Respondent at its Bristol, Virginia jobsite discharged and/or laid off its employee H. Larry Haga because he joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Based on the above, we find the Respondent has discriminated, and is discriminating, in regard to the hire or tenure or terms or conditions of employment of its employees, thereby discouraging membership in a labor organization, and the Respondent thereby has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

About September 8, 1987, the Respondent discharged and/or laid off its employee H. Larry Haga because he joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in protected concerted activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent discriminatorily discharged and/or laid off H. Larry Haga, we shall order it to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. We shall also order the Respondent to make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from the date of his discharge and/or layoff to the date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[2] In addition, the Respondent must remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and/or layoff of H. Larry Haga and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge and/or layoff will not be used against him in any way.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Calloway and Company, Chesapeake, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or laying off employees because they engage in protected concerted or union activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer H. Larry Haga immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and/or layoff of H. Larry Haga and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge and/or layoff will not be used against him in any way.

[2] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] The General Counsel requests a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Chesapeake, Virginia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any of you for engaging in protected concerted or union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer H. Larry Haga immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge and/or layoff, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify H. Larry Haga that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and/or layoff and that the discharge and/or layoff will not be used against him in any way.

June 14, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 29, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Philip P. McLeod issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[1]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Metco Products, Inc., Division of Case Manufacturing Company, Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Give effect to the terms of the contract retroactive to June 30, 1987, and make employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's failure to execute and sign this agreement, with backpay to be computed in the manner prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), and interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987)."

---

[1] We shall modify par. 2(b) of the judge's recommended Order to provide that backpay be computed in a manner consistent with Board policy as set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).

Jasper C. Brown Jr., Esq., for the General Counsel.

Charles P. Roberts III, Esq. (Haynsworth, Baldwin, Miles, Johnson, Greaves, & Edwards), of Greensboro, North Carolina, for the Respondent.

Delbert Gordon, of Greensboro, North Carolina, for the Charging Party.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PHILIP P. MCLEOD, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case on 9 December 1987 in Greensboro, North Carolina. The charge that gave rise to the case was filed on 8 July 1987. A complaint and notice of hearing issued on 19 August 1987 that alleges, inter alia, that Metco Products, Inc., Division of Case Manufacturing Company[1] (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by refusing to execute a collective-bargaining agreement agreed on with Communications Workers of America (the Union), the bargaining representative of Respondent's employees.

In its answer to the complaint, Respondent admitted certain allegations including the filing and serving of the charge; its status as an employer within the meaning of the Act; the status of Communications Workers of America as a labor organization within the meaning of the Act; and the status of certain individuals as supervisors and agents of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Respondent denied having engaged in any conduct that would constitute an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the Act.

At the trial, all parties were represented and afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Following the close of the trial, counsel for the General Counsel and Respondent both filed timely briefs with me, which have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Metco Products, Inc., Division of Case Manufacturing Company, is a North Carolina corporation with a place of business in Greensboro, North Carolina, where it produces cabinet furniture. In the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually purchases and receives at its North Carolina facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of North Carolina. In addition, Respondent annually sells and ships from its North Carolina facility products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of North Carolina.

Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Communications Workers of America is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] The complaint and notice of hearing captions this case as indicated and includes various substantive jurisdictional paragraphs that refer to Metco Products, Inc. as being a division of Case Manufacturing Company. In its answer, Respondent titles the caption as Metco being a division of Casard Furniture Manufacturing Company but then proceeds to admit the substantive jurisdictional paragraphs that refer to Metco as being a division of Case. In view of these facts and for the sake of consistency, I have continued to refer to Metco as a division of Case.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At its Greensboro, North Carolina facility, Respondent manufactures ready-to-assemble furniture, including television stands and entertainment centers. It employs approximately 120 production and maintenance employees. In October 1986, an election was conducted among Respondent's production and maintenance employees, which resulted in the Union being certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of these employees.

On 3 November 1986, the Union sent a letter to Paul Saperstein, Respondent's president, requesting to meet and bargain concerning the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement covering unit employees. In response to this request, Attorney Robert Pearlman telephoned Union Representative Delbert Gordon and notified Gordon that he would be representing Respondent during negotiations. The parties held their first negotiation session on 25 November 1986. Thereafter, the parties met approximately eight more times during December 1986 and January, February, March, and June 1987.

The Union's negotiating team included Delbert Gordon, Local Union President Charles Carroll, and employee Kenneth Stalley. At the first negotiating session, Respondent was represented by Attorney Robert Pearlman and Supervisor J. D. Parrish. This was the only meeting that Parrish attended. Thereafter, he was replaced by Plant Manager Larry Clark. At the first session on 25 November, Gordon introduced himself and other members of the Union's negotiating team. Gordon informed Respondent that he was the chief negotiator for the Union and was there with full authority to reach an agreement. Gordon testified credibly and without contradiction that Pearlman responded by stating he was chairman of Respondent's bargaining committee, and that he too was given the authority to negotiate an agreement. The Union then presented Respondent with a package of contract proposals covering everything except wages. The remainder of this meeting was devoted to the parties discussing the Union's proposals and Gordon explaining them where necessary.

During the meetings in December 1986 and January, February, and March 1987, various proposals and counterproposals were exchanged. The primary issues in dispute between the parties related to job security, arbitration, dues checkoff, movement of personnel, job classifications, and wages. Gordon testified without contradiction that the parties reached agreement on the majority of noneconomic issues during the January, February, and March meetings.

Although negotiations were ongoing, the Union received a copy of a letter that Respondent distributed to employees informing employees that the parties were at an impasse. As a result, the Union sought the services of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. Federal Mediator Leonard Duggins was assigned to assist in negotiations. Thereafter, Duggins convened several meetings during March and on 4 June. During the March meetings, the parties did not meet face to face. Instead, Duggins shuttled between the two parties with proposals and counterproposals. Gordon testified without contradiction that during the meeting on 18 March, Duggins transmitted a written proposal from Pearlman in which Respondent increased its wage raise proposal from 15 to 20 cents per hour. Gordon inquired whether Respondent was proposing a 3-year contract. It is undisputed that Pearlman responded in the affirmative.

The final negotiating session between the parties was held by Federal Mediator Duggins on 4 June. The Union was represented by Gordon, Carroll, and Stalley. Respondent was represented by Pearlman. The parties met face to face. Duggins began the meeting by informing Pearlman the Union had told him they were prepared to make major concessions. Duggins then turned to Gordon and allowed him to proceed with the meeting.

Gordon testified that in preparation for this meeting, he made an outline of each proposal submitted by the parties. Gordon utilized this outline in making his remarks during the meeting. Gordon cross-referenced each union proposal with the corresponding proposal from Respondent. Regarding those items that were in dispute, Gordon either agreed to Respondent's proposal or withdrew the Union's demand. Through this process, all issues were resolved. The last two items to be discussed related to the length of time allowed a union representative in the investigation of a grievance and the duration clause of the contract itself. Gordon testified credibly and without contradiction that both of these matters were discussed and agreed on by Pearlman at the meeting on 4 June. Gordon told Pearlman it could take a union representative at least 5 minutes to find the person he might be seeking during an investigation. Gordon asked Pearlman for a 10-minute period to conduct such an investigation. Pearlman agreed.

Gordon asked Pearlman if he was still proposing a 3-year agreement, and Pearlman said he was. Pearlman stated Respondent wanted the contract to become effective on 30 June. Federal Mediator Duggins then suggested that the contract expire on 29 June 1990. Both Pearlman and Gordon agreed to this date. The parties agreed to use the Union's proposed language concerning the duration clause. Gordon then stated that the parties had a contract and Pearlman agreed. Pearlman and Gordon discussed the logistics of preparing clean copies of the agreement in its final form. Pearlman stated he had to go out of town, so Gordon volunteered to have the contract typed in final form for the parties' signature.

Within a few days of the meeting, Gordon mailed copies of the agreement typed in final form to Pearlman and Plant Manager Larry Clark. When Gordon did not hear from Pearlman, Gordon telephoned Pearlman on 22 June and told Pearlman the Union was prepared to meet and sign the agreement. Pearlman told Gordon that he had every intention of signing the agreement, but that he had to run the agreement by Saperstein. Within a few days, Pearlman telephoned Gordon's office and left a message that there were a couple of areas in the agreement he still wanted to review with Saperstein. On 29 June, Gordon again telephoned Pearlman. Pearlman again stated that he had to review the document with Saperstein. Pearlman also stated, however, that Respondent would put the agreed-on wage proposal into effect.

When Gordon questioned Pearlman on this matter, Pearlman hung up.

Respondent admits it retained Pearlman to act as its spokesman in negotiations with the Union. Respondent did not call Pearlman to testify in this proceeding, and Respondent does not dispute the fact that agreement was reached concerning the terms of the contract at the meeting on 4 June. Indeed, in its posttrial brief, Respondent admits that sometimes after the 4 June meeting, Pearlman informed Saperstein that he had reached an agreement with the Union. After reviewing this agreement, Saperstein fired Pearlman because the agreement allegedly included compromises that Saperstein had never authorized or agreed to concerning the time allowed the Union for the investigation of grievances and the duration of the contract. Saperstein testified he fired Pearlman because Pearlman had exceeded his authority in consenting to those proposals. Respondent's defense, therefore, is based entirely on its contention that Pearlman did not have authority to reach agreement with the Union without Saperstein's approval.

Saperstein testified that Pearlman was retained to prepare Respondent's initial proposals to the Union and to keep Saperstein apprised of other developments as negotiations progressed. Saperstein claims it was up to him to approve or disapprove any modified proposals by Respondent. Respondent argues that the Union knew, or should have known, that Pearlman was acting with limited authority because Gordon admitted that on many subjects Pearlman indicated he would have to review union proposals and respond at a later meeting. Respondent also argues, "The fact that Pearlman was an outside consultant and not an employee of Metco in itself indicated that he was not making substantive decisions regarding proposals." Finally, Respondent argues, "Just as it was implicit that the agreement was subject to ratification of employees, it was also implicit that it was subject to ratification by Saperstein."

The evidence is quite clear that Respondent made no attempt whatever to notify or inform the Union that Pearlman would be acting in any limited capacity. Respondent does not even advance such a claim. Pearlman informed the Union during the first negotiating session that he had authority to negotiate a contract. Pearlman himself placed no limitations or restrictions on his authority. Respondent not only failed to call Pearlman as a witness, but also failed to call Superintendent J. D. Parrish who was its other representative at the first negotiating session. At this first meeting and throughout negotiations, the Union was led to reasonably believe that Pearlman possessed the authority to obligate Respondent to the terms of a final agreement. Gordon testified credibly that although Pearlman sometimes expressed a need to talk to Saperstein before making certain commitments, at other times Pearlman made commitments on many proposals without waiting until the following meeting or indicating any need to talk to Saperstein. I find that throughout negotiations Pearlman had the apparent authority to bind Respondent to a collective-bargaining agreement.

Saperstein's testimony concerning his reasons for not signing the collective-bargaining agreement is itself somewhat suspect. Saperstein claims Pearlman exceeded his authority by agreeing to allow the Union 10 minutes to investigate grievances and by agreeing to a 3-year contract. Saperstein makes this claim even though he admittedly approved a 3-year wage proposal at an earlier meeting and even though Saperstein admits he did not require Pearlman to seek his approval on noneconomic issues such as the grievance investigation proposal. Although Saperstein claimed that he did not approve a 3-year contract, Plant Manager Clark testified that Saperstein approved a 20-cent wage offer for 3 years after the Union rejected Respondent's initial 15-cent-per-hour wage increase proposal. It is altogether inconsistent that Respondent would make a 3-year wage proposal without intending a 3-year agreement. It appears that for some reason, which is not altogether clear, Saperstein became displeased with the contract after the parties reached agreement on 4 June and is now attempting to abrogate that agreement. Whether such be the case, however, I conclude the evidence establishes quite clearly that Respondent and the Union in fact reached agreement on the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement at the meeting of 4 June and that Respondent's representative at that meeting. Attorney Robert Pearlman, had at least apparent authority to enter into that agreement.

Section 8(d) of the Act requires "the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party." It is well-established Board law that a party to a collective-bargaining relationship violates its bargaining obligation under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act if it refuses to execute an agreement once reached. H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514 (1941); Fashion Furniture Mfg., 279 NLRB 705 (1986). In reaching the conclusion that the parties to such a relationship arrived at a "meeting of the minds" on the substantive terms of an agreement, "the Board is not strictly bound by the technical rules of contract law." NLRB v. Electra-Food Machinery, 621 F.2d 956 at 958 (9th Cir. 1980). It is well established that "when an agent is appointed to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement, that agent is deemed to have apparent authority to bind his principal in the absence of clear notice to the contrary." University of Bridgeport, 229 NLRB 1074 (1977). It is undisputed that in this case Respondent did nothing to notify the Union of any restriction or limitation placed on Pearlman's authority to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of Respondent.

Considering all the above, I find that Respondent and the Union arrived at a complete meeting of the minds, that there was no valid or unfulfilled condition preceding or subsequent in any way that affects the agreement, that Respondent has failed and refused to execute the agreement, and that in doing so, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Metco Products, Division of Case Manufacturing Company, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Communications Workers of America is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor oraganization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. On 20 October 1986 the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees at its Greensboro, North Carolina facility.

4. On 4 June 1987, Respondent and the Union reached agreement on the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement covering the terms and conditions of employment of Respondent's employees in the bargaining unit described above.

5. By failing and refusing to execute the written contract incorporating the agreement reached between it and the Union, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. The unfair labor practices that Respondent has been found to have engaged in, as described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[2]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Metco Products, Inc., Division of Case Manufacturing Company, Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively and in good faith with Communications Workers of America by declining to execute a written agreement embodying the terms of the contract fully agreed to between the parties.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Sign the collective-bargaining agreement agreed to by Respondent and the Union on 4 June 1987.

(b) Give effect to the terms of the contract retroactive to 30 June 1987 and make employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's failure to execute and sign this agreement, with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 298 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[4]

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Greensboro, North Carolina facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

---

[2] Counsel for the General Counsel has requested that the remedy include a visitatorial clause giving counsel for the General Counsel certain specific discovery powers during the compliance stage of this proceeding. The Board has granted such a request only on a case-by-case basis where it has felt such a clause is warranted. The Board has declined to routinely include visitatorial clauses in its order. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988). Counsel for the General Counsel points to no specific facts and no special circumstances that would warrant such a clause in this case, and the request is denied.

[3] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[4] Under New Horizons for the Retarded, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively and in good faith with Communications Workers of America by refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement embodying the terms of the contract agreed to between us.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL sign the collective-bargaining agreement agreed to by us and the Union on 4 June 1987 defining wages, hours, and working conditions of our production and maintenance employees employed at our Greensboro, North Carolina facility.

WE WILL give retroactive effect to the terms of that contract to 30 June 1987, and WE WILL make employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of our failure to execute and sign that agreement, with appropriate interest.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 16, 1986, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Order in which she declined to assert jurisdiction over the Employer under the test set forth in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986), and dismissed the instant petition. In accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision, in which the Petitioner contended that the Board should assert jurisdiction. By unpublished order dated April 8, 1987, the Board granted the request for review. Both parties filed briefs on review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

We have considered the entire record in this case, and conclude, for the reasons set forth below, that it is appropriate to assert jurisdiction herein.

I.

The Employer is engaged in providing security services for the U.S. Navy at the Naval Ocean Systems Center (NOSC), a secure military installation at Point Loma, California. The current contract between the Employer and the Navy is a 1-year, fixed-price contract, with the option to renew annually for a total duration not to exceed 3 years.

Petitioner seeks to represent the Employer's security guards employed at NOSC; the proposed unit consists of approximately 80 guards. The Regional Director concluded that under Res-Care, Inc., above, and Long Stretch Youth Home, above, the Board should not assert jurisdiction over the Employer, finding that the Navy determines the employees' initial wage rate and benefits, and exercises a significant degree of control over day-to-day labor relations.

The Employer is a contractor subject to the terms of the Service Contract Act of 1965, as amended, 41 U.S.C. § 351. Under that statute, every contractor performing services for the Federal Government must provide its service employees wages and benefits which, at a minimum, meet the compensation levels prevailing in the locality for wages and benefits, as established by the Department of Labor (DOL) in a wage determination. 41 U.S.C. § 351(a)(1), (2); see Dynaelectron Corp., 286 NLRB 303 (1987). In Dynaelectron, we concluded that the Service Contract Act in itself does not bar meaningful bargaining. The statute provides for substitution of collectively bargained wages and benefits for the prevailing compensation rates set forth in wage determinations. Id. at 303. Thus, as a service contractor, the Employer must compensate its employees at a minimum in accordance with the levels established by the DOL. Here, the wage determination requires that the Employer's class I guards, who are those guards in training, receive a minimum wage of $3.85 an hour, and that class II guards, who are all other guards, receive a minimum of $5.49 an hour. The wage determination also requires that the Employer provide fringe benefits valued. In at a minimum of 32 cents per hour, $12.80 per week, or $55.46 per month.[1] In addition, the wage determination requires that employees receive vacation and eight paid holidays each year.

The Navy specifies the number of guard posts that must be manned, sets the daily and annual hours for each post, and sets staffing levels for each post. The Employer in its bid proposed an hourly rate for each of the approximately 20 guard posts; the contract's fixed price is based on the hourly rate for each post multiplied by the number of annual hours at each post. The hourly rate includes labor costs, overhead, and profit. The record does not show what percentage of the hourly rate is allocated to each category.

The contract with the Navy does not prohibit payment of wages higher than those established by the wage determination, although here the Employer pays the employees the wages specified as minimums in the wage determination. The only limitation on the Employer is a requirement to obtain Navy approval before granting overtime above a certain amount. Similarly, there is no limitation or ceiling on the benefits that are paid, and as long as the Employer provides compensation for benefits valued at the minimum rate, the Employer may provide these benefits in any form it chooses. Here, the Employer has chosen to provide monetary compensation in lieu of actual benefits. Furthermore, the contract includes a price adjustment clause such that if the DOL revises the wage determination to require a wage increase, the contract price is adjusted.

[1] The Service Contract Act requires that a contract set forth, "for information only," the compensation paid Federal employees who perform services comparable to that performed by the service contractor's employees. See 41 U.S.C. § 351(a)(5). The wage determination's minimum wage standard in this case is the same as the wage rates paid Federal employees performing comparable work. The equivalent Federal employees would receive health and insurance benefits valued at 5.1 percent of the hourly rate and retirement benefits of 7 percent of the hourly rate, but, contrary to the Regional Director's finding, these amounts do not correspond to those specified in the wage determination for fringe benefits.

With respect to operational functions, the Employer must staff three shifts in accordance with hours set by the Navy. The Employer has the authority to hire, discipline, and terminate. The Navy requires that all guards have a minimum of 20 hours of training and that, among other qualifications, they possess firearm permits and be licensed in California as guards. On hiring an employee, the Employer submits documentation to the Navy to demonstrate that the employee meets minimum qualifications. Employees also must receive a security clearance and observe security directives; employees who are deemed security risks are subject to termination. Employees also must follow certain Navy rules and regulations, including a dress code. The Navy establishes guards' qualifications and the specific training for each post, but the Employer's shift supervisors assign particular guards to the various posts based on individual employees' qualifications. The Navy issues orders for each post that dictate procedures that guards must follow, but the Employer's supervisors direct the guards in their duties.

The Navy inspects on a random basis the work of the Employer's guards and, in addition, audits the Employer's overall contract performance on an annual basis. The Navy has made oral and written complaints to the Employer regarding poor employee performance or rule infractions witnessed during these inspections, along with requests for corrective action or discipline. The Employer has complied with such suggestions or requests for discipline to ensure contract renewal; under the contract, the Employer must maintain appropriate standards.

II.

In Res-Care, the Board refined the basic test for whether an employer shares a governmental entity's exemption from the Act that was set forth in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979). The Board explained in Res-Care that the decision whether to assert jurisdiction will be based on the extent of control retained by the employer over essential terms and conditions of employment as well as on the degree of control exercised by the exempt entity over labor relations. In essence, jurisdiction is asserted if the employer has the "final say on the entire package of employee compensation, i.e., wages and fringe benefits . . . ." Res-Care, supra at 674.

The exempt entity in Res-Care placed direct limits on employee compensation, which precluded bargaining by the employer over economic terms and conditions of employment. There, the salary ranges and benefits were subject to DOL approval. The proposed cost of wages and benefits and other items plus a fixed fee became the contract price, once the exempt entity accepted the bid; the contract set forth minimum and maximum wages and benefits. Thereafter, the employer could not change employee compensation without the exempt entity's approval. The exempt entity could disallow payment of wages that were higher than the approved maximum, and it issued payments on a monthly basis on review of vouchers submitted by the employer for expenses. By contrast, the Board asserted jurisdiction in Long Stretch because the exempt entity did not place specific limits on expenditures for employee compensation. Rather, it placed only a ceiling on the employer's total budget. Id. at 673 fn. 14.

Limits that existed in Res-Care are not present here. The guards here receive the minimum wage and minimum monetary value for benefits set forth in the wage determination. The contract lists the total costs for each guard post and the total of these quantities becomes the basis for the contract price. Although the contract price is affected by the staffing levels set by the Navy as well as by the number of hours required for each post, the Employer sets the proposed wages and benefits, subject to the standards of the Service Contract Act. There is no evidence that the Navy would disallow expenditures or decrease payments if the Employer, as a result of a collective-bargaining agreement, paid employees more or extended greater benefits than the amounts required in the wage determination. Indeed, under the Service Contract Act, the collectively bargained rate almost certainly would be incorporated into the next fiscal year's wage determination. See 41 U.S.C. § 351(a)(1), (2). See also Dynaelectron Corp., at 303. Moreover, unlike Res-Care, the exempt entity here does not require submission of the Employer's personnel policies for review.

Although the DOL's wage determination here corresponds to the actual wage rates paid by the Employer, the Employer is not prohibited from compensating its employees at more than the minimum levels set by the DOL. The Employer is not subject to specific limits on employee compensation expenditures, except to provide the minimum required by the operation of the Service Contract Act. Unlike Res-Care, the contract here does not specify wage ranges and, as noted above, with regard to benefits, the Employer is limited only by the requirement to provide the minimum level of benefits.

III.

Finally, the Employer contends that the Navy exercise control over labor-management relations and that thus the Employer is a joint employer with the Navy and shares the Navy's statutory exemption. We find that the control exercised neither limits bargaining nor indicates that there is a joint employer relationship.[2] The Navy sets minimum qualifications, requires security clearances, and adherence to a dress code, establishes shifts, and specifies duties for the various posts. The Navy also monitors employee performance, specifies post operating procedures, approves overtime above a particular limit, and suggests disciplinary measures when appropriate. However, the operational controls in force here ensure contract compliance and maintenance of security measures at a secure facility. They do not limit the Employer's ability to bargain. See Trailways Commuter Transit, 284 NLRB 935 (1987); Rustman Bus Co., 282 NLRB 152 (1986); Long Stretch, supra at 682 fn. 15; Res-Care, supra at 674 fn. 22; see also Champlain Security Services, 243 NLRB 755 (1979); Atlas Guard Service, 237 NLRB 1067 (1978). The exempt entity's inspection of the Employer's operations does not limit bargaining over employee compensation. The Employer's employees are subject to Navy regulations and directives, and the Navy may request that the Employer discharge personnel, but the Employer is responsible for hiring, assignment and direction of work, discipline, and termination. In Dynaelection, we stated that the "Navy's contractual right to request dismissal of an employee in the event of misconduct or for security reasons does not, alone, preclude the assertion of jurisdiction over the Employer." Id.

In sum, we find that the Employer retains sufficient control over its employees' terms and conditions of employment to engage in meaningful collective bargaining, and that its contract with the Navy does not limit the Employer's ultimate discretion over wage and benefit levels. See ARA Services, 283 NLRB 602, 603 (1987); Long Stretch, supra at 680. We therefore conclude that it will effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over the Employer. Accordingly, we reverse the Regional Director's Decision and Order, and reinstate the petition.

ORDER

The petition in Case 21-RC-17828 is reinstated and remanded to the Regional Director for further appropriate action.

---

[2] As the Board indicated in Res-Care, supra at 673, fns. 12 and 14, however, its consideration of whether to assert jurisdiction in this type of case does not focus on whether there is a joint employer relationship between the employer and the governmental entity.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On January 26, 1988, Administrative Law Judge David S. Davidson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally adjusting employee Resad Kunovac's grievance without honoring the Union's statutory right to be present at the settlement discussion. However, we find merit in the Respondent's exception to the judge's recommendation remedy insofar as the remedy includes an automatic setting aside of the individual agreement reached between Kunovac and the Respondent on February 13, 1987. Although the Board customarily directs an employer to restore the status quo ante if it has taken unilateral action to an employee's detriment, we are unable in this instance to determine definitively whether the Respondent's grievance adjustment was detrimental to Kunovac in any regard. Therefore, we shall order the status quo ante restored conditioned on Kunovac's affirmative desire as expressed through his collective-bargaining representative.[1] The Respondent accordingly shall set aside the unilaterally adjusted grievance if the Union elects with Kunovac's concurrence to have previous conditions restored.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Nathan Scherr, Howard Perlow, Kenneth Hesson, Harold Cohen, Victor Cohen, Robert Footlick, Robert Pickner, Stuart Weitzman, Albert Weitzman, Ronald Weitzman, and Kenneth S. Cooper, d/b/a Blast Soccer Associates d/b/a Baltimore Blast, Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraph 1(a) and reletter the subsequent paragraph.

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(a) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(a) On request by the Union with the concurrence of Resad Kunovac, set aside the February 13, 1987 agreement which unilaterally adjusted the Kunovac grievance."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

We will not refuse to bargain collectively with the Major Indoor Soccer League Players Association, affiliated with Federation of Professional Athletes, AFL-CIO by adjusting contract grievances with individual unit employees without affording the Union the opportunity to be present at such adjustment.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

We will, on request of the Union with the concurrence of Resad Kunovac, set aside the February 13, 1987 agreement which unilaterally adjusted the Kunovac grievance.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID S. DAVIDSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Baltimore, Maryland, on 3 September 1987. The Union filed the charge on 2 March 1987, and the Regional Director issued the complaint on 14 April 1987. The issue is whether Respondent[1] violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by settling a grievance with a member of the bargaining unit represented by the Union without giving the Union an opportunity to be present at the adjustment of the grievance.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a partnership, operates a professional indoor soccer team at Baltimore, Maryland. In the course of its operations, it annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchases goods and materials in excess of $10,000, which it causes to be transported and delivered in interstate commerce. I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

At all times material the Union (MISLPA) has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of a unit including all soccer players under contract with the Major Indoor Soccer League, Inc. (MISL), and its member teams of which Respondent is one. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between MISL and the Union runs from 28 March 1986 to 30 June 1989. The collective-bargaining agreement covers terms and conditions of employment of those in the unit, but also provides for individual contracts between players and management, as follows:

> Article XIX
> Individual Negotiations
> Section 1. Union's Limited Waiver: For purposes of this agreement, MISL Clubs and the League recognize that, absent an express waiver by the MISLPA, they could not negotiate or execute agreements with individual Players. The MISLPA authorizes the Clubs, for the term of this agreement only, to enter into, negotiate and execute individual employment agreements.
> Section 2. Right of Union to Participate: For purposes of this agreement, MISL Clubs and the League recognize that the MISLPA has a right to attend all individual negotiating sessions, absent an express waiver to that effect by the MISLPA. The MISLPA authorizes the Clubs for the term of this agreement only to engage in individual negotiating sessions with Players without the participation of the MISLPA. MISL Clubs agree to negotiate with the MISLPA or its agent in order to facilitate agent regulation.
> Section 4. Subjects for Individual Agreements: The subjects and limitations of individual agreements are described in the form attached hereto as Appendix A. Club will provide every Player or prospective player with a copy of said form during individual negotiations.
> Section 5. Standard Player Contract: All players shall be required to execute the MISL Standard Player Contract. Upon the completion and execution of each Standard Player Contract, or amendments thereto, such contract or amendments, if any, and Appendix A referred to above in Section 4, shall be forwarded to the MISLPA ten (10) days after receipt by the Commissioner's Office.
> Section 6. Expedited Arbitration: The MISLPA shall have the right to challenge the validity of any individual contract through expedited arbitration within ten (10) days of its receipt of the individual contract in question on the following grounds:
> (a) Incompleteness in expression of its terms;
> (b) Any conflict between its terms and the Collective Bargaining Agreement between MISL and MISLPA (including attachments);
> (c) The Club, or a Club official, has made or agreed to make payment or convey anything of value to any firm or person for legal or representational services provided to a Player in connection with the negotiation of a contract between such Club and Player that is not set forth in the MISL Standard Player Agreement or attachments thereto.

Insofar as material, Appendix A provides:

> FORM DESCRIBING THE SUBJECTS FOR INDIVIDUAL AGREEMENTS
> The sole issues to be negotiated between the Club and the Player in individual negotiations are the following:
> (1) His salary, additional compensation, such as signing bonuses or performance bonuses or incentive bonuses;
> (2) Lodging and/or automobile allowances;
> (3) Payment schedule;

---

[1] Respondent's name appears in the caption as amended at the hearing.

> (4) Guarantee, no-cut, and no-trade provisions;
> (5) Educational payments;
> The Club cannot negotiate any benefits, terms, or other conditions of employment with individual Players which conflict in any way with (decreasing or modifying benefits) the terms of the Collective Bargaining Agreement.

Pursuant to these provisions on 10 June 1983 Respondent entered into an individual agreement with player Mesad Kunovac for four playing seasons beginning on 1 October 1983 and ending 31 May 1987 "unless extended, terminated, or renewed as specified elsewhere in his contract." The agreement provides in section 6.2 that Respondent may terminate the agreement on written notice if the player shall at anytime among other things "fail, in the opinion of the Club's management, to exhibit sufficient skill or competitive ability to qualify for or continue as a member of the Club's team." Among its special provisions the agreement provided that a portion of the player's salary each season was to be payable to the player's agent Branko Perovanovic. It also provided, "All monies guaranteed, provided player passes club physical each season."

On 3 July 1985, pursuant to section 6.2 Respondent's executive vice president and head coach, Kenneth Cooper, notified Kunovac that Respondent did not intend to bring him back for the next soccer season.

On 24 October 1985, the Union by letter to Respondent's counsel, Rachel Zelkind, filed a grievance on behalf of itself and Kunovac protesting the failure of Respondent to pay any of his guaranteed salary after 1 October 1985. By letter of 7 November 1985, Zelkind replied raising procedural objections and denying that Respondent had any continuing salary obligation to Kunovac under the terms of the agreement taken as whole.

On 2 December 1985 the Union and Kunovac filed a notice of appeal to George Nicolau, permanent umpire under the collective-bargaining agreement, seeking arbitration of the grievance.

Around that time, the Union's assistant director Peter McGee and Zelkind spoke about setting up a meeting with Kunovac's agent Perovanovic to discuss settlement of the grievance, and on 5 December 1985 Perovanovic, McGee, and Zelkind met at Zelkind's office. McGee and Perovanovic proposed a settlement figure that Zelkind rejected as excessive. At that time McGee informed Zelkind of the request for arbitration that she had not yet received. Zelkind told them that Respondent intended to raise all its procedural and substantive objections to the grievance.

At the conclusion of the meeting the parties remained interested in settlement. McGee indicated to Perovanovic and Zelkind that settlement should be pursued, and asked Perovanovic to keep him apprised. McGee left Zelkind with the understanding that she and Perovanovic should talk.

About 2 weeks later, in mid-December Perovanovic again appeared in Zelkind's office with another player who was a friend of Kunovac and they discussed settlement of the Kunovac grievance further. Two or three days later she phoned McGee and told him of the meeting, indicating that she was open to further discussion of the grievance. McGee did not protest her meeting with Perovanovic or indicate a desire to be present at any future meeting between Zelkind and Perovanovic. There were no further meetings between them.[2]

Processing of the grievance continued. At Respondent's request the arbitrator heard the issues of untimeliness and arbitrability separately before hearing the grievance on its merits. On 30 May 1986 Arbitrator Nicolau issued an interim award finding that the claim of Kunovac and the Union was arbitrable. On 2 October 1986 the arbitrator issued a second interim award finding that the grievance and the appeal to arbitration were timely.

Although neither McGee nor Zelkind participated in further settlement discussions after December 1985, Cooper had settlement discussions with Perovanovic in 1985 and 1986.

In January 1987 Perovanovic met with Cooper in Baltimore about another matter. In the course of the meeting he asked about Kunovac and said that they wanted to settle. Cooper asked if he was representing Kunovac, and Perovanovic answered affirmatively. He asked Perovanovic what he wanted to settle for and Perovanovic gave a figure of $30,000. Perovanovic indicated that he had spoken to Kunovac and his wife and that Mrs. Kunovac wanted Cooper to call him. Cooper eventually reached Mrs. Kunovac by telephone in Yugoslavia. He told her of his conversation with Perovanovic, and she indicated that the proposed figure was acceptable to her and her husband.

Following this conversation Cooper got approval from Respondent's other owners and arranged to meet Kunovac on 12 February 1987 in London to complete the settlement.

[2] Zelkind so testified and I have credited her. Initially, McGee testified that this meeting occurred before the Union appealed the grievance to arbitration and that there were no settlement discussions after the appeal was filed.

After Zelkind testified, McGee testified that her testimony refreshed his recollection. He testified that after Zelkind rejected the proposed settlement figure he told her that they would go forward with the grievance, while continuing to try to settle it. During the discussions it became clear that an obstacle to settlement was the fact that under Kunovac's agreement there were payments due Perovanovic linked to the payments due Kunovac. According to McGee, he "left it that Mr. Perovanovic was welcome to try to work out some kind of—to discuss some kind of settlement language with the Club, both on behalf of himself and on behalf of the player, and I left it with Mr. Perovanovic and Ms. Zelkind that if they were able to arrive at such a settlement document, at such a settlement agreement, that that would be fine as long as the union was able to put final approval on it, since we were involved with a grievance." McGee also testified that in his mid-December telephone conversation with Zelkind he repeated that the Union would have to approve any final settlement. Zelkind denied that McGee ever told her that the Union would have to approve any settlement agreement.

It is understandable that in the lapse of almost 2 years between the December 1985 conversations and the hearing in this case, neither Zelkind nor McGee had a verbatim recollection of their December conversations. Yet, it appeared that until Zelkind testified, McGee had no recollection of conversations between them after the grievance was appealed to arbitration, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that McGee's refreshed recollection was colored, however unconsciously, by the position taken by the Union in this case. I do not credit McGee's testimony that he stated that the Union would have to approve any final settlement reached between Zelkind and Perovanovic.

Sometime before Cooper's trip, John Kerr, the Union's director, and McGee heard rumors that Perovanovic was trying to settle the grievance. On 5 February Kerr wrote Cooper that it had come to his attention that he was trying to settle the Kunovac case directly or indirectly with Kunovac and that he wanted to remind Cooper that the grievance was filed by the Union and therefore could not be settled through the player's former agent.

Cooper left for London on 8 February and did not see Herr's letter until his return.

In the meantime on 12 February Cooper met Kunovac in London. He gave Kunovac a draft of a proposed settlement agreement and arranged to meet him again the next day. The next day Kunovac arrived wih a friend to represent him and signed the agreement.

The agreement captioned "Termination of Standard Player Agreement and Release," provided, among other things:

> 5. Player, for himself, his successors and assigns and his agents and representatives hereby remises, releases and forever discharges Team, its successors and assigns, employees, agents, attorneys, and those individuals and entities who hold partnership interests in the Team from all . . . claims . . . grievances, arbitrable matters . . . whatsoever which Player, his assigns, representatives and agents may have, now or in the future, against Team, its successors, assigns, employees, agents, attorneys and those individuals and entities who hold partnership interests in the Team . . . arising out of or related to (i) the Employment Agreement, (ii) the Player's employment by the Team under the Employment Agreement or otherwise, (iii) the termination of the Employment Agreement and Player's employment thereunder, (iv) this Agreement and the formation hereof and the provisions hereof and the entering herein . . . .
> 7. In the event that Player and/or the Team has initiated, prior to the date hereof, a grievance and/or any action in regard to the Employment Agreement or the performance thereof, that party who initiated such grievance or action immediately shall take any and all actions necessary to terminate the same and shall instruct either the MISL and/or the MISLPA, as appropriate, to terminate any grievance and/or action which such entity may have initiated and/or furthered in any capacity whatsoever in regard to (i) the Player and/or Team as appropriate, (ii) to the Employment Agreement, (iii) to the performance of the terms thereof and/or (iv) to Player's employment by the Team. In the event that Player and/or Team respectively has authorized or appointed the MISL and/or the MISLPA respectively to represent it or otherwise act as its agent in the above mentioned grievance and/or action, the Player and/or the Team hereby withdraws and terminates such authorization and appointment. This agreement is a bar to either the Player or the Team or anyone on their respective behalf or for their respective benefit directly or indirectly, continuing or participating in any way whatsoever in any action as mentioned above.

Cooper did not respond to Kerr's 5 February letter after finding it on his return from England, but Zelkind sent the Union a copy of the termination of standard player agreement and release executed by Kunovac.

On 24 February Zelkind sent the following letter to Arbitrator Nicolau:

> Enclosed is a copy of a writing styled "Termination of Standard Player Agreement and Release" ("Termination") dated February 13, 1987, executed by Blast Soccer Associates ("BSA") and Resad Kunovac. The Termination speaks for itself, and based thereon, I formally request that you dismiss the arbitration now before you concerning performance of the Standard MISL Players Agreement between Mr. Kunovac and BSA, regardless of the party bringing the grievance.
> On even date herewith, I have sent a copy of this letter and the enclosed document to W. Buckley Briggs, Esq., appearing before you for the MISLPA.

B. Discussion

The General Counsel and the Union contend that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by settling the Kunovac grievance without giving the Union the opportunity to be present at the adjustment.

Respondent does not dispute that absent a waiver, the second proviso to Section 9(a) of the Act required it to give a representative of the Union an opportunity to be present at the adjustment of the grievance. Top Mfg. Co., 249 NLRB 424 (1980).[3] Respondent contends, however, that a waiver is to be found in the collective-bargaining agreement as well as in the conduct of Union Representative McGee relating to the grievance.

It is well settled that the Board will not lightly infer waiver of statutory rights. Rather there must be a clear and unmistakable showing that statutory rights have been waived.[4]

As set forth above, the collective-bargaining agreement in article XIX authorized Respondent to "enter into, negotiate and execute individual employment agreements" (sec. 1), and "to engage in individual negotiating sessions with Players without the participation of the MISLPA" (sec. 2). The collective-bargaining agreement provided that among the issues for individual negotiation were salary and guarantees.

The issue raised by the grievance filed by the Union and Kunovac is whether under the compensation schedule and guarantee included in Kunovac's individual agreement Respondent had any remaining financial obligations to Kunovac after it notified him that it did not intend to bring him back for the 1985–1986 season.

[3] There the union filed a grievance over an employee's discharge. After an arbitrator awarded reinstatement and backpay, the employer negotiated directly with the employee to settle the grievance by payment of backpay without reinstatement. The Board found that the employer violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act by bypassing the union to negotiate directly with the employee and by settling the grievance without giving the bargaining representative an opportunity to be present. Here there is no contention that Respondent bypassed the Union by engaging in direct negotiations with Kunovac.

[4] Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 282 NLRB 609 (1987).

Respondent contends that because the collective-bargaining agreement specifically authorized individual negotiations and agreement with respect to compensation and guarantees, it also authorized individual negotiations and agreement to resolve grievances arising over these issues. Although the Union's waiver of its right to participate in individual negotiations under article XIX, section 2 seems broad enough to encompass grievance negotiations as well as negotiations leading toward individual employment contracts, the authority to enter into individual agreements is narrower. It is directed specifically to individual employment agreements, it provides that such agreements shall be submitted to the Union, and it provides the Union with the right to challenge the validity of an individual agreement on certain specified grounds, with any disputes to be resolved by arbitration. Thus, although the authorization to negotiate with players individually is broad, the authority to enter into individual agreements is narrower, and the specification of individual employment agreements and the procedure for reviewing them indicates that it is not so broad as to include agreements resolving disputes over termination. Indeed, those disputes typically are disputes to be resolved through a grievance procedure, and here the grievance procedure specifically contemplates grievances filed by the Union and/or players involving the interpretation, application, or compliance with the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement or the standard player agreement.[5]

Accordingly, I conclude that the waiver contained in article XIX authorized Respondent to negotiate directly with Kunovac or his agent over settlement of the grievance but not to enter into an agreement adjusting the grievance without giving the Union an opportunity to be present.[6]

Respondent contends that in any event the Union waived its right to be present at the adjustment of the Kunovac grievance by McGee's statements to Zelkind on 5 December 1985 and in their mid-December telephone conversation.

Although I have credited Zelkind's version of those conversations and find that McGee gave verbal approval to continued settlement discussions between Zelkind and Perovanovic, I cannot conclude that this verbal approval went beyond the Union's contractual authorization of individual negotiations between players and teams without the Union's presence contained in article XIX, section 2. Respondent stresses that McGee never told Zelkind that the Union would have to be present at the adjustment or would have to approve it. However, waiver must be express. What Zelkind understood was that she and Perovanovic should continue to talk and that Perovanovic should keep McGee informed. The first portion entailed no more than the contractual waiver. The second added nothing to it. McGee was silent about what would happen if and when negotiations produced agreement between Respondent and Perovanovic. Had Zelkind gone further to state an understanding that she and Perovanovic could adjust the grievance finally without further union involvement, and had McGee remained silent in the face of such an assertion, then waiver of any further union role might be inferred from his silence. But nothing was said that required McGee to speak further in order to avoid waiving what both the agreement and the statute required.[7]

Accordingly, I find that McGee's conduct did not waive the Union's right to be present at the adjustment of the Kunovac grievance.[8]

Having found no waiver by the Union of its rights, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by adjusting the grievance filed by the Union and Kunovac through the execution of the 13 February 1987 settlement agreement without honoring the Union's statutory right to be present at such adjustment.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

The General Counsel requests that the remedy include setting aside the grievance adjustment obtained by Respondent as a result of its unlawful conduct, citing Top Mfg. Co., supra, 249 NLRB at 426. Although there was an additional violation found in Top Mfg. not present here,[9] I find that the rationale advanced by the General Counsel for requiring the same remedy is persuasive. Absent setting aside the adjustment of the Kunovac grievance, there can be no effective remedy for Respondent's failure to afford the Union its rights. However, I reject the General Counsel's further contention that the remedy should include a visitatorial clause. Apart from the arguments in support of the general contention that such clauses should routinely be included in all Board orders, which it should be clear by now that the Board has rejected, the General Counsel points to no special circumstances that would warrant such a clause in this case.

[5] In the arbitration proceeding over the Kunovac grievance, Respondent argued that the issue of compliance with the compensation and guarantee provisions of the standard player agreement between Respondent and Kunovac was not a grievance cognizable under the collective-bargaining agreement. In his first interim award the arbitrator rejected that contention.

[6] In connection with its contractual waiver contention, Respondent argues in its brief that the 13 February 1987 termination of standard player agreement and release deals only with Kunovac's grievance and not with the Union's. Respondent states, "Kunovac's settlement may, of course, have some impact on the grievance or upon any remedy, but these are matters for the arbitrator to determine. Clearly, however, the 13 February 1987 agreement did not purport to affect the Union's right to pursue its grievance to arbitration." This contention is at odds with Zelkind's 24 February 1987 letter to the arbitrator requesting dismissal of the arbitration based on the termination agreement "regardless of the party bringing the grievance."

[7] Challenge-Cooke Bros., 282 NLRB 21 (1986); Borden Inc., 261 NLRB 64, 82 (1982), enfd. 711 F.2d 348 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

[8] In view of this conclusion, I find it unnecessary to consider other contentions of the Union relating to the effectiveness of McGee's conduct as a waiver.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Nathan Scherr, Howard Perlow, Kenneth Hesson, Harold Cohen, Victor Cohen, Robert Footlick, Robert Pickner, Stuart Weitzman, Albert Weitzman, Ronald Weitzman, and Kenneth S. Cooper d/b/a Blast Soccer Associates d/b/a Baltimore Blast constitute an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Major Indoor Soccer League Players Association, affiliated with Federation of Professional Athletes, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of members of Major Indoor Soccer League, Inc., including Respondent, constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All soccer players under contract and amateur players under contract including players on the active, suspended, disabled, military and voluntarily retired lists of members of the Association and of the employers who have authorized said Association to bargain on their behalf, including Respondent, but excluding all other employees, veteran free agents, managerial and executive personnel, head coaches and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. Since 26 January 1984, the Union has been and now is the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the appropriate bargaining unit for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By adjusting a unit employee's grievance without giving the Union an opportunity to be present at the adjustment, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Nathan Scherr, Howard Perlow, Kenneth Hesson, Harold Cohen, Victor Cohen, Albert Footlick, Robert Pickner, Stuart Weitzman, Albert Weitzman, Ronald Weitzman, and Kenneth S. Cooper d/b/a Blast Soccer Associates d/b/a Baltimore Blast, Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Continuing or giving effect to the 13 February 1987 agreement purporting to settle the grievance claims of Mesad Kunovac and Major Indoor Soccer League Players Association, affiliated with Federation of Professional Athletes, AFL-CIO.

(b) Adjusting bargaining unit employees' grievances without giving the Union an opportunity to be present at any such adjustment.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Baltimore, Maryland, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On November 2, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support and in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions. Thereafter, the Respondent filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set out in full below.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) in late 1982[3] when it disciplined employees Lucas, McDonald, and McClain for "poor workmanship." We disagree.

The Respondent disciplined these employees on the ground that they collectively produced a part out of stainless steel rather than the required carbon steel. Although it is disputed whether all three employees were responsible for the defective parts, it is clear that they produced the type of tube in question. Lucas performed the initial operation by selecting and measuring the tube's thickness, McDonald performed the second and third operations by cutting and burring the ends, and McClain performed the final two operations by swagging and annealing the tubes.[4]

According to the Respondent, the defective parts were produced in early August and remained in stock until late October, when the parts became components of an assembly. During the first week of November, the Respondent rejected several of these assemblies because the defective parts cracked when the assemblies were pressure tested. On investigation, the Respondent discovered that the parts were made out of stainless steel rather than the required carbon steel; the Respondent states that upon checking inventory it discovered that Lucas, McDonald, and McClain had produced the parts in August.

On November 24, Lucas, McDonald, and McClain were given written warnings for "poor workmanship." The McDonald and McClain warnings contained references to previous written warnings[5] and each was given a 2-day suspension. Discipline for Lucas was limited to a "verbal" warning dated December 3. The Respondent also gave a "verbal" warning to Josephine Coble, an inspector, who is not alleged as a discriminatee.

The judge found that the General Counsel had sustained her initial burden based on the employees' union activities and the timing of the discipline. The judge reasoned that since the parts were produced in early August and the defect was not discovered until a few days after the November union nominations, the Respondent had seized on the opportunity as a means to justify the warnings regardless of who was at fault.

We disagree with the judge that the General Counsel has established that the discipline was motivated by the employees' union activities. In order to establish such a violation, the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing that the employer made a decision to discipline the employees and that the employees' protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980). In the instant case no such showing was made.

There is no indication that the Respondent was aware of either Lucas' or McDonald's union activity. Lucas' union activity was limited to his Novem-

[1] We find without merit the Respondent's allegation of bias and prejudice on the part of the judge. On our full consideration of the record and the judge's decision, we perceive no evidence that the judge made prejudicial rulings or demonstrated bias against the Respondent in his analysis or discussion of the evidence. We also find no merit in the Respondent's exceptions to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) by laying off employee McClain in November 1982, while retaining employee Neely who had less seniority. Like the judge, we find that the Respondent failed to show that, absent McClain's union activities, it would have laid him off out of seniority. In this regard, the Respondent's assertion that Neely was retained because he was more qualified does not withstand scrutiny. The Respondent has failed satisfactorily to explain why McClain, on twice facing layoff in department 145, once in November 1982 and again in September or October 1983, could not bump Neely on the first occasion but could bump Neely on the second one, when he was offered the opportunity to do so but declined. No evidence was presented that the skills or classifications of these two employees in relationship to each other changed between the first and second layoffs. Thus, we conclude that the only factual accounting for McClain's layoff out of seniority in November 1982 was that he was running as union trustee on an insurgents' slate to which the Respondent was hostile.

[4] Stainless steel and carbon steel are easily distinguishable; stainless steel has a bright silver look and carbon steel has a dark dull look. However, if, as in the present case, stainless steel is put through the annealing process, it comes out indistinguishable in appearance from carbon steel.

[5] These earlier warnings were issued in March 1982 and are outlined in fns. 11 and 15 of the judge's decision.

ber 2, nomination of Grodis for the vice president position at a union meeting. McDonald's union activity was limited to his response to employee Germano, an incumbent union trustee and steward, who asked him on November 3, how he intended to vote. McDonald replied that he wanted to hear the issues before he decided. Germano shouted, "In other words you are going to vote for them."[6] Under these circumstances, we find the General Counsel has failed to show that the Respondent had knowledge of Lucas' or McDonald's union activity. Thus, so far as the evidence shows, the Respondent knew of the union activities of only one of the three men, i.e., the Respondent knew about McClain's agreement, in late October, to run for a trustee position on the slate opposing the incumbents, because on the day following McClain's decision to run he informed Foreman Thompson by asking Thompson what he thought about McClain's candidacy.

Although we agree with the judge that the Respondent acted to favor the incumbent union officers, we find this favoritism and the Respondent's knowledge that one of the three employees disciplined was involved in the campaign against the incumbents provide, under the circumstances, an inadequate base on which to make a finding that the discipline imposed was motivated by the employees' union activity. McClain had received a prior warning in March 1982 for poor workmanship, which stated that a repetition could be grounds for discharge. McDonald similarly had received a previous written warning for poor workmanship in March 1982 for using the wrong material, and he had been given a 3-day suspension. The discipline imposed in November on these two employees—written warnings and a 2-day suspension—is not out of proportion to that imposed the prior March before the union activity. Lucas' written warning without suspension is similarly in accord with his record. He had not incurred prior related discipline and the discipline imposed on him was like that given to Coble, who is not alleged to have been unlawfully discriminated against. Under these circumstances, we find that the types of discipline imposed do not suggest discriminatory motivation.

Similarly, we do not find that the Respondent's delay in discovering the defect supports the General Counsel's case. It does not appear unusual, considering the nature of the Respondent's business, that the parts could remain in stock from June until October. The Respondent manufactures and sells pressure gauges and temperature instruments. The Respondent manufactures the individual component parts and assembles the parts based on orders from customers. Further, after McClain performed the annealing process, the parts incorrectly made from stainless steel became indistinguishable in appearance from those correctly made of carbon steel and thus there was no visible indication that a defect existed in the parts while they were stored in the stockroom. Further, the record does not contradict the Respondent's explanation for the timing of the discipline—that the defect in the parts had become apparent when they were placed in an assembly in late October and that some time was required thereafter to retrieve production information and to complete an investigation showing which employees had fabricated the defective parts. Under these circumstances, we conclude that the General Counsel has failed to show that the timing of the discipline evidenced that the Respondent's decision was discriminatorily motivated. In sum, we find that the General Counsel has not satisfied her initial burden under Wright Line, i.e., she has failed to establish a prima facie case that the discipline was motivated by union activity.

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to offer Grodis and McClain[7] immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.[8]

---

[6] The judge noted that McDonald's union activities were extremely limited and would clearly not be adequate to sustain a violation. The judge concluded, however, that if the Respondent wanted to penalize Lucas and McClain for their activities McDonald would have to be included because he was between Lucas and McClain in the production of the part.

[7] The record is unclear whether McClain was recalled to department 145 on a full-time basis subsequent to his November 1982 layoff. The record indicates that commencing March 1983 McClain was recalled to department 145 on a sporadic basis, and that in August or September he was recalled on some undefined basis to department 145 before again being laid off in September or October for lack of work. We shall leave resolution of this issue to the compliance stage of this proceeding. If it is determined there that McClain was recalled to department 145 on a full-time basis in 1983, we shall not order reinstatement as provided in this remedy, and the make-whole remedy regarding him will terminate with the date of such recall.

[8] Contrary to the judge, we do not order the Respondent to offer reinstatement to employee Bromley. We note that subsequent to Bromley's discharge on November 4 the Respondent offered Bromley reinstatement to his former position and that Bromley declined the offer. Further, although Bromley later accepted employment with the Respondent in a different position, we have found, in agreement with the judge, that Bromley was not constructively discharged from that latter position. In these circumstances, we find that Bromley is not entitled to reinstatement.

We shall also order the Respondent to remove from its files any reference to the October 1 discharges of Ferreira and Grodis, the November 4 discharge of Bromley, and the November 11 layoff of McClain, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that their discharges or layoffs will not be used against them in any way. We shall also order the Respondent to make Ferreira, Grodis, Bromley, and McClain whole for any loss of earnings and benefits in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Dresser Industries, Inc., Stratford, Connecticut, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging, suspending, or otherwise discriminating against its employees because of their support for, or participation in, a slate of candidates opposing the incumbent officers or agents of Food, Beverage and Express Drivers, Teamsters Local No. 145, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO (the Union) in an intraunion election.

(b) Reprimanding employees, through warnings or other means, because of their support for, or participation in, a slate of candidates opposing the incumbent officers or agents of the Union in an intraunion election.

(c) Disparately applying its November 12, 1982 memorandum by allowing campaigning by the nominees on the slate with William Kuba, while, at the same time, forbidding campaigning by nominees on the slate with Abel Ferreira.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Francis Grodis immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Offer Glean McClain immediate and full reinstatement to his former job, if it has not already done so, or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his layoff, plus interest.

(c) Make Abel Ferreira and Antonio Bromley whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharges, plus interest.

(d) Remove from its files any reference to the October 1, 1982 discharges of Ferreira and Grodis, the November 11, 1982 layoff of McClain, and the November 4, 1982 discharge of Bromley, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful activity will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(e) Post at its Stratford, Connecticut facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Officer in Charge for Subregion 39, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Officer in Charge in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the consolidated complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations not specifically found herein.

[9] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge, lay off, suspend, or otherwise discriminate against you because of your support for, or participation in, a slate of candidates opposing the incumbent officers or agents of Food, Beverage and Express Drivers, Teamsters Local No. 145, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO in an intraunion election.

WE WILL NOT reprimand you, through warnings or other means, because of your support for, or participation in, a slate of candidates opposing the incumbent officers or agents of the Union in an intraunion election.

WE WILL NOT disparately apply our November 12, 1982 memorandum by allowing campaigning by the nominees on the slate with William Kuba, while, at the same time, forbidding campaigning by nominees on the slate with Abel Ferreira.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Francis Grodis immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL offer Glean McClain immediate and full reinstatement to his former job, if we have not already done so, or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his layoff, plus interest.

WE WILL make Abel Ferreira and Antonio Bromley whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharges, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the October 1, 1982 discharges of Ferreira and Grodis, the November 4 discharge of Bromley and the November 11, 1982 layoff of McClain and we will notify them in writing that this has been done and that the discharges and layoff will not be used against them in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Fairfield, Connecticut, on December 5 through 9, 1983, and February 6, 1984. The order consolidating cases and complaint and notice of hearing issued on August 12, 1983, based on the above-mentioned charges (and a first and second amended charge in Case 39-CA-1509) filed on October 25 and November 10, 1982,[1] and January 24 and March 3, 1983. The consolidated complaint basically alleges that Dresser Industries, Inc (Respondent) engaged in discriminatory conduct against Abel Ferreira, Francis Grodis, Glean McClain, Antonio Bromley, Edward McDonald Jr., and Edward Lucas Jr. because they ran for offices and positions in Food, Beverage and Express Drivers, Teamsters Local No. 145, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union), against the incumbents of the Union and engaged in other concerted activities. The consolidated complaint also alleges that Respondent promulgated a rule regarding campaigning in order to discourage employees from campaigning for union office and, further, enforced the rule unfairly to allow campaigning by the incumbent group, while preventing the above-mentioned insurgent candidates from campaigning. All this is alleged to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in Stratford, Connecticut, is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale of pressure gauges and temperature instruments. During the calendar year ending December 31, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operation, purchased and received at its Stratford facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Connecticut. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

---

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization with the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE FACTS

A. Formation of the Insurgent State

The Union has been the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees for approximately 20 years; at the time of the hearing this unit comprised in excess of 500 employees. For much of this period, William Kuba, the Union's secretary-treasurer, and Ernie Porco, an employee of Respondent and an assistant business agent of the Union, had been union officers. The General Counsel alleges that the difficulties involved here commenced because in 1982 Ferreira organized a slate of individuals to run against Kuba and Porco's slate in the upcoming union election. The necessary implication of this argument is that Respondent preferred to deal with the Kuba-Porco slate, rather than Ferreira and his slate.

Sometime prior to April, employee Paul Keegan encouraged Ferreira to run on a slate against the incumbent union officers because of what he claimed was the poor representation they were receiving from the Union; Ferreira rejected these appeals. About April, Ferreira informed Keegan that he changed his mind and would run for secretary-treasurer and organize the remaining slate to run against the Kuba team. Shortly thereafter, Ferreira asked Grodis if he would be willing to run for president of the Union on Ferreira's slate, and he said that he would. Sometime thereafter, Ferreira told Grodis that he felt it would be better to have candidates who were employed at other companies as well as Respondent, and he asked Grodis if he would run for vice president instead, and he again agreed.[2] Ferreira asked Keegan to run on his slate as trustee and fellow employee Loretta Bennadette as recording secretary, and they agreed. In May or June he asked Bromley to join his slate as a trustee, and he said that he would think about it. About October, Ferreira repeated the request and on this occasion, Bromley agreed. About the end of October (after returning to Respondent's employ subsequent to being discharged) Ferreira asked McClain to be on his slate as a trustee; on the following day, McClain agreed. At the union meeting on November 2, Ferreira's slate was nominated, as was the Kuba-Porco slate; Lucas nominated Grodis at this meeting. Ferreira testified that prior to November 2, other than his conversations with the candidates on his slate, he did not inform anybody else of the candidates on his slate, except for his own candidacy.

About September, while Ferreira was working on his machine, fellow employee Daniel Zajac approached him with the union contract in his hand and asked Ferreira's advice about a grievance he had filed; Ferreira told him that he did not want to get involved. At that moment, Irving Nash, Ferreira's foreman and an admitted supervisor, came out of his office and said that he did not want Ferreira discussing union business, and that he was not going to fight two unions. At that point, Zajac walked away.

About August or September, Grodis spoke to John Caldwell, Respondent's manufacturing manager: "I wanted to see how he felt about running for Union office, how he felt . . . about me running. I didn't mention any names or I didn't say we." Caldwell said he had no objection and felt that it was good to run for election, "but he just didn't want any trouble in the plant because . . . he said that there could be bloodshed." Grodis assured him that there would be no trouble. On September 29, Grodis went to the office of Neil Priestly, Respondent's general superintendent, to discuss a suggestion he had conceived of; after discussing this suggestion, Grodis informed Priestly of his intention to run for union office. Priestly said that there was nothing he could do, and Grodis asked if he would do him a favor and keep Respondent's Personnel Manager Robert Martin "off our backs" since Martin was friendly with Porco. Priestly said that there was nothing he could do and that he did not want to get involved; he wished him luck. On another occasion (he could not place the time) Grodis informed his foreman, William Sherwood, that he was running for union office.

McClain testified that later in the day after he informed Ferreira that he would consider being a candidate on his slate, he asked his foreman (and friend) Howard Thompson what he thought of his running on Ferreira's slate as a trustee. Thompson told him that it would be good if he won, but if he lost, the pressure would be put on him. He told McClain that he was making good money and he should think about it, but "if I was you I wouldn't do it. He said that he had run against the Kuba slate 20 years earlier and lost, and it might look like he was pushing McClain to run because he and Kuba do not like each other.

Bromley testified that in August he asked Thompson (his supervisor whom he had known for many years) what he thought about he and Ferreira running for union office against the Kuba slate. Thompson told him that he had run for union office many years earlier and he encountered a lot of trouble because of the Union's influence with Respondent, and they would also have a difficult time for that reason. Thompson agrees that Bromley told him of his candidacy substantially before late October. Martin testified that he did not learn that Ferreira was running for union office until mid- or late-November; he did not learn of Grodis' involvement until "a long time" after his discharge on October 1, also about late November. Ridolfi testified that he does not remember ever being informed that Bromley was running on the Ferreira slate. He testified that the first he learned of Ferreira's involvement was in November when Nash complained to him of all the activity in his department as a result of Ferreira's candidacy. Shortly thereafter, he knew for sure when he received the unfair labor practice charge filed by Ferreira with the Board on November 10.[3] He testified that he did not receive this knowledge from the October 25 charge.

[2] At Ferreira's request, Steven Jablonski and Tony Amaro (both employed by Drake's Bakery, whose employees are represented by the Union) agreed to run on Ferreira's slate for president and business agent, respectively.

B. Discharge of Ferreira and Grodis

Ferreira had been employed by Respondent for 7 years; during that period, the only reprimand he received was a verbal warning for poor attendance some years prior. Grodis had been employed by Respondent for 6 years and had never received any warnings or discipline; in mid-September he received a promotion to leadman. For many years prior to their discharge, nobody had ever been disciplined for engaging in gambling or promoting gambling at the plant. Stated briefly, the General Counsel alleges that Ferreira and Grodis were discharged because they were candidates on the slate running against Kuba's incumbent slate. Respondent counters that their union activity was not cause of their discharges; rather they were discharged for violating a rule against gambling, more particularly selling New York State Lottery (lottery) tickets to fellow employees.[4] The General Counsel, in turn, states that Ferreira and Grodis had been purchasing lottery tickets as a favor for their fellow employees for 4 months and that this was a pretext that Respondent seized on in order to discharge them. Additionally, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent permitted numerous forms of gambling and commercial activity, more serious than that undertaken by Ferreira and Grodis, without penalty, thereby establishing that it was their anti incumbent union candidacy that caused their discharges.

Commencing about June, Ferreira and Grodis drove to New York once a week in order to purchase lottery tickets; they sometimes went together and, at other times, separately. Within a short period of time, their fellow employees became aware of it and asked Ferreira and Grodis to purchase tickets for them. On these occasions the employees paid them, in advance, the amount required to purchase the tickets and, on occasion, gave them an additional dollar to cover gas and tolls.[5] On the average they purchased tickets for 15 employees a week; they testified that Nash often gave them money to purchase tickets for Richard Rodenhizer, Respondent's general foreman. At the end of each week, Ferreira wrote the winning lottery number in large print on the inspection table in his department, together with the word "Lotto" so that the people would not continually question him about the winning number. Zajac testified that when he first observed Ferreira with lottery tickets he asked him if "he would do me the favor and pick some up for me." Ferreira did so and each week Zajac paid him $4 for the lottery tickets; every other week, Zajac gave him a dollar for gas; he did this voluntarily, not because Ferreira asked him, but because Ferreira was doing him a favor. Employee Freddie Washington testified that he also asked Ferreira to purchase lottery tickets for him; on each of these occasions he gave Ferreira $4 for the tickets and an additional dollar to cover gas. Rodenhizer testified that he never purchased lottery tickets in the plant; he did purchase them while visiting relatives in New York State, and brought them back into Connecticut. He never personally observed Ferreira or Grodis selling lottery tickets in the plant, although he had "heard that they had Lotto tickets."

Early on the morning of October 1, Grodis was in the digigauge room of the plant looking at a newspaper to see if any of the winning numbers corresponded to his lottery tickets; prior to that, an employee (identified only as "Mac") had given him money to purchase lottery tickets for him. Martin walked into the room and asked Grodis what he was doing; Grodis told him that he was checking his lottery tickets against the winning numbers, closed the paper, walked out, and returned to work. Shortly thereafter, about 8 a.m., Martin stopped Grodis in the hallway and told him that William Ridolfi, Respondent's manager of industrial relations, wished to speak to him in his office; on the way, Martin asked Porco to accompany them to Ridolfi's office. Grodis testified that when they arrived at Ridolfi's office, Ridolfi told Grodis that he was being terminated for selling lottery tickets, which was a serious offense. Grodis said that he never sold lottery tickets, although he did play them. Ridolfi said that by law what he did was illegal and he was considering contacting the Federal authorities and having him arrested for his activities. Grodis was then asked to go to Martin's office where he stayed for a few hours; during this period Porco told him that Respondent was interviewing witnesses. About 11 a.m., Martin and William Sherwood, Grodis' supervisor, came into Martin's office; Porco was still present. At that time, Martin told him that he was being terminated for selling lottery tickets in violation of Respondent's policy. He was given his personal property and left.

Ferreira testified that on October 1, Nash told him that he was to report to Martin's office. He and his steward went to Martin's office, stopping along the way to get Porco. When they arrived at his office, Martin read from a paper and said that Respondent had conducted a lengthy investigation into lottery gambling at the plant and had determined that it was against Respondent's policy and Federal law. He asked Ferreira if he had anything to say and Ferreira said that he did not. Martin asked if he admitted selling lottery tickets and Ferreira said that he was not admitting to anything, and asked who said that he was selling the lottery tickets; Martin said that he was. Ferreira asked what he was going to do, and Martin said that he was going to terminate Ferreira; Porco told Martin that he did not have any proof. Ferreira then asked Martin for proof and Martin said that he did not have to show him anything, and he was escorted out of the plant.

[3] The initial unfair labor practice charge filed October 25 and received by Respondent on October 27, alleges that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating Ferreira and Grodis on October 1, on the demand of the Union "in derogation of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and in order to encourage membership in said labor organization." Ferreira filed another charge against Respondent on November 10 alleging: "Since on or about November 3, 1982, and continuing to date, the above Employer has restricted my right to engage in union activities on behalf of Teamsters, Local 145, while permitting other employees' their Section 7 rights."

[4] Counsel for Respondent alleges that these acts by Ferreira and Grodis also constituted a violation of 19 U.S.C. § 1301. As I find this irrelevant to the instant proceeding, I make no determination in that regard.

[5] The distance is about 50 miles and approximately $1.50 in tolls in each direction. Regarding the total amount he received weekly from his fellow employees for gas and tolls, Grodis testified: "If I got seven dollars, I was doing good." Ferreira testified that the amount they received for gas and tolls ranged from $10 to $18.

In 1981, Respondent posted the following notice entitled "Plant Rules and Regulations: The following practices are strictly forbidden. Employees violating these rules will be subject to disciplinary action including dismissal." Rule 13 states: "Gambling or promoting gambling," rule 19 states: "Violations of any criminal law." The notice states that it was revised April 1981. In addition, on August 20, 1982, Respondent posted the following notice[6] entitled "Special Notice" and signed by Martin:

> Dresser Industries Instrument Division has the responsibility and obligation to provide a safe, pleasant, and lawful working environment for employees. Specifically, as stated in our rules and regulations, the Company prohibits:
> 1. Violation of Company policy or any criminal law.
> 2. Gambling or promoting gambling on Company property.
> It is Dresser's policy to assist the authorities in prosecuting violations of criminal law by employees or former employees. Offenses of this nature may be grounds for termination.
> The position of Dresser, is, and will continue to be, quite firm.
> 3. Gambling, either by arranging for games of chance of whatever kind or by contributing to such activities, on Company property will not be tolerated.
> Dresser will actively continue investigations and will employ all measures necessary to assure that everyone is provided with a quality work environment.

Martin testified that this notice was posted as a result of rumors he had heard that gambling was occurring on the premises. Ridolfi testified that about January or February he was informed that there was gambling taking place in the plant: "I went out to the plant and looked around and I didn't see anything." He did not ask anyone to investigate this allegation. Later at a retirement party in May he was informed of gambling activities taking place at the plant; no names were mentioned, but pools were mentioned; he does not believe that the lottery was mentioned. He decided to post the notice referred to above.

Martin testified that weeks prior to October 1, Ridolfi informed him that gambling was taking place in the plant; whether an investigation began prior to October 1, he testified: "Whatever information I could glean, yes,"[7] although it did not focus on anyone in particular, Grodis was one of the employees he suspected. He testified that on the morning of October 1, Ridolfi told him that he heard that there was gambling taking place in the digigauge room and that Grodis was involved in it; he told Martin to see if anything was taking place there. He told Martin that he had received a tip from someone that this was taking place, but he did not identify from whom he received the tip. When he arrived at the room he observed Grodis conversing with another employee, James McGuire; Grodis' hand containing lottery tickets was extended toward McGuire. Martin asked Grodis what he was doing and Martin said: "Nothing. I'm checking my numbers," put the tickets back into his wallet and left the room. Martin then returned to Ridolfi's office and informed him of what he had witnessed. Ridolfi told him to bring Grodis to his office; Martin got Grodis and Porco and brought them to Ridolfi's office. Ridolfi asked Grodis if he was engaged in gambling and selling lottery tickets; Martin initially testified: "Grodis denied everything." He later testified that Grodis denied that he was engaged in gambling and does not remember whether he answered the allegation regarding selling lottery tickets. Ridolfi then said that there was evidence that Grodis was involved in gambling; Grodis repeated his denial and Grodis, Porco, and Martin then left and went into Martin's office. Up to that time (according to Martin's testimony) Ridolfi had not told Grodis he was terminated. For the next 2-1/2 hours, Martin, Grodis, and Porco waited while Ridolfi further investigated the situation. At 11 a.m. they returned to Ridolfi's office together with Sherwood; Ridolfi asked him if he was engaged in gambling or playing the lottery. Initially Grodis denied both; Ridolfi said that they had evidence to establish otherwise, and Grodis admitted that he had purchased lottery tickets for himself and for other employees. Ridolfi asked if he made a profit on these purchases and Grodis said that some of the employees gave him extra money to cover gas and tolls. Ridolfi said that based on the evidence that he had, Grodis was engaged in promoting gambling and gambling activity, and for that reason he was being terminated, and Grodis left.

Martin testified that subsequent to that, Ridolfi told him that he had evidence that Ferreira, as well as Grodis, was involved in gambling activity and that he should meet with Ferreira and his steward. At this meeting, Martin told Ferreira that they had evidence that he was engaged in a violation of rules regarding gambling or promoting gambling, and asked if it were true. Ferreira said that he would not respond. Martin said, "Well, the evidence is pretty clear and as a result of our investigation in this matter you're being terminated."

Ridolfi testified that when he arrived at his office on September 30, a typed unsigned note was on his desk stating that Ferreira and Grodis were engaged in selling lottery tickets on a weekly basis; the note also listed about 30 to 35 names of employees who purchased these tickets from Ferreira and Grodis. (Ridolfi said that he had previously received similar unsigned notes, and it has also happened since these occurrences.) Because he was busy that day, he paid "no particular attention" to it and placed it in his briefcase. At the end of the day he read the letter and told Martin to walk around the plant and investigate the situation the next day. Early the next morning, Martin told him that he did not observe any gambling in his inspection, and Ridolfi told Martin to go to the digigauge to see if any gambling activity was taking place there; he testified that he did this because McGuire's name was the first name (after Ferreira and Grodis) on the anonymous note as one of the purchasers of lottery tickets from Ferreira and Grodis, and he worked in the digigauge room. Martin brought Grodis and Porco to his office; Ridolfi asked Grodis if he were selling lottery tickets and Grodis said that he was not. Ridolfi said that he had reason to believe that he was selling lottery tickets to fellow employees; Grodis said it was not true. He testified that at this meeting he did not tell Grodis that he was fired. Ridolfi then asked Martin to take Grodis and Porco to his office. He then called for some of the employees whose names were on the anonymous note. He first met with McGuire and asked him if he had purchased lottery tickets from Grodis. He said that he had and Ridolfi asked him how often he purchased the tickets and how much he paid. McGuire said that he purchased them every week and, in addition to the regular cost for the ticket, he paid something extra "for the service." Ridolfi asked McGuire if he would sign a statement to that effect and he said that he would, and he did. Ridolfi then met with Joe Minaudo and asked him the same questions; Minaudo said that he was purchasing lottery tickets, but when Ridolfi asked if he would sign a statement to that effect, he walked out, saying "No way." Ridolfi then interviewed three to eight additional employees and then told Martin to bring Grodis and Porco back into his office. At that time, Ridolfi told Grodis that he had proof that he was selling lottery tickets; Grodis said that he did not actually sell them; rather he purchased the tickets for other employees. Ridolfi asked if he charged higher prices than the actual ticket price; Grodis said that he did not. When Ridolfi said that he had evidence that he received additional money for the tickets, Grodis said that some employees give him money for gas. Ridolfi told him that based on the evidence he was in violation of Respondent's rule on gambling (which Grodis said that he was aware of) and because of that, he was being discharged.

[7] He testified that prior to October 1, this investigation consisted of: "Being more diligent and observant as to the potential for gambling when I was out on the shop floor."

Regarding the discharge of Ferreira, Ridolfi testified that in his discussions with Minaudo and Nash, they informed him that they had purchased the tickets from Ferreira; on that basis, Ridolfi told Martin to call in Ferreira, tell him that they had evidence that he was involved in the sale of lottery tickets "gambling" and that he should inform him that he was being discharged.

Martin testified that it was Ridolfi who made the decision to fire Ferreira and Grodis; since Ridolfi became manager of industrial relations (about 1981) these decisions have generally been made by Martin; he could only testify to one situation, where an employee threatened Ridolfi, where Ridolfi made the determination to discharge an employee, since assuming his new position. Ridolfi testified that he has made the decision to discharge four employees since becoming the manager of industrial relations.

Martin testified that later on October 1, he called employee Freddie Washington into his office as part of the further investigation because Ridolfi told him that his name was included on the anonymous note he received. Washington admitted that he had purchased lottery tickets and, according to Martin's testimony, he admitted indirectly that he purchased the tickets from Ferreira. He also interviewed two other employees who admitted that they had asked Grodis to purchase lottery tickets for them. Ridolfi had directed him to speak to these employees as well, and neither they nor Washington was disciplined for their activities; the reason, according to Martin's testimony "in this case we went to the heart of the matter and disciplined those people who were at the very heart of the gambling operation."

Washington testified that his meeting with Martin took place in Martin's office a day or two after Ferreira and Grodis' discharge. Martin told Washington he wanted to speak to him and asked if he wished to have his steward present; Washington said that he did not. Martin asked him if he had been purchasing lottery tickets in the shop and Washington said yes, he had been playing the lottery. Martin asked him if he had been purchasing the tickets from Ferreira, and Washington said that he would not say from whom he purchased the tickets. Martin said that it was against company policy to gamble or promote gambling in the plant and it was grounds for discharge; Martin then showed Washington Respondent's rule to that effect. Washington said he did not believe he was doing anything wrong because it was a legal lottery operated by New York State; he also told Martin: "how can you tell me that I can lose my job for that, and it's legal, where there's so much illegal stuff going on in the shop?" In this regard he mentioned illegal numbers games, football pools, and the sale of jewelry. Martin did not ask him who was involved in these activities and said "that's not the issue right now." Martin then asked him to sign a statement that he had purchased lottery tickets from Ferreira; Washington refused. He testified that this statement was prepared prior to when he entered Martin's office.

Ridolfi testified that the only other employee who was disciplined for his lottery involvement was Nash,[8] who was given a written warning admonishing him for his involvement, and providing that any additional violation would lead to his discharge; nobody else was disciplined because "we would probably end up discharging a good number of people." Nash only received a reprimand because: "He was purchasing the tickets. He wasn't involved in the sale of it."

[8] Ridolfi testified regarding his meetings with Nash:

> The first time he said that he purchased from Mr. Ferreira and Mr. Grodis. Then the . . . subsequent meeting he denied, or was very vague on Mr. Ferreira's involvement, and that he ever purchased from Mr. Ferreira.

He never asked Nash for a written statement.

On October 13, representatives of Respondent and representatives of the Union (Kuba and Porco) together with Ferreira met to discuss the discharges. Respondent claimed that it had enough evidence to uphold the discharges; the Union claimed that it did not and said that it would take the case to arbitration. On October 25 Kuba informed Ferreira that Respondent agreed to reinstate him the following day, but without backpay for the period that he was out and Ferreira returned to work the next day. Grodis was never reinstated. Ridolfi testified that he had signed statements from employees regarding Grodis' involvement in the sale of lottery tickets, and he felt that this discharge would be sustained through an arbitration procedure. However, he had no signed statement regarding Ferreira's involvement and although Nash originally implicated Ferreira, his "testimony" changed a few weeks later; he was never asked to give a written statement. On this basis, Ridolfi did not feel its determination would stand, so Ferreira was reinstated.

The Union grieved both terminations: Ferreira's October 25 suspension and Grodis' discharge. When no satisfactory agreement was reached on these matters, arbitrations were scheduled for both. Ferreira and Grodis each withdrew the grievances prior to arbitration.

Respondent defends that Ferreira and Grodis were discharged solely for gambling in violation of Respondent's rules posted in 1981 and 1982. The General Counsel counters that the numerous gambling activities occurring in the plant establish that the Ferreira and Grodis discharges were pretextual, and were actually caused by their insurgency slate in the upcoming union election.

Anthony Iodice

Iodice (who did not testify) is a steward and is employed by Respondent as a tow motor operator; his son, Guy Iodice, is a foreman employed by Respondent. There was a great deal of testimony about Iodice's operation of an illegal numbers operation at Respondent's plant; it follows:

As part of his job, Iodice drives his vehicle through the aisles at Respondent's plant delivering and picking up goods and material. Grodis testified that during the entire period of his employment with Respondent, he observed Iodice on a daily basis stopping his vehicle in the aisle, asking employees if they wanted to play a number, and writing the number on a piece of paper and driving off. Ferreira testified that beginning when he commenced his employment with Respondent through October 1983 he observed Iodice operate an illegal numbers game regularly while he was employed on days, although this activity "slowed down" during 1982. He observed Iodice stopping his vehicle in an aisle, speaking to an employee, receiving money, writing the number on a piece of paper, and leaving. Ferreira purchased numbers from him in the past. Employee Judy Tumbleston testified that for the 7-year period of her employment with Respondent, she has observed Iodice collecting numbers from employees three or four times a week. This involved stopping his tow motor, taking the numbers from the employees, collecting the money, and later using the public telephone to call the numbers in, about noontime. Employee Lorrie Coverson testified that she first observed Iodice taking numbers from employees when she commenced her employment with Respondent about 1977; the most recent occasion was early in 1983. She observed him doing this: "Not regularly. On occasion I would have to say." On one occasion while she was talking to him, an employee approached him, and gave him a number on a piece of paper and some money. In addition, on occasion when she was with fellow employee Natalie Howard, she observed Iodice approach her and take her number. She has also heard Iodice calling in his numbers over the bank of pay telephones about 15 feet from Respondent's personnel department. Lucas testified that he first observed Iodice playing numbers about 1974, when he commenced his employment with Respondent; from that time until about 1981, when he drove a tow motor like Iodice, he observed Iodice selling numbers three to five times a week. The usual procedure was that Iodice stopped his tow motor in the aisle and there was no room for Lucas to drive by; Lucas stopped his tow motor to find Iodice, and observed him taking numbers and money from employees on these occasions. He also observed Iodice calling in these numbers on the telephone in his son's office, and on the pay phones. Since 1981 he has not observed Iodice's operation with the same frequency. The last occasion that he observed Iodice's number operation was approximately a month prior to the instant hearing.

Zajac testified that he observed Iodice's numbers operation from the time he commenced working days (approximately 1978) until 2 weeks prior to the hearing, and almost on a daily basis in between. Zajac played the numbers regularly with Iodice; Iodice drove his tow motor into the area, parked it in the aisle and got the number and the money from Zajac. On one occasion, Nash told Lucas that he had won on a number, although he did not say that it was bet through Iodice.

McClain testified that beginning when he commenced employment with Respondent, about 1976, until a few weeks prior to the instant hearing, he saw Iodice taking numbers from employees, and almost on a daily basis. On one occasion, while McClain was on the pay phone in the plant, Iodice asked if he could use the phone; he gave McClain a dime and called in his numbers; he has also observed Iodice counting his money in the bathroom. McDonald testified that "on many occasions" he has observed Iodice taking numbers and money from employees, the last time being within a month of the hearing. Keegan testified that he has observed Iodice on approximately 100 occasions taking numbers; the procedure is for him to stop his tow motor and the employee gives him a piece of paper and the money. When I asked Thompson if he knew that Iodice was running a numbers operation in the plant, he testified: "No. I don't know that for a fact." Martin testified that he never saw or heard that Iodice was involved in running a numbers operation at the plant. Ridolfi testified that after October 1, he received another anonymous note that referred to some wrongdoing by Iodice. He directed Martin to go through the plant to observe Iodice, and he did the same; neither saw Iodice doing anything improper.

Other Forms of Gambling or Commercial Activity

Another alleged form of gambling taking place at the plant during this period was a football pool operated on Fridays during the football season by George Germano, employee, union trustee, and steward. Grodis testified that Germano operated a pool on the weekend football games. He first observed it when he commenced working days and last observed it shortly prior to his discharge. Germano drew up a sheet of paper that was later numbered 1 to 10 along the top, and 1 to 10 down, but not in numerical order. Employees wrote their names in one (or more) of these 100 boxes to bet on the score of the particular game. The employee whose name corresponded to the last digits of the score of the game was the winner. Germano posted the sheet on his workbench where employees filled in their name. Ferreira testified that he observed employees placing their names on the paper (hung on the board at his desk) and paying Germano a dollar per bet, but he could not remember when he last observed it. Zajac testified that Germano conducted the football pool, but did not conduct it in 1982. Germano left the sheet on top of his desk and the employees picked a square and wrote their name on it. Zajac won the pool on a number of occasions. McDonald testified that he first observed Germano operating the football pool about 5 years earlier; he last observed it in 1981 or 1982. He observed the sheet hanging at Germano's desk for the employees to fill in their names. Keegan testified that Germano ran the football pool and, at times, a baseball pool. The sheet was hung on a board at his desk for the employees to choose a box and fill in their name. The last time he observed it was December 1982. Thompson testified that he never observed a football pool at the plant, but "there were rumors to that effect." Rodenhizer was asked if he were aware that a football pool was conducted at the plant from 1981 to the present time; he testified: "Only through hearsay that they existed." He never conducted an investigation to determine whether gambling was actually occurring at this time. Martin testified that he had heard that there was a pool on the results of the Super Bowl in January 1982, although he never observed it. He did not take any action in this regard.

Ferreira testified that about 1977, while he was employed in department 181, during the football season, he observed Joe Minaudo, an employee and union steward, selling slips for gambling on the professional football games. He was engaged in this activity from about Tuesday through Friday. Each slip had 10 games listed on it, with the point spread, and if you won all 10, you won $300. Ferreira won it once. This ceased the summer 1982 when Minaudo was arrested for engaging in gambling activities. McDonald testified that while he was employed in department 145 (until about 1982), he observed Minaudo passing out the slips for the football games the following weekend, between Tuesday and Friday of that week. He first observed this about 1978. Grodis testified that employee Heddy Pasank ran a World Series pool at the plant. This involved picking a team and an inning and the employee who picked the half inning with the most runs scored won; she posted the notice at her work station, and he observed Nash participating in the pool. He last observed this in 1981. Zajac testified likewise about the World Series pool conducted by Pasank and that there was no pool in 1982.

There was also testimony regarding commercial activity on Respondent's premises engaged in by Barbara Raganese, a timekeeping employee. Raganese's work location is on the main aisle approximately 100 feet from Respondent's personnel department, with a door in between. Tumbleston testified that Raganese ran "a general store" at her desk, displaying goods ranging from jewelry to toys, which she sold, on her desk. Some of the displayed items were up to 2 feet tall; she first observed this in fall 1982 and last observed it Christmas 1982. Coverson testified that Raganese sells toys and dolls that are displayed on her desk; one of the dolls was about 2 feet tall. She observed these items on Raganese's desk about twice a week from fall 1982 through August 1983. About September 1982 she purchased a toy dog from Raganese. Zajac testified that his work location is at a different end of the plant, and only passes Raganese's desk when he uses the pay telephones near the personnel department. He first noticed Raganese's commercial operation about Christmas 1982; the last time was about a month prior to the hearing. He observed dolls, jewelry, and other items on her desk; the items varied and were not visible on every occasion that he walked by her desk, but were usually there during holiday periods. Some of the items were small, and others were as large as 2 feet high. Keegan testified that "since I can remember" Raganese has old and displayed toys from her desk in the plant; the most recent occasion he observed toys displayed on Raganese's desk was a few weeks prior to the hearing.

Thompson testified that he walks past Raganese's desk and "may have seen . . . watches or things of that nature . . . . Quite often she has flowers or little decorations or little things up there. A lot of employees in the shop have." He has not seen more than one doll on her desk at any one time. He heard that she was selling items from her desk. Within the year prior to the hearing he spoke to her about it, and "she said that she had been warned and said there was no way that she was going to get involved with anything like that again." Rodenhizer testified that he was aware that Raganese had items on her desk for sale during 1982, but he did not know what time of the day this activity was taking place. Martin testified that his office is approximately 25 feet from the entrance to the production area of the plant, and he goes into the plant five or six times a day on an average, and when he walks straight down the main aisle he walks past Raganese's desk, but he has never observed dolls, toys, or other similar items displayed on her desk. He testified, however, that about October 1982 he heard that she sold dolls and toys to other employees; he later testified that "long after this 1982 period" he learned of Raganese's commercial operation through an anonymous note; although it would be a violation of rule 16 of Respondent's plant rules and regulations posted in April 1981, referred to earlier, no disciplinary action was taken against her because "I have no evidence that she actually did that." Raganese had never spoken to him about it and never asked Martin's permission to continue selling these items after Ferreira and Grodis' discharge. Ridolfi testified that he passes Raganese's desk four or five times a week and never noticed anything displayed on her desk. Raganese (who is still employed by Respondent) testified that prior to March 1983 she had sold goods in the plant without permission; at that time, Porco told her to ask Martin's permission for it. She asked Martin, and he said that she could do it, but not during her working time. About 2 months later, Martin approached her at her desk and handed her an anonymous note, saying, "I wish you could use more discretion." She looked at the note and it said that Iodice was taking numbers, she was selling items, and other employees were doing things and getting away with it, while other employees were being fired. Martin told her that she should be less obvious and she told him that she had permission and how could she be less obvious. He said that she should have the people pick up the items from her car rather than bring them into the shop.

C. Layoff of McClain

McClain commenced his employment with Respondent about 1976; for the 3 years prior to October he had been employed in department 145 as a heat treating machine operator; in addition to heat treating, the other areas of department 145 are hand welding and machine welding; Thompson is the foreman of the department. The base rate for his job was $6.40 an hour.[9] It took him a few months before his production reached that level; later, he was able to earn between two and three times this amount through his increased production. As stated, supra, in late October McClain agreed with Ferreira that he would run for trustee on his slate and spoke to Thompson about this decision; at the union meeting on November 2 he was nominated for that position. On the next morning, McClain observed Thompson and Germano talking in Thompson's office. Germano came out and told McClain "Cut your percentage because you're next." McClain said that one other employee, Chris Neely, had less seniority than he, and should be laid off ahead of him;[10] Germano said Thompson disagreed because Neely was the setup and instruct man on the night shift. Later that day, Thompson called McClain and Germano into his office; Thompson said that there was a lack of work and McClain was the next to be laid off and it would be effective the following Wednesday, November 11. McClain said that Neely had less seniority than he, and Thompson answered that Neely would be retained because he was the night-shift setup man. McClain said that there was nothing to set up because he was the only nightshift employee (all the others had previously been laid off). Thompson said that because he was the setup man on the night shift McClain could not bump him. McClain then went to see Martin; present at this meeting in Martin's office were McClain, Porco, Martin, and Thompson. Martin told him that he was being laid off due to a lack of work; he also gave him a choice of positions in other departments that he could "bump" if he wished to do so; he accepted a bench soldering position in department 127. He testified that at these meetings he was never asked if he would accept the night-shift job in department 145 (Neely's job) nor did he say that he was unavailable for that position. He also never offered to work nights. Thompson also testified that at this meeting McClain was never asked if he wished to transfer to the night shift. Prior to his layoff, two other employees in the heat treat area of his department were laid off.

Thompson testified that for the 6-month period prior to McClain's layoff production dropped by half; his entire department went from 32 employees to 18 or 19. Five or six of the 14 heat treat employees were laid off between late 1981 and November 1982; McClain was the last to be laid off. The only employee in the department in the heat treat area with less seniority was Neely, but he had a higher classification of set up operator and instruct, which meant that he had received instructions and could set up and perform every operation on every machine in the area, which McClain could not do. (McClain testified that he could operate every machine in the heat treat area, and because there was nobody else employed on the nightshift with Neely, the instruct classification meant nothing.) Neely's ability to set up and operate all the machines was important because Respondent periodically received orders for a small quantity of goods; rather than complete these orders on the day shift with an inordinate time being spent on the numerous setups, these orders were completed by Neely on the night shift; his ability to set up and operate all the machines made that possible. About 1981 McClain had been given the opportunity to learn all the operations in the heat treat area, but Thompson found that he was incapable of doing it. Neely acquired the setup and instruct classification more than a year prior to McClain's layoff.

Thompson testified that the past practice at the plant is that layoffs are by shift and job classification rather than plantwide seniority; the contract provides that layoffs are determined by seniority within the department, "providing the remaining employees can satisfactorily perform the remaining available work in the department." He testified that he uses the contract as a "guideline."

Employee Joan Johnson testified that in March 1983 she had a conversation with Thompson, who approached her while she was in her department. He told her that he had finally gotten rid of McClain, who was a troublemaker. He had work for him but he wanted to see McClain on the unemployment line (which he repeated a few times). Thompson testified that he did have a conversation in March 1983 with Johnson (Johnson is his late daughter's sister-in-law, and he had gotten her the job with Respondent). He stopped to speak to her (she works in a different department) and she asked if there were any layoffs in his department because there were layoffs throughout the plant. He said that there were and that McClain was laid off. Johnson asked if he would be returning and Thompson said that he did not believe so because work was very slow. Thompson also told her that McClain had been giving him problems[11] and maybe the transfer would make him appreciate the job and the high rate of pay he was earning when he returned; that was the extent of the conversations. He did not refer to McClain as a troublemaker or say that he wanted him to be on unemployment. He testified: "I would be guarded in my words, or anything I may have said to" Johnson because she was Coverson's sister-in-law, and Coverson was "very close" to McClain. Between that time and about September 1983, McClain was recalled to department 145 on a sporadic basis (between 1 and 3 days a week) "when the work picked up to the point where we required additional personnel"; about September 1983 he was again laid off from department 145 for lack of work. At that time, at a meeting in Martin's office with Martin, Rodenhizer, Thompson, Porco, and Germano, Martin asked McClain if he were interested in bumping Neely and working nights; McClain said that he was not because he had a part-time job teaching basketball at the "Y." Thompson testified that McClain's layoff was not connected in any way with the fact that he was running for union office.

[9] The plant generally operates on a piecework, incentive basis. If the amount of items he produced hourly equaled $6.40, it was referred to as earning 100 percent. If the amount of items he produced was less than 100 percent, he would still receive his base pay of $6.40 an hour, but if this continued for an extended period, Respondent would probably transfer him from the position. Under this incentive system, many employees were able to earn twice their base pay (200 percent) or more.

[10] Neely was the only employee in the heat treat area of department 145 with less seniority than he: there were two other employees in the other areas of the department with less seniority, but they engaged in operations he was not trained for.

Martin testified that in November McClain's job classification was heat treat, setup, and operate, while Neely's classification was heat treat, setup, operate, and instruct; the difference was that Neely had been rated qualified to instruct other employees. At the time, there were no other heat treat employees on the night shift that Neely was employed on; however, the job classification "instruct" means, in addition to instruct, that the employee is capable of performing all job classifications in the areas; Neely could, McClain could not. He testified that Respondent determines layoffs "by seniority within job classification within department." (McClain's seniority date is September 1976; Neely's is November 1979.) When he met with McClain and his steward in early November in his office, and informed him that he was going to be laid off, he asked McClain which shift he preferred, and he said he preferred that first shift. He then asked McClain if he were able to work the second shift and McClain said that he was not.

D. Discipline of McClain, Lucas, and McDonald

The genesis of this allegation was the alleged use of an incorrect metal product in the assembly of a part. The part involved is a steel tube, part no. ABX142E and the particular order involved was produced during the summer in department 145; McClain, Lucas, and McDonald were each involved in the production of this particular order.

There are three kinds of steel used in Respondent's operation: Chrome-molly, also known as carbon steel (carbon steel), stainless steel, and K-Monel. Stainless steel has a silver look to it, while carbon steel is darker (K-Monel is not involved here, so its properties will not be discussed). After the annealing (baking) process, carbon steel and stainless steel are indistinguishable; the tubes in question, admittedly, were made from stainless steel rather than carbon steel.

On November 24, McClain and McDonald were given written warnings for "poor workmanship"; the warnings recited that their use of stainless steel instead of carbon steel caused 161 tubes and 60 systems to be scrapped by Respondent. The warnings referred to previous written warnings McClain and McDonald had received and requested "that appropriate disciplinary action be taken against you up to and including discharge." (They were given brief suspensions.) Lucas' warning was dated December 3 (repeating a November 23 verbal warning he had been given) and recites that the cost of the error was $984; it states that "any recurrence of this same nature will require stronger disciplinary action and could even result in termination."

The General Counsel alleges that these warnings were issued in retaliation for the employees' union activity; as stated, supra, McClain ran for trustee on Ferreira's slate and Lucas nominated Grodis for his position. McDonald testified that on November 3, Germano (who did not testify) asked him whom he intended to vote for. McDonald answered that he wanted to hear the issues before he decided, Germano shouted, "In other words, you are going to vote for them." McDonald attempted to explain that he was undecided, but Germano walked away before he could do so. Respondent's position is that these warnings were caused solely by the errors made by McClain, Lucas, and McDonald in the processing of this order.

McDonald has been employed by Respondent since 1978. His stockroom is adjacent to department 145 and stores the parts for that department. One of the numerous items stored in that stockroom is the tube in question ABX142E. He testified that on November 4 or 5, Thompson approached him with one of Respondent's order forms in his hand, which was for the ABX142E,[12] and he asked McDonald if he had any of those tubes in his stockroom and McDonald said that he did. Thompson told him that they were made with the wrong material, stainless steel instead of carbon steel, so he should put a hold on the tubes. McDonald then checked the daily delivery sheets of his stockroom and found that 233 tubes produced from order 2BY82928 were received in his stockroom on August 10. About a day later, Thompson came into the stockroom and McDonald told him that the stockroom received 233 of the tubes in order 2BY82928, which was more recent than the order Thompson had shown him. Thompson then left and returned with order 2BY82928 and told McDonald to take a physical count of the ABX142E tubes in stock [13] (the count showed about 80 pieces, and to take them out of stock, which he did. Thompson then tested these tubes and when they did not stick to a magnet, he determined that they were made with stainless steel rather than carbon steel. A few days later, Thompson informed McDonald that Rodenhizer said that everybody who was involved with order 2BY82928 would be written up.

[11] Thompson testified that McClain was often arguing with the leadman and fellow employees in the department, to the point, at times, where he was uncontrollable. In 1981, McClain was involved in a fight with another employee in the department. In March 1982 McClain was given a warning by Thompson for poor workmanship. It stated that a repetition would be grounds for discharge.

[12] McDonald testified that the order form Thompson showed him was the same type of order involved, but was not the actual order form involved here, 2BY82928.

[13] McDonald testified that there is no way of determining which order a particular tube in the stockroom was produced from.

McDonald testified that he later attended a disciplinary meeting with Martin, Rodenhizer, Thompson, and his steward. At the meeting he was informed that he was being disciplined[14] for his part in the error on the order in question. He told them that he was still not convinced that the tubes in question were produced by order 2BY82928. Although Thompson had shown him a document allegedly establishing that ABXI42E had "zeroed out" prior to the fabrication of the order in question, he was not satisfied that it established that. He then asked why his leadman, Ernest Otero, who had assigned him the job, was not disciplined.[15] They said that he was not in question.

The question of fault arises here in two ways: the General Counsel denies that the defective tubes were produced in order 2BY82928, but defends that even if the wrong metal were used in order 2BY82928, it was not the responsibility of McDonald, Lucas, or McClain to select or check on the metal being used. This is more pronounced in the case of Lucas, whose position put him at the initial step in the process. The order states the different processes that were to be performed, and the order in which they would be performed. Lucas is the employee who performed the initial job function on order 2BY82928: "Issue tubing, check wall thickness." Lucas testified that he picked the material of this order, but alleges that he picked the correct material. He is confident of this because he wrote the bin location (from which he took the materials) on the order, and it is the correct bin location as specified on the order. Regarding the different kinds of metals used by Respondent, Lucas testified: "that is not my job to know." He removes the stock from the bin, ties it up, and writes the date, his clock number, the material, and the part number. He then brings it to the department involved. Each department has an inspector whose job it is to inspect the material prior to its issuance to an operator. In the last week of November, Fred DeLibro, his supervisor, told him that department 145 had a problem with some incorrect material he had issued them in June, but they were looking into it. On December 3, he was called into DeLibro's office; present were he, DeLibro, and his union steward, Richard Lupo. He told him that he was being given a verbal warning for issuing the wrong material on order 2BY82928 and gave him a copy of the order. Lucas asked how he could have issued the wrong stock when the order shows that the bin location he wrote on the order was the correct bin; DeLibro agreed with him and said that he could not understand it either. Lucas then told Lupo that it was the first time he was disciplined in 9 years of employment at Respondent, and asked him what he could do to fight the warning; Lupo (who did not testify) said that he could "wipe his ass" with it. DeLibro said that he did not feel it warranted any disciplinary action because it was his first disciplinary action, but Thompson wanted disciplinary action to be taken against him. He had asked for a written warning, but DeLibro convinced them that a verbal warning was adequate. McDonald performed the second and third process, "Cut to 7 3/4 length," "Burr both ends inside and out and wash" on June 23. McDonald testified that it was the responsibility of the leadman to give him the material to work on and, on the day in question, he finished a job and he asked Otero (who did not testify), his leadman, for another job. Otero gave him order 2BY82928 and brought him to a bench where the material was. He cut the material to the proper length, cut it and burred it as set forth in the order. He did not see the top left-hand portion of the order, which identified Chrome-molly as the material to be used, and testified that, at the time, he had no knowledge of what Chrome-molly was; he knew what carbon steel was, but did not know that it was the same as Chrome-molly. He testified: "When I'm given a job I assume that's the proper material, by the leadman . . . when he gives me a job it's his job to make sure that I've got the proper material with the order that he's given me." Several years earlier, the operators used to get their own materials for their orders; that was changed so that the leadmen give the operators the materials.

McClain testified that he first learned of the problem on November 24, while he was working in department 127; at that time he was called to Thompson's office; also present were Thompson, Rodenhizer, and Germano. Thompson told him that Respondent had lost a lot of money on some work that he performed and that he performed the job the wrong way because he did not read the entire order. He showed McClain order 2BY82928 with his initials on it; the order indicates that McClain performed two operations on this order: "Swage one end," which means that he makes one end of the tube smaller so that it will fit into another tube, and "Anneal at 1275 degree F," which means that he sets the furnace for 1275 and bakes it for an hour at that temperature. McClain asked Thompson what he meant by the entire order and Thompson pointed to the top-left hand portion of the second page of the order where it said "material" and "Chrome-molly." McClain told him that he had never worked with the material before and he was taught to read the orders for the operations to be performed. He also told him that he had received the work from Otero and the inspector, Josephine Coble, had signed the order establishing that it was correct and that the employees performing the operations ahead of him should have caught the error. McClain testified that the procedure he followed in department 145 was that the lead man gave him the order form and took him to where the material was. He then checks the order to see what operations he was assigned to do; "Nobody taught me how to look up in the corner what material it was. I've been there three years and nobody taught me that." Regarding whether he was aware that carbon steel is Chrome-molly, he testified "I never knew that name." He also testified that while he was employed in department 145 he always had the inspector inspect his work and initial the order: "Because that's the first thing Howard (Thompson) tells you, get the Inspector first."

[15] On March 19, 1982, McDonald was issued a written warning for using K-Monel rather than carbon steel, causing the tube to be rejected. He received a 3-day suspension for this error. He testified that when he was given this warning Thompson told him to "follow the order properly," but did not tell him that it was his responsibility to check that the proper material was being used.

Thompson testified that McDonald and McClain were disciplined for performing operations on the order without checking the type of material to be used, an error that caused Respondent to incur a loss of approximately $1000. He testified that it is the responsibility of the operator to check to see that the material he is operating on is correct; this is not the responsibility of the leadman: "The lead man's function is to assign work, to make major setups; major fixture changes and . . . help instruct and train the employees . . . . It is not his responsibilities to read and identify each and every order for an operator. It is the operator's responsibility. . . ."

Regarding the employees' testimony that they had not been instructed as to what Chrome-molly was, Thompson testified: "I can only say that an individual who's worked in that department all this time and does not know what type of material he's working with, or how to identify the type of material he's working with, I'm surprised that we've managed to make a gauge."

Stainless steel and carbon steel are easily differentiated; however, if stainless steel is mistakenly put through the annealing and oiling processes meant for carbon steel[16] (as occurred here), it comes out indistinguishable in appearance from carbon steel; that is the reason that those employees who performed operations on the order subsequent to McDonald and McClain were not disciplined; they had no way of knowing that the material was not carbon steel. When stainless steel is annealed, it becomes worthless to Respondent because it no longer meets its specifications.

Thompson testified further that at the end of October, the processing of an order, which contained tube ABX142E as a component part, was begun. The order was processed, and in about the second week of November, Thompson was informed by Otero and Coble that approximately 30 of the systems cracked when they were pressurized. He checked the order and saw that the tube should have been made of carbon steel; on checking it with a magnet he realized that it was stainless steel. He then determined to find out how many of these defective tubes there were and to isolate them; for that purpose, he went to the stockroom and asked McDonald to get all the ABX142E tubes in the stockroom; he tested them with his magnet and found that they were all stainless steel and he had them all removed from the stockroom and charged them to his department. Thompson then checked the bin box in the stockroom where these tubes came from and found an inspection tag identifying them as having been produced in order 2BY82928. As he learned that there was an order for ABX142E subsequent to order 2BY82928, he inspected the bin containing this order in the stockroom. He found few units left, and the ones that were there were made of carbon steel. He determined from this that the defective tubes were produced in order 2BY82928 and he went to Respondent's cost department and obtained a copy of the order, thereby learning which operators were involved in the processing of the order. Thompson then discussed the situation with Rodenhizer and they decided that because another order of ABX142E had gone into stock subsequent to those produced pursuant to order 2BY82928, that they should request an activity sheet (a computer printout of the quantity of the particular part entering and leaving the stockroom) of the part.[17] Thompson testified that this activity sheet established that there were 15 to 18 ABX142E tubes in the stockroom when the 2BY82928 order went into stock, which was probably in August because the order was being worked on in July, and the plant was closed the last 2 weeks of July. Rodenhizer told Thompson to figure the loss Respondent suffered due to the error. When this was determined, he and Rodenhizer decided that as McDonald and McClain were responsible for the error, they would be disciplined.

Thompson also testified that ABX142E is just one component of about seven necessary for a completed part, and such a part can remain in the stockroom for months before it is needed for production; that is why the error was not discovered until November.

Thompson also testified that Otero set up McClain's machines for him to perform his work assignments; he would set it up pursuant to the specifications set forth in the order. The operators should be aware of the differences in metals they work with, and should check all portions of the orders (including the material listed on the top left-hand corner of the second page) prior to performing their operations. In fact, when Thompson gave McClain his prior warning on March 19 he told him that it was his responsibility to read each order prior to performing any work on it to be sure that he had selected the proper materials and parts.

Rodenhizer testified that when Thompson first informed him of the faulty tube, he told Thompson to investigate the situation and locate the origin of the order. In this regard he reviewed numerous documents with Thompson, including the inventory activity sheet for ABX142E, which showed "basically only the one order in question. It is a relatively low active part." It showed that this part entered inventory in July and was issued in October or November; on this basis he recommended that McDonald and McClain be disciplined because it was their responsibility to check the material specified in the work order, and their failure to do so caused Respondent to suffer a loss. He did not recommend any discipline for Otero because he had nothing to do with the problem: "He would not have any recourse to go over there unless they have got a problem." When an order came into the department, he would set up the machine to cut the tubing at the specified length, but he would not necessarily cut the actual material. The material is chosen by the stockclerk from the stockroom based on the contents of the order. It is then the responsibility of the operator to "verify the material" and cut it on the machine previously set up by Otero. Martin testified that when McClain was first notified of his error, he defended that he could not tell the difference between the materials from the order (presumably, the word Chrome-molly), but that when he showed him the different materials, he was able to differentiate between carbon steel and stainless steel.

[16] Respondent does not perform annealing of stainless steel on its premises; it requires a different process and is performed elsewhere.

[17] Counsel for Respondent indicated at the hearing that the particular activity sheet that Thompson and Rodenhizer referred to no longer exists. However, the General Counsel introduced (and had received) into evidence an inventory activity sheet for ABX142E dated December 10. This covers receipts and issues of ABX142E (including the order numbers) from November 1981 through November 1982, approximately 50 transactions in all. Order 2BY82928 was not included, nor were any transactions between July 9 and October 28. This omission was never explained by Respondent.

E. Discipline of Bromley

Bromley has been employed by Respondent since about 1977; in January he transferred to department 145 (with some assistance from Thompson, whom he had known for a long time) and assumed the job of leak tester, a job paid on a piecework, incentive basis. The allegations regarding Bromley are that he was given a written warning dated October 21 and, after transferring to another department, was harassed, discriminated against, and threatened with discipline, all because he was nominated as a union trustee on Ferreira's slate. Respondent alleges that he received the warning dated October 21 because he was purposely misapplying his time and production, thereby improperly increasing his earnings, and that he was never harassed in his new position; rather his supervisors were attempting to get the appropriate amount of production from him.[18]

As stated, supra, Bromley transferred to department 145 in January, and from that time through September 27, he worked in that department as a leak tester. On that date he was injured on the job and was out until October 26, when he went to Respondent's personnel office with a doctor's note saying that he was only capable of performing limited duty for the next week; Respondent had no light work available and Bromley did not return to work until November 4, on which date he was given the warning dated October 21, to be discussed more fully, infra.

The leak tester tests the parts or assemblies produced by Respondent to be certain that they are airtight and can withstand a certain amount of pressure. For this purpose there are two different testing stations: the high pressure station tests the assemblies with air and the low pressure station tests them with water. There are a total of 14 or 15 fixtures available on these stations and the assemblies are attached to these fixtures for testing. Not all of these fixtures are operable at all times, and the rate paid to the leak tester depends on the number of fixtures available, e.g., at the time in question, if only 7 fixtures were operable, the leak tester's rate is 50 percent higher than if all 14 fixtures were available. Respondent provides a form for the leak testers, where they list the number of assemblies tested under the column of the number of fixtures available and, in a separate column, the number of assemblies that failed the test (leakers), which the leak test operator is also paid for on a specified piecework basis. Respondent alleges that Bromley was given the warning dated October 21 solely because he was cheating Respondent in two areas: he was claiming that fewer fixtures were available than actually were available, thereby receiving a higher rate for each assembly tested (Bromley denies this, and he was taking double credit for the leakers; this part will be discussed first.

As an illustration, order 2BY85466 was tested by Bromley on September 7; the order consisted of 100 assemblies. After testing them Bromley filled out the form listing 96 pieces under 8 fixtures (with a rate of 1.28), 4 pieces under 4 fixtures[19] (with a rate of 1.82), and 58 leakers (with a rate of 3.22) that had to be returned to be repaired. Respondent alleges that Bromley was therefore taking credit for 158 assemblies on an order of 100. What he was supposed to do was to take credit for 42 (rather than 100) assemblies under the proper number of fixtures and then list 58 leakers. Bromley testified that when he commenced employment as a leak tester, a man, who could not speak English, and did not know how to properly fill out the timesheets, instructed him on the job for a half day and he started filling out these sheets "through common sense." He also testified that because he lost time (downtime) on these machines due to minor problems with them, Thompson told him to fill out the timesheets that way rather than taking downtime (which is charged against the department).

The other aspect of Bromley's alleged cheating was his listing of the number of fixtures available. Bromley testified that some of the available fixtures were always inoperable, and the number available generally ranged from 7 to 10 (out of 14 or 15) and his reports confirm this. The most common problem was that the threads on the fixtures were worn out, making the fixture inoperable because he had little success in finding replacement parts for the fixtures. Bromley denies listing fewer fixtures on his report than were actually available.

George Strich, who is employed by Respondent as an industrial engineer, testified that he was asked by Thompson and Rodenhizer to study Bromley's operation as a leak tester; they said that they felt there were discrepancies and they asked him to determine what they were. In this regard, using Bromley's reports for the week beginning September 13, he determined that if Bromley had applied the "proper rates against the proper quantities" he would have earned $385 rather than the $496 he reported for the week. He found that this was caused by Bromley taking double credit for leaders (which was not proper) and his understating the number of fixtures available. In this regard, he checked the original orders against the forms Bromley filled out and determined that he was taking credit for more assemblies than were in the order; he did this by listing the leakers twice. Regarding the number of fixtures available, Strich testified that "on the average they should all be available," but "at the very most there might be times when you might have one, or perhaps two fixtures out of action."[20] When he visited the leak test station on one occasion in September, 15 fixtures were available on one line, and 11 or 12 on the other. He testified: "I doubt very much it would go down to eight because it would not be practical to run them at that quantity . . . without getting it repaired . . . because of the excessive cost involved": the rate is about 40 percent higher than when 14 fixtures were available. He also testified that when he prepared the rates for the leak tester position in 1978 he prepared an explanation of the operation of these rates. However, at the time in question, both Thompson and Bromley told him that they never received this explanation.

[18] This allegation was an unpleasant and difficult one at the hearing (and correspondingly difficult at this stage) because, at the time of the events in question, and to a lesser degree at the time of the hearing here, Bromley was experiencing some psychological difficulties for which he had been hospitalized and was receiving medical care. The issue therefore arises whether his supervisors were exercising their normal supervisory prerogatives in motivating him to greater production, or were "nagging" him more than necessary, knowing that his precarious psychological state would cause him to overreact.

[19] These four pieces were correctly listed under 4 fixtures because with 8 fixtures available, the first 96 assemblies were tested on these fixtures on 12 shifts. As only four remained, the tester can take credit for four fixtures.

Thompson testified when Bromley began working in his department about January 18, he received approximately a week's training by the previous operator, Ginetti, who had worked as the leak tester for 4 years; the training included instructions on filling out the timesheet forms, and during this period he personally observed Ginetti and Bromley with timesheets many times (50 to 150 times during that week "whenever I would pass through that area.") However, received into evidence were payroll records maintained by Respondent, which establish that Ginetti transferred to another department on January 4, and was employed there for at least the following 6 weeks.

The usual procedure is that the operator fills out the forms on a daily basis; they then come to Thompson's desk and he checks them only for "obvious errors." Thompson regularly receives from Respondent's payroll department computer printouts listing employees' total weekly wages. He testified that in about September, he noticed on these reports "that on a particular day his earnings were above normal; what he had normally been earning" and, on that basis, he requested Strich to determine if Thompson was properly applying the rates. On cross-examination, Thompson testified: "I don't know what triggered my auditing or whether or not I just decided to audit it." (Strich testified that the fact that an employee was earning 200 percent would "not in itself" be particularly suspicious.) Strich later told him that Bromley had properly applied the rates, but a few days to a week later Strich told him that he did not feel that an operator could earn as much as Bromley was earning if the rates that he established were properly applied; that a competent operator could earn 160 or 170 percent; but Bromley's earnings were in the area of 200 percent. Thompson testified that because Bromley was an excellent worker whom he had known for a long time ("I trusted Tony"), and because of the complexity of the rates ("the rates are confusing to me"), Thompson determined that Bromley's errors were due to confusion, rather than cheating and he informed Strich of this. A short time later (in late August or the first week in September), Thompson told Bromley that Strich felt that he was misapplying the rates; but that he did not agree and felt that it was caused by confusion; he was also unsure of how they operated and he requested that Bromley be reinstructed on the rates. Thompson then informed Rodenhizer of the situation and he (Rodenhizer) said that he would like to discuss it further with Strich. Shortly thereafter Thompson and Rodenhizer met with Strich and determined from an analysis of Bromley's production reports from January that the misapplication of rates could not have been an error, rather it was done purposely. He testified that this determination was based on the fact that Bromley's timesheets for the first 3 or 4 months in 1982 were properly filled out, after that there was a steady, but definite, increase in the misapplication of rates until it reached a certain high point and leveled off. Thompson then called Bromley into the office (this was on September 27, the day Bromley sustained his back injury) and told him that whereas he had originally attributed his errors on the reports to confusion on his part, a review of these sheets convinced him that, rather, it was a deliberate cheating and misapplication of time. Bromley did not respond; later that same day Thompson was informed that Bromley was injured. When Bromley returned to Respondent's employ on November 4, he was given the written warning.

In order to support its position that Bromley purposely misapplied the rates and time on the daily production reports, Respondent moved into evidence a number of these reports filled out by Bromley in January and September, presumably, to illustrate that he knew how to properly fill them out in January, and deliberately misapplied them in September. Because those exhibits do not establish the number of assemblies to be tested in these orders, it is not helpful in that regard. However, the exhibits do establish that Bromley's entries for operable fixtures in January averaged 10.04 out of 14 fixtures. In his September entries, the average was 7.89.[21]

On November 4, Bromley was called into Thompson's office; present were Thompson, himself, and his union steward, Billy Ryan. Thompson gave him the warning (the first he had received from Respondent), which stated:

> Based upon the summary relating to the misuse of standards report issued September 27, 1982 [Strich's report], covering misapplying time, incorrect standards, incorrect quantities, and excessive use of standards, I am requesting the appropriate disciplinary action be taken up to and including discharge.

[20] Received in evidence were three daily production reports filled out by Bob Keegan in April and May and one filled out by Joseph Ginetti on September 29. These reports list one occasion where 10 fixtures were operating, 10 with 9 operable fixtures, 1 with 8, and 2 with 7.

[21] I understand that this is not, in itself, conclusive as the condition of the fixtures may have worsened since January.

Thompson told him "you don't work in my department anymore." Ryan walked out with him and told him to return to his job and he would contact Porco. Shortly thereafter, Porco approached him and said: "stay here and work . . . Thompson don't know what he's talking about." Later that day he was called to a meeting in the personnel office; also present were Thompson, Rodenhizer, Martin, Porco, and Ryan. Martin asked him what he had to say about the warning and Bromley said he did what Thompson told him to do. Martin told him that he was fired. Bromley was called to another meeting in the personnel office about November 12; Kuba, Porco, Rodenhizer, Ridolfi, and Martin were also present. At this meeting Ridolfi asked Bromley if he still wanted to be employed by Respondent and he said that he did but felt that he did not want to return to department 145 because he felt that Thompson was out to get him. Ridolfi told him that he would treat him as layoff and allow him to return in another department and bump anybody with less seniority. Bromley was given a choice of two other positions and he chose the position of electrolytic cutter in department 191.

Rodenhizer testified that sometime during the summer Thompson spoke to him of a misapplication of time by Bromley; on the basis of this, they decided to have Strich do an indepth review of the job. Strich's report concluded that because Bromley had initially properly filled out his daily reports, his later reports clearly showed a change and misapplication of rates. On learning this, Rodenhizer recommended that Bromley be given a written warning for this offense. He testified that this warning had no connection to any union activities on Bromley's part and, in fact, at the time he had no knowledge that Bromley was engaged in any union activities.

Martin testified that he also reviewed Bromley's daily reports from January through September against Respondent's order forms and determined that during the latter portion of this period Bromley was taking double credit for leakers; that is why Bromley was given the October 21 warning; at the time, he was not aware that Bromley was involved in any intraunion activity. At the meeting with Bromley on November 4, Bromley denied understating the number of available fixtures, but after being shown certain documents, Bromley admitted taking double credit for leakers, and he was suspended pending a final review of the situation. At the November 12 meeting, attended by Ridolfi himself, Kuba, Porco, and Bromley, Bromley admitted that he had misapplied his time, but said that it was unintentional. Bromley was asked if he wished to return to work and he said that he did, but not as a leak tester. Ridolfi decided that because this was Bromley's first offense in 6 years of employment, it would be treated as layoff rather than a discharge. Bromley and Porco then met with Martin at which time Bromley decided to bump an employee in department 191. Both Ridolfi and Martin testified that the meetings of November 4 and 12 were the only occasions when he discussed Bromley's discharge or suspension with the Union and that, at the time, they were not aware that Bromley was involved in an intraunion election campaign.

Frank Stramski Jr., who was also employed in department 145, was discharged in March 1982 for his fifth offense of falsification of time. Roman Bielawa and F. Bouchard were each issued warnings by Respondent in October for filling in their timesheets incorrectly by putting down a rate seven times what they should have received credit for; neither one was suspended.

The remaining allegation regarding Bromley is that after he transferred to department 191, his supervisors, Robert Powers and Edward Stott, harassed him to such a degree that he quit, and he therefore was discharged constructively, due to his presence on the Ferreira slate of candidates. About late January 1983, Bromley went on medical leave; he did not return to Respondent's employ until a year later. During this period he was treated for depression. The General Counsel alleges that Bromley's departure in January 1983 was a result of two written warnings given him on January 7, 1983, and other harassment, which was intended to force him to quit. One of these warnings requested disciplinary action including time off or discharge because 3000 pieces of a part he produced contained a 77-percent rejection rate, costing almost $300. The other warning stated:

> On December 17, 1982, I instructed you to run the Pines Cutoff machines. I also told you that everyday you should check and do whatever orders that were at the machines. On December 23, 1982, you did not operate this machine.
> On January 3, 1983, in the presence of Mr. E. Stott, Mr. J. Soltis [second-shift union steward] I asked you why you did not operate the Pines Cutoff machine on December 23, 1982. You did not have any explanation.
> I am recommending appropriate disciplinary action.

Bromley testified that on transferring to department 191 he was given 1 week's training on the operation of the electrolytic cutter. On his second night of employment in the department, Stott (who did not testify) told him that he cut the wrong tubes the previous evening. They got into an argument about it; people gathered around and Stott told Powers (who did not testify) to take Bromley to the personnel office because he was fired. Bromley told him that he had never previously operated the machine and that Stott had set it up for him, so that if there was a mistake, it was due to Stott. (Apparently, he was not brought to the personnel office that day.) He also testified that over the next 2 months Stott told him on about 10 occasions that he was going to fire him; on 2 or 3 occasions, he informed Bromley that he was making too many errors and he told him "all the time" that he was not producing enough. Bromley also testified that while he was employed in department 191 there were some large orders that required that both he and the day person work on the electrolytic cutter; the orders showed that he had produced more than the day person.

About December, Bromley met Porco in the aisle at the plant and told him that he wanted to file a grievance against Stott and Powers because they were harassing him. Porco told Bromley that if his brother-in-law (Ferreira) had any compassion for him he would tell him to resign as trustee, and he should go to Kuba's office and resign as trustee because "I've seen people with those problems like you . . . go crazy." On January 5, 1983, Stott and Powers brought Bromley to Martin's office saying that Bromley said that he wished to be taken off the job because their harassment of him was affecting his health; Bromley denied having made such a request.

Of the two warnings issued to him on January 7, 1983, regarding the alleged 77-percent rejection rate warning, Bromley testified that he and the day person jointly produced the order containing 40,000 pieces, and their production was mixed in the same basket, so Stott and Powers had no way of knowing that he produced the rejected pieces. Additionally, once that machine is set up at the desired setting, it runs automatically until it runs out of stock or is turned off; therefore, either all or none of the production should have been accepted or rejected. Regarding the warning for not operating the Pine Cutoff machine on December 23, the General Counsel produced Respondent's time pass stating that on December 23 Bromley left the plant at 8 p.m. (rather than the shift end) due to "personal illness." On January 7, after receiving these warnings, Bromley left work early at 7 p.m., after going to the nurse's office, because "it was starting to get to me." About a week or two later Bromley went to Martin's office and told him that he wanted to quit; he said that until his nomination for trustee he never had any problems in his employment at Respondent. Porco then came by and told Bromley that he should resign as trustee; Porco got a witness and Bromley filled out a form stating that he was resigning as trustee; Porco told him to go and get the help that he needed and he left the plant and did not return until a year later. During this period he was placed on medical leave status by Respondent. Whether he or his wife called Respondent after January 1983 saying that he was sick, Bromley testified that he could have, but he did not remember.[22] After leaving Respondent's employ in January 1983 he was under psychiatric care for depression anxiety. During the period that he was out, Martin called him "quite a few times" and told him that he should call him a few weeks before he was ready to return to work; during this period he was "afraid" to return to work" because of the harassment that they gave me," "they" being Stott and Powers; in his numerous conversations with Martin after he left, he never asked to return to employment in a different department.

Martin testified that he was present at the January 7, 1983 meeting with Bromley, Stott, Powers, and Porco to discuss the two warnings to Bromley of that date; Bromley said that Stott and Powers were harassing him. Martin asked Bromley if the supervisors had the right to direct employees' work and he said that they did. Martin asked him what he meant by harassment, and Bromley said that they were constantly telling him what to do and when to do it. Martin asked, "didn't he previously say that a supervisor has the right to do that," and Bromley said, "Yes." Martin asked: "Well, is the supervisor harassing you?" and Bromley said, "No, I guess he's not." Martin testified further that about 2 weeks after this January 7, 1983 meeting, he received a telephone call from Bromley stating that he was seeing a doctor and would not return to work while he was under a doctor's care. After that Martin periodically called Bromley, asked how he was feeling; and asked if he could give him an idea of when he would return to work; Bromley's reaction was that he was still under a doctor's care and could not give him a firm date.

F. Alleged Favoritisim Toward Kuba Slate

This allegation involves the following rule that was posted by Respondent on November 12:

> The company is aware there may be a possible Union election within 145. It is the position and policy of the Company not to endorse any union campaign during working hours.

There are two violations alleged in this regard: that Respondent promulgated this rule to discourage employees from campaigning for union office and that Respondent disparately enforced this rule and other unwritten rules by permitting employees to campaign for the Kuba slate while preventing employees from campaigning for the Ferreira slate.

On November 3, the morning after the Union's nominations, Nash (Ferreira's foreman) approached Ferreira at his work station and told him that he was not allowed to talk to anyone or to leave his machine and area. Ferreira asked why and Nash said: "I'm telling you, I don't want you talking to anybody or leaving your machine and area" and he walked away and returned to his office. A few minutes later he came out of his office, approached Ferreira, and asked: "Did I make myself understood? I don't want you talking to anybody." Ferreira asked Nash why he did not say anything to Germano or Joe Marinko who were speaking to a large number of employees in the aisles. Nash said: "In other words, you are not going to do what I am telling you?" Ferreira said that was not what he was saying; he was just saying that he should tell Germano and Marinko the same thing. Nash said that would be too conspicious and that he would get his boss. Ferreira observed Nash go into his office and saw through the glass that he was on the phone. A few minutes later, Leo Perry, the general foreman, Neil Priestly, the plant superintendent, and Rodenhizer all congregated in Nash's office, although nothing further was said to Ferreira at the time.

Later that day Zajac was checking his work in the same area as Ferreira, and started to talk to him; Ferreira observed Nash watching from his office, and he quickly came out of his office and told Zajac not to talk to Ferreira. Later that week, during Ferreira's coffeebreak, fellow employee Al Minchik came over to him to congratulate him on the nomination. Nash immediately came out of his office and asked Minchik: "Don't you have anything better to do?" Minchik walked away. Shortly thereafter a fellow employee named Heddy approached

[22] Bromley's testimony regarding the post-January 7, 1983 events and exactly when he left Respondent's employ is somewhat vague. He testified that during this period he was under medication—Elavil and Valium.

Ferreira at his machine to speak to him. About a minute later, Nash came over and told her not to talk to Ferreira at his machine, but before he could say anything, Nash sent him away. In addition, whenever Ferreira went to the bathroom, Nash followed him.

Ferreira testified that prior to November 3, the practice in the plant was that fellow employees could speak for a minute or two at the work stations without restriction by the foreman. Zajac testified that prior to November 3, the policy was: "As long as you're not there for an excessive time, nobody ever says anything." After November 3, nobody could get close to Ferreira's machine to speak to him: "Mr. Nash would constantly come out and chase the people away." Nash also warned other employees about conversing with their fellow employees, but not with the same frequency as Ferreira, who usually had more visitors. On November 4, Zajac asked Nash why he only interrupted Ferreira's conversations with his fellow employees; after that, Nash began to interrupt other employees' conversations as well. About November 3, McDonald went to speak to Ferreira at his work station about the upcoming election; as soon as he got there, Nash came out of his office and told him to leave. McDonald testified that as long as he had been employed by Respondent (almost 6 years) the policy had been that you can speak to fellow employees as long as you keep the conversation brief. On November 3, about 3:15 Keegan (who was then employed on the second shift) stopped to talk to Ferreira at his work station, as was his custom when he arrived for work; he asked Ferreira about the prior evenings' nominations. After about 3 to 5 minutes, Nash approached and told Keegan that he did not want him talking to Ferreira. Keegan asked why, since everybody stops and talks, and Nash said, "I don't care, you heard what I said." Keegan testified that as long as he had been employed by Respondent (13 years) employees were allowed to converse for a few minutes.

Approximately a week prior to the union election (January 28, 1983), while Ferreira was at his machine, he observed Porco handing Germano some T-shirts that were blue with yellow print, stating on the front: "Progress Not Promises" and on the back it said "Vote for the Kuba team." Later he observed Germano, Joe Atkins, and union trustee and steward Lupo handing these shirts to employees in the plant.

On November 3, while Judy Tumbleston was working, Mike Varonka, her steward, asked her to sign a petition stating that attendance at 50 percent of the union meetings was a prerequisite to running for union office. She refused to sign it, but Varonka spent a half hour asking everybody in the department to sign it. She is not aware of whether her foreman witnessed this. One afternoon in late January 1983, Coverson observed union steward Steve Bryant walk past the glass-enclosed portion of her foreman Bob Waters' office, carrying the Kuba slate T-shirts referred to, supra. Waters was present in his office at the time. Bryant was walking through the department, passing them out, and throwing them to employees, saying: "Be sure to vote the right way." Waters' desk faces the department, but she testified that she could not specifically say that he observed Bryant's actions.

One morning in mid-January 1983, shortly prior to 7 a.m., Lucas observed Porco and his son-in-law and union steward John Blake walking into departments 125 and 126 carrying a carton of the previously referred to T-shirts and Kuba campaign buttons; Porco was also wearing a Kuba jacket. They started handing out the shirts, and continued after the 7 a.m. buzzer went off and handed them out until 7:15; the foreman of the departments, William Muldowny, was present at the time. About 7:30 a.m., Lucas observed Iodice distributing the Kuba T-shirts in department 145, in the presence of Nash and Thompson. About 8:30 that same morning, Iodice drove his tow motor into Lucas' department (receiving) and distributed the T-shirts to the employees in the department in the presence of the Foreman Fred DeLibro who was watching but said nothing. About an hour later, while Lucas was in department 191, he observed Iodice distributing the T-shirts in that department.

About mid-January, about 11 a.m., Zajac observed Germano distributing Kuba campaign buttons to employees in department 145. At the time, Nash was in his office, and Germano was about 25 feet from the office, but he does not know whether Nash observed the incident.

In mid-January 1983, employee Eldwyn Worster observed Porco walk into department 145 about 10:30 a.m. carrying Kuba campaign T-shirts and distributing them to employees in the department. Worster asked Porco for a shirt and Porco said: "If you want one we'll get you one." Nash observed this and laughed, saying: "You guys are something else" and walked into his office without attempting to hinder Porco's distribution. In January 1983, McDonald observed Germano handing out the campaign T-shirts to employees in the aisle between departments 145 and 173. Germano asked McDonald if he wanted one and McDonald refused, saying he would not campaign for either side. About a week prior to the election about 7:10 a.m., Keegan observed Porco carrying a carton of Kuba campaign shirts, and observed him giving them to Germano. He also gave some of these shirts to Iodice who drove by on his tow motor. Porco remained for a few more minutes before he left the department. Keegan observed Thompson, Nash, and Foreman Tony Farrar in the window office at the time, although Keegan could not tell whether they were observing Porco and Germano. Keegan later asked Ridolfi why Porco was allowed to distribute T-shirts in the plant; Ridolfi said that there was nothing he could do about what employees have written on the shirts they are wearing; but that they would check into whether they are being distributed during working hours. Later, Ridolfi told Keegan that he had spoken to Porco about it, and Porco said that it was not being done during working hours, but that he would watch the situation.

Ridolfi testified that about early November, Nash complained to him that he was having a difficult time controlling his department because of the upcoming union election. He said that he was having trouble with the incumbents and stewards, and he was also disturbed by the large number of employees coming to talk to Ferreira at his work station. Nash described the department as a "hot bed of activity on both sides." A few days later, Ferreira complained to him about the incumbents circulating the petition regarding the requirements that people running for office attend a certain percentage of the union meetings; this complaint was "part of the cause" of the November 12 notice.

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

Respondent alleges that the Board should defer to the arbitration process the discharges of Ferreira and Grodis. It is undisputed that both Grodis and Ferreira had filed grievances regarding their discharges and both these grievances were pending arbitration hearings when they were withdrawn by Grodis and Ferreira. The General Counsel alleges that while similar cases might normally be subject to deferral under recent Board law, this case is distinguishable because of the lack of "substantial harmony" between the interests of the Union and that of Grodis and Ferreira.

In United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), the Board decided to overrule General American Transportation, 228 NLRB 808 (1977), and return to the doctrine of deferral as set forth in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971). Although I might ordinarily agree with counsel for Respondent's argument, the General Counsel's argument that deferral is not appropriate due to the circumstances here is persuasive. Ferreira organized and headed the slate opposing the reelection of the incumbent union officials and Grodis was nominated for vice president. Apparently the campaign was a rough one; within a day or two of the nominations, the incumbents were circulating a petition throughout the plant seeking to establish a requirement that candidates attend a majority of the Union's meetings; this would have made ineligible some of the candidates on Ferreira's slate. In addition, when Bromley was going through a difficult time in late January 1983, Porco convinced him to resign as trustee, in what was clearly not a humanitarian gesture. Finally, when Lucas asked union steward Lupo how he could fight the warning he received, Lupo told him that he would "wipe his ass" with it. Although there was also evidence that Porco and other union representatives assisted Ferreira, Grodis, and the others involved here in their meetings with representatives of Respondent, there is substantial evidence that Ferreira and Grodis had valid reasons for feeling that their representation by the Union in the upcoming arbitrations might be lacking in sincerity.

In United Technologies, supra, the Board cites with approval the dissent in General American Transportation, supra, which stated that the Board "has refused to defer where the interests of the union which might be expected to represent the employee filing the unfair labor practice charge are adverse to those of the employee." National Radio Co., 198 NLRB 527 (1972), cited by the Board with approval in United Technologies, involved discipline of an active union adherent, who had been president of the union for 5 years and had handled grievances and contract negotiations for the union. The Board, in deciding to defer to the arbitral process, stated:

> We may assume that the Union will be aware of its institutional interests in protecting its officer and leading proponent against discipline which is thought to restrict his activities on the Union's behalf. In that respect, especially, it must be noted that the interests of the employee and his representative are in substantial harmony in this case and are likely to be so in every such case. It is sufficient to note here that in protecting O'Connell, the Union protects itself as well.

Because of the campaign undertaken by Ferreira and Grodis, no such assumption can be made here. Although it cannot be stated with certainty that the union leadership would inadequately represent them at an arbitration proceeding, there is sufficient evidence of animus by the union leadership to Ferreira and the other members of his slate, so that they should not be relegated "to an arbitral process authored, administered, and invoked entirely by parties hostile to their interests." Kansas Meat Packers, 198 NLRB 543, 544 (1972).

On the basis of the record testimony, I find that Respondent favored the Kuba slate over the Ferreira slate in the union election. The uncontradicted credible evidence establishes that beginning the day after the union nominations, Respondent restricted, or completely eliminated, the employees' ability to communicate with Ferreira at work; whenever an employee approached him after that date, Nash was out of his office to warn the employees not to talk to him. This represented a change from Respondent's prior policy of allowing employees to talk for a few minutes as long as production was not adversely affected. The timing of this change (the day following the union nominations) leaves little doubt regarding its cause. At the same time, however, Respondent was allowing the Kuba slate what appeared to be almost free reign in distributing its T-shirts and campaign buttons throughout the plant, on both working and nonworking hours. A clear demonstration of this favortism is Worster's testimony that while Nash was observing Porco distributing T-shirts during working hours, he (Nash) laughed and said, "You guys are something else." This is the same foreman who immediately came out of his office every time an employee stopped to talk to Ferreira. All this testimony was credible and uncontradicted and establishes that Respondent disparately enforced its November 12 rule by permitting the Kuba slate to campaign during working hours while denying that right to the Ferreira slate, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[23] However, I find insufficient evidence to support the General Counsel's other allegation in this regard, that Respondent promulgated this rule to discourage campaigning, and this allegation will therefore be dismissed.

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), the Board set forth the rule to be applied in determining whether certain actions are in violation of Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act: "First we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." This burden was approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[23] As should be obvious, this finding does not mean that employers violate the Act when they restrict intraunion campaigning during the working hours. Rather, the violation results from allowing one side to campaign freely while denying that right to the other side.

The General Counsel has clearly made the required prima facie showing regarding the discharges of Ferreira and Grodis. I have previously found that Respondent's action established that it favored the incumbent slate over the insurgent slate headed by Ferreira. Regarding knowledge of Grodis and Ferreira's union activities, Grodis asked Caldwell for his opinion of opposing the Kuba slate and later informed Priestly and Sherwood of his intention to do so; although neither expressed any hostility to him at the time, it establishes that they were aware of his actions although Ferreira was more secretive about the members of his slate, Respondent's knowledge of his participation in this slate is established by Nash's comment, interrupting Ferreira's discussion with Zajac, that he did not want Ferreira discussing union business and that he was not going to fight two unions. This indicates that Nash was aware of the insurgent slate and Ferreira's position on it.[24] And finally, Ferreira and Grodis, who were both excellent employees, were discharged without any prior warnings compared with other employees who had received numerous warnings before being discharged; Ferreira had previously received one verbal warning years before for poor attendance, and Grodis had never previously received any warnings or discipline; in fact, 2 weeks prior to his discharge he was promoted to a leadman's position.

Next for analysis is whether Respondent satisfied its burden. Respondent posted two notices, one in 1981 and one on August 20, 1982, prohibiting gambling. However, the uncontradicted and credible testimony establishes that the 1981 notice and (to a lesser extent) the August 1982 notice were consistently violated and were only enforced against Ferreira and Grodis). Gambling and commercial activities were widespread throughout the plant and yet nobody was ever discharged or disciplined for this prior to Grodis and Ferreira. The degree of the gambling activities was so widespread that I do not credit the testimony of Respondent's witnesses that they were unaware of these activities; it is difficult to believe that Martin, who appeared to be an attentive and diligent personnel manager who walked through the plant regularly (six times a day on the average) did not observe Iodice selling numbers or Raganese (whose desk he generally must walk past in entering the plant) selling dolls and other items from her desk. Also relevant is the gravity of the activity involved; Iodice was selling numbers while operating his tow motor; he was stopping employees during their worktime and blocking the aisles with the tow motor, while there is no evidence that Ferreira and Grodis' activities interfered in any way with production.

Finally, Respondent's testimony of the events leading to the discharges does not ring true: the anonymous note informed them of the activities of Ferreira and Grodis (and nothing else); additionally, the investigation appears to have been fabricated to cover up the discriminatory purpose of the discharges. It is interesting to note Martin's answer to Washington who, while being questioned by Martin regarding his involvement in purchasing lottery tickets from Ferreira and Grodis, mentioned all the other "illegal stuff" like numbers and pools that was occurring at the plant; Martin answered: "that's not the issue right now." I have limited my discussion of these discharges somewhat because the evidence establishes that they were obviously pretextual. As Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov stated in Igloo Corp., 254 NLRB 641, 647 (1981):

> On the basis of the foregoing, I find that the reasons advanced by Respondent for the discharges of Kuebler and Aguilar are so unpersuasive, unreasonable, and unnatural, and are so far removed from any semblance of justifiability in terms of past practice, as to mandate the conclusion that the assigned reasons for the discharges are pretextual.

I therefore find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Ferreira and Grodis on October 1.

When the Wright Line test is applied to McClain's layoff, it is also clear that the General Counsel has sustained his initial burden. He had been employed in department 145 for 3 years and was informed of the layoff on the day following his nomination as trustee on the Ferreira slate. As I have found that Respondent favored the Kuba slate that, alone, would be enough to satisfy the initial burden. There is also the testimony of Johnson that Thompson told her that he had finally gotten rid of McClain, whom he referred to as a troublemaker. Thompson denies this, testifying that he told Johnson that McClain was laid off, that he was giving him problems in that he was often arguing with others in the department, and his transfer might make him appreciate the job and the earnings of department 145. I generally found Johnson to be an unconvincing witness and I would credit her testimony over that of Thompson, and I would therefore find that Thompson made the statement to Johnson.

Regarding Respondent's burden, they allege that numerous employees were laid off from department 145 prior to McClain due to a drop in production in the department. What was not satisfactorily explained was why McClain was laid off ahead of Neely. McClain had 3 years higher seniority than Neely. At the time of the layoff, Neely was the only departmental employee on the night shift. Martin testified that in November he offered McClain Neely's night-shift job, but he refused it. McClain and Thompson testified that McClain was not offered this position in November; rather it was in September or October 1983 when he was again laid off from department 145 that he was offered Neely's night-shift position, which, at that time, he refused because he had another job. Respondent never satisfactorily explained why it did not offer McClain Neely's night-shift position in November, as is apparently required by the contract's provision that seniority is by department. Respondent defends its action on the ground that Neely's job classification was set up, operate, and instruct, while McClain was only set up and operate. As Neely was the only employee on the shift, there was nobody to instruct; and even it it is true that the classification "instruct" also means that the employee is capable of operating every machine in the heat treat area, I would credit McClain over Martin and Thompson and find that he was able to do so. I therefore find that Respondent has not satisfied its burden under Wright Line, and its layoff of McClain (and subsequent transfer) therefore violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

[24] Additionally, I do not credit Martin's testimony that he did not learn of Ferreira's candidacy until mid- or late-November. His frequent trips through the plant and contacts with the department foreman make this extremely unlikely. He certainly was aware of it at the end of October, on receiving the charge from the Board.

Regarding the warnings given to McClain, Lucas, and McDonald, the General Counsel has again sustained his initial burden; Lucas nominated Grodis for the vice president's position on the Ferreira slate at the Union's nominations on November 2 and McClain was a candidate for trustee on the Ferreira slate. McDonald's union activities were more limited: on November 3 Germano asked him whom he intended to vote for; when he answered that he wanted to hear the issues before he decided, Germano shouted, "In other words, you are going to vote for them." Although McDonald's activities were extremely limited and would clearly not be adequate to sustain a violation alone, McClain and Lucas engaged in such activities and, if Respondent wished to penalize them for these activities, it would have to include McDonald in this penalty as he was between Lucas and McClain in the production process. Finally, the timing of the "discovery" supports the General Counsel's case; although the error was made in June, it was not discovered until a few days after the nominations.

I find that Respondent has not sustained its burden of establishing that Lucas, McDonald, and McClain would have been reprimanded even absent their activities. Clearly a mistake was made in the type of metal used in an order, but Lucas, McDonald, and McClain testified credibly that they were not familiar with the term Chrome-molly although they know what carbon steel is. Interestingly, throughout his testimony, Thompson generally referred to this metal as carbon steel. Even if these employees were expected to look at the second page of the order where the word "Chrome-molly" appears, they would not have been able to identify the substance. In addition, if a mistake were made in not checking and properly identifying the material to be used, the mistake was by Lucas or Otero who picked the material; even that it is not clear, however, as the work order indicates that Lucas obtained the material from the correct bin. McDonald and McClain were justified in assuming that the material they received was the proper material. Most importantly, Respondent has not established that the improper tubes discovered in November were produced in order 2BY82928. Thompson's testimony in that regard is not supported by documentary evidence (the unexplained inventory activity sheet) or reasonable inferences. For example, the incomplete inventory activity sheet in evidence states that on June 4, the stockroom received 148 ABX142E tubes; between that date and the time that order 2BY82928 was produced, 113 of these tubes were issued by the stockroom for orders, leaving 35 tubes from that order, and whatever may have remained from other prior orders. As I credit McDonald's testimony that there is no way of determining from which order specific tubes were produced, I therefore find that Respondent had no way of knowing that the defective tubes were manufactured in order 2BY82928. Regardless of who was at fault, I find that Respondent seized on these defective tubes as a means of justifying its warnings to Lucas, McDonald, and McClain. In this regard, the inventory activity sheet in evidence establishes that for the first 6 months of 1982, the stockroom issued 501 ABX142E tubes in 24 transactions. With such a fairly active turnover, it is reasonable to assume that a defect would have been discovered earlier than 3 months after the parts entered the stockroom. As Respondent has not sustained its burden. I find that its warnings to Lucas, McDonald, and McClain, and the brief suspensions of McDonald and McClain violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The General Counsel has also sustained his initial burden regarding Bromley's discharge, which was later changed to a layoff and transfer. The timing is again important; Bromley informed Thompson of his intention of running for trustee on Ferreira's slate in August; shortly thereafter Bromley's daily production reports were being investigated by Strich, at the request of Thompson and Rodenhizer. Thompson testified he did not know what prompted this investigation; he also testified that on a particular day Bromley's earnings were above normal and on that basis he asked Strich to investigate Bromley's reports. Strich testified that the fact that Bromley was earning 200 percent would not alone be particularly suspicious. In this regard, it should be noted that Bromley had, at that time, been employed by Respondent for 5 years and during the period he had an unblemished work record. With such an excellent employee whom he had known for a long time, it would seem that Thompson would remember what event caused him to investigate whether Bromley was dishonestly preparing his daily reports. Thompson's imprecise testimony in this regard supports the General Counsel's theory that it was Bromley's position on the Ferreira slate that caused Bromley to be investigated and later laid off and suspended.

I would also find that Respondent has not sustained its burden of establsishing that Bromley would have been disciplined as he was, absent his union activities. Principal among my reasons was the uncertain testimony of Thompson about what triggered the investigation, and Strich's conflicting testimony in this regard. Also, prior to this, Bromley had been a perfect employee for 5 years; he was immediately discharged (later changed to a layoff and transfer) for this offense; yet Stramski (also employed in department 145) was not discharged until his fifth offense of falsification of time, earlier that year. In addition, two other employees were only given warnings in October for taking credit for a rate seven times what the proper rate should have been. Finally, it is clear from the record that Bromley did take double credit leakers; however, his uncontradicted testimony is that Thompson told him to do so rather than taking downtime for defective equipment. Additionally, Thompson's testimony that Ginetti spent a full week explaining the job and rates to Bromley is contradicted by the evidence that Ginetti transferred from the department prior to that; rather I credit Bromley's testimony that his training for the job was minimal. I therefore find that by discharging Bromley on November 4, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

There are two elements necessary to establish a constructive discharge:

"First, the burdens imposed on the employees must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in his working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force him to resign. Second, it must be shown that those burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities." Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1976); K & S Circuits, 255 NLRB 1270 (1981). Montgomery Ward & Co., 160 NLRB 1729, 1742 (1966), stated: "An employer 'constructively' discharges an employee in violation of the Act where, for discriminatory reasons, he makes the employee's conditions of work so intolerable or undersirable that he is thereby forced to quit his job." In Bechtel Corp., 200 NLRB 975 fn. 2 (1972), the Board stated that they have found constructive discharge situations where an employer had made "conditions for an employee so intolerable that no reasonable person could be expected to remain in employment" (emphasis supplied). See also Hit 'N Run Food Stores, 231 NLRB 660 (1977), and Panscape Corp., 231 NLRB 693 (1977). In Crystal Princeton Refining, supra, the Board stated that the new tasks had to be either physically or emotionally impossible for the employee to perform, to convert a quit to a constructive discharge. Van Pelt Fire Trucks, 238 NLRB 794 (1978). One reason for this rule is that parties to Board proceedings must mitigate whenever possible and "the Act provides an appropriate and direct remedy for infringement of rights protected by Section 7." Central Casket Co., 225 NLRB 362, 363 (1976). In the situation herein rather than resigning, an unfair labor practice could have been filed alleging that the "harassment" was unlawfully motivated.

I find insufficient evidence that Respondent's actions constituted a constructive discharge. In the 2-month period that he worked in department 191, Stott and Powers gave Bromley two warnings, warned him that they were going to fire him and told him that he was making too many errors and was not producing enough. Although this made it difficult for Bromley, especially considering his fragile psychological state, it did not make his working conditions so difficult, unpleasant, intolerable, or undesirable to cause a reasonable person to quit. For this reason, I find that Bromley was not constructively discharged in January 1983; I therefore find it unnecessary to determine whether Stott and Powers' actions were caused by Bromley's union activities.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by disparately enforcing the November 12, 1982 memorandum, by restricting campaigning by employees favoring candidates on the Ferreira slate, while allowing such campaigning by candidates on the Kuba slate.

4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Ferreira and Grodis on October 1, 1982.

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by its layoff of McClain from his heat treat position in department 145 on November 11, 1982.

6. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by its warnings given to McClain and McDonald, dated November 24, 1982, and its warning given to Lucas, dated December 3, 1982, and by the subsequent suspensions given to McClain and McDonald.

7. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Bromley on November 4, 1982.

8. Respondent did not violate the Act as further alleged in the consolidated complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found that Respondent discriminatorily discharged, laid off, or suspended Ferreira, Grodis, McClain, McDonald, and Bromley. Lucas received a warning but was not suspended; Grodis was never reinstated, while the others returned to Respondent's employ from a few days to 25 days after the discriminatory action. I shall order that Respondent make these individuals whole for any loss of earnings they suffered as a result of the discrimination, by payment of a sum equal to that which they otherwise have earned, absent the discrimination, with backpay and interest computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In addition, I shall recommend that any references to these discharges, layoffs, suspensions, or warnings in the files of Ferreira, Grodis, McClain, McDonald, Lucas, and Bromley, be removed from their employment records. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Grodis full and immediate reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer to McClain and Bromley the option of reinstatement to the positions they were employed in immediately prior to the discrimination against them.

June 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 28, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief, exceptions, and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally granting its employees merit increases in July 1983.[4] However, we reverse the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate the Act when it unilaterally granted wage increases to two employees in January and February 1984.

Since 1978, the Respondent's employees of more than 6 months have received wage increases on an annual basis. The Respondent granted the wage increases generally in July in amounts above or below a predetermined average percentage figure based on the employee's performance. Consequently, the wage increases varied over a wide range. The record establishes that the Respondent granted its employees wage increases in July 1983. Because newly hired employee Paul Simonson had not received a July merit increase, the Respondent granted him a wage increase in January 1984. Subsequent to a change from part-time to full-time status, the Respondent also granted employee Donald O'Sullivan a wage increase in January 1984. In February 1984 O'Sullivan was given a second increase. The Respondent's treasurer testified that the increase was given because O'Sullivan threatened to quit unless he was given more money.

The judge rejected the Respondent's argument that the July 1983 wage increases resulted from its longstanding policy of granting merit increases each July and were not a unilateral change. Citing, inter alia, NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962), for the proposition that an employer must bargain over the discretionary aspects of merit wage increases, the judge found that in granting the July 1983 increase without prior notification to the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The judge found, however, that the January and February 1984 wage increases to employees O'Sullivan and Simonson did not violate the Act. The judge held that these wage increases were given to the two employees at a time well after bargaining had ceased between the Union and the Respondent, and at least as far as O'Sullivan was concerned, merely constituted individual pay adjustments.

The General Counsel excepts to the judge's finding regarding the wage increases to O'Sullivan and Simonson, and we find merit in the exception. We find no record evidence of an impasse existing prior to the January and February 1984 wage in-

[1] The caption is corrected to spell the Respondent's name properly.

[2] In sec. I, par. 1, and thereafter, the judge incorrectly spelled Respondent The Peelle Co.'s name as "Peele."

In sec. II, par. 6 of his decision, the judge erroneously stated that the Union notified Independent Association of Steel Fabricators on June 20, 1976, rather than January 20, 1976, that it did not consent to certain members withdrawing from that multiemployer bargaining association.

In sec. II, par. 9, the judge incorrectly cited the first court of appeals decision to which he referred. The correct citation is NLRB v. Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 582 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied 439 U.S. 1130 (1979). The Second Circuit Court of appeals decision, NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, issued June 7, 1982, not June 6, 1983, and is reported at 681 F.2d 130.

In sec. III, par. 2, and thereafter, the judge incorrectly spelled William Colavito's surname as "Colovito."

In the last paragraph of sec. III, the judge stated that Israel wrote to Colavito on February 7, 1983. The correct date is February 7, 1984.

In sec. IV, par. 5, the judge set forth a chart showing wage increases the Respondent's employees received. C. Hollamby, however, received a 40-cent wage increase in July 1983, not 50 cents. G. Pagano received $1.35 in July 1981, not $1.05, and 61 cents in July 1979, not 66 cents. C. Scholl received a 60-cent increase in July 1983, not 1982; his wage change is set forth in fn. 11 of the judge's decision.

In fn. 11, the judge erroneously stated C. Scholl's personnel card indicated he earned $1985 per month as of July 1, 1980. The correct figure is $1485 per month.

In sec. V, par. 1, the judge referred in the text to a fn. 15. There is no fn. 15. [The footnotes have been renumbered.]

In sec. V, B, par. 15, the judge erroneously stated the Respondent proposed in October 1983 that any contract entered with the Union expired September 30, 1988, rather than 1987.

In the last paragraph of sec. V, B the judge omitted a reference to fn. 20 at the end of that paragraph. [Noted and corrected.]

We correct these inadvertent errors.

[3] We have modified the recommended Order to provide that the Respondent cancel any unilateral changes in wages if requested to do so by the Union. Elias Mallouk Realty Corp., 265 NLRB 1225 fn. 3 (1982).

[4] In finding that the July 1983 wage increases violated the Act, we note that this case is distinguishable from NLRB v. Patent Trader, Inc., 415 F.2d 190 (2d Cir. 1969), modified as to remedy 426 F.2d 791 (2d Cir. 1970) (en banc), in which the court refused to enforce a finding of unlawful unilateral wage increase because the union never protested the various increases as they were granted, even though the union did in fact know about them and about the company's general practice of granting wage increases on a semiannual basis. Further, the court found that negotiations were not obstructed by the grant of discretionary increases because the company merely continued its policy. In the instant case, no evidence exists that the Union was aware prior to the hearing of the Respondent's grant of the July increases or its general practice of granting wage increases on an annual basis. Accordingly, the facts establish the very danger seen in such discretionary increases outlined by the court in Patent Trader. Id. at 199–200.

creases. We further find no significant distinction between the July 1983 wage increases that the judge found were violative of the Act and the January and February 1984 wage increases that the judge found were lawful. Simonson's wage increase in January reflected the July 1983 wage increase given to all employees. Likewise, O'Sullivan's January wage increase, although resulting from a change in status, reflected the July increase as well. Further, the Respondent's explanation for the February 1984 increase to O'Sullivan is irrelevant to the issue of the Respondent's duty to bargain over a discretionary wage increase. Thus, we find no basis in fact or law for the judge's finding regarding the lawfulness of the January and February wage increases. Accordingly, we conclude that the unilateral grant of the January and February 1984 wage increases, as well as the July 1983 wage increases, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, The Peelle Co., Bay Shore, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO by unilaterally granting wage increases to employees without prior notice to and consultation with the Union."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) On request by Local No. 455, cancel the unilateral wage increases granted to bargaining unit employees."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO by unilaterally granting merit wage increases to our employees during the course of collective-bargaining negotiations, without prior notice to and consultation with the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

On request by the Union, WE WILL cancel the unilateral wage increases granted to bargaining unit employees.

THE PEELLE CO.

Beatrice Kornbluh, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Robert A. Goldstein Esq. (Kliegman, Goldstein, Israel & Cooper), of New York, New York, for the Respondent.

Belle Harper, Esq. (Sipser, Weinstock, Harper & Dorn), of New York, New York, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in Brooklyn, New York, on May 31 and June 1, 4, and 21, 1984. The charge in this proceeding was filed on July 8, 1983, and a complaint was issued on October 31, 1983. In substance, the complaint alleged that the Respondent, since at least February 8, 1983, bargained in bad faith with no intention of reaching an agreement with the Union. At the hearing the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to add an allegation that in July 1983 and January and February 1984, the Respondent granted unilateral wage increases to its employees.

Based on the entire record in this proceeding, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after reviewing the briefs of counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

It is agreed by all parties that The Peele Co. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It also is agreed that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

This case and a series of other cases[1] have a long history of litigation. Insofar as relevant, the background is described below.

For a period of time prior to 1975, Peele had maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with the Union, initially on an independent, as opposed to multiemployer, basis. (Before 1975, the Union also bargained with an employer association called the Allied Building Metal Industries Inc.) As a result, Peele and other independent companies that bargained with the Union came to have a history of executing a series of successive contracts that basically were referred to as the standard independent contract. Over a period of time there evolved a degree of difference between the standard independent contracts and the Allied contracts.

In early 1975 Peele, along with other companies that were not members of the Allied Building Metal Industries Inc. (the Allied Association), decided to form their own multiemployer association called the Independent Association of Steel Fabricators. One of the new Association's goals was to achieve parity with the contract held by the Allied Association.

Bargaining between the Union and the Independent Association commenced on June 1, 1975. No contract having been reached by June 30, 1975, the Union commenced a strike on July 1 1975. From July 1 to late August there was a hiatus in negotiations, albeit one of the Independent Association's members signed a separate contract with the Union.

In late August and through October 1975, negotiations were held between the Union and the Independent Association. However, not much progress was made. In October the spokesman of the Association advised Local 455 that another union was interested in organizing the employees involved. Subsequently, between November 1975 and January 1976, some of the employer-members of the Independent Association entered into contracts with Local 810 International Brotherhood of Teamsters, an action later held to be unlawful by the Board and the Second Circuit. 231 NLRB 264 and 582 F.2d 135.

In early January 1976, the Union and the Allied Association reached a contract settlement. On January 14 the Union offered the wage and fund package to the Independent Association on the same basis as had been agreed to with the Allied Association. However, the Independent Association, desirous of parity, offered to accept the exact same terms as had been agreed to with the Allied Association. The Union refused. On January 16, Local 455 was notified that 19 of the Independent Association's members had withdrawn from the Association. On June 20, the Union notified the Association that it did not consent to such withdrawals. It further advised that any agreement made between it and the Association's remaining members would be binding on those employers who had attempted to withdraw without the Union's consent.

On January 23, 1975, Local 455 met with three employers that had not withdrawn from the Independent Association. At this meeting the parties present reached an agreement, although the three employers stated that they were not authorized to represent the Association. Thereafter in late January, five employers signed the January 23 stipulation, albeit refusing to do so on behalf of the Independent Association.

Meanwhile the strike was continuing against the other members of the Independent Association who had not signed contracts with Local 455. The Union thereupon sent a letter to the employers who had withdrawn from the Independent Association, requesting that they implement the January 23 stipulation.[2] Two employers did execute agreements identical to the January stipulation. The others, including Peele, did not.

In light of the situation summarized above, Local 455 filed various unfair labor practice charges. Also an unfair labor practice charge was filed against the Union. All those cases were consolidated for trial and ultimately led to a series of decisions by the Board and the Second Circuit reported at 231 NLRB 264, 528 F.2d 135, 252 NLRB 922, and 110 LRRM 2995 (June 6, 1983). Insofar as relevant to the present case, certain former members of the Independent Association, including Respondent, were ordered to bargain on an individual basis (as opposed to a multiemployer basis) with Local 455. Also certain employers who had executed contracts with Local 810 were ordered to abrogate such contracts and withdraw recognition with that Union.

During the course of the strike and throughout the next 7 years, Peele operated essentially as if it were a nonunion enterprise. That is, it did not renew its contract with Local 455 and it ceased to abide by the terms and conditions of the expired contract.[3] Additionally, many new employees were hired as replacements of the strikers, albeit two of the strikers did return to work in 1976 and 1977. At the time negotiations between Peele and Local 455 were resumed in the summer of 1982, the Company employed, at its Bay Shore facility, about 13 employees. Also noted is that during the strike, the Company moved a large part of its fabricating operation to Canada leaving its Bay Shore facility primarily as a warehouse with fewer employees than had been employed before the strike.

III. THE NEGOTIATIONS

After the court's June 6 opinion, the Union on June 8, 1982, sent a letter to Peele and other companies asking to start negotiations. On July 12 the Union sent another letter requesting information including the names and addresses of employees.

[1] On various days in March, April, June, and September 1984, I heard a number of other cases in which the facts were substantially related to the instant case. These were G. Zaffino & Sons Inc., Case 29-CA-10582; Achilles Construction Co., Case 29-CA-10585; Roman Iron Works Inc., Case 29-CA-10583; and Koenig Iron Works, Case 29-CA-10586. As the cited cases were not consolidated for hearing with the present case, I shall, in due course, issue separate decisions in each of these.

[2] On the theory that their withdrawals from the Independent Association were untimely and therefore they were bound to execute any agreement made between the Union and the remaining members of the Association.

[3] For example, on expiration of that contract, Peele ceased making payments to the various trust funds as required by that contract.

On August 18, 1982, a meeting was held between William Colovito, president of Local 455, and Stanley Israel, a labor attorney representing Peele and seven other companies. (These were G. Zaffino and Sons Inc., Achilles Construction Co., Koenig Iron Works, Melto Metal Products Inc., Master Iron Craft Corp., and Mohawk Steel Fabricators Inc.)[4] At this time, Colovito presented, as the Union's proposal, certain wage increase demands plus the same Standard Independent Contract that these companies had rejected in 1975. Israel, on behalf of his clients, told Colovito that they would not agree to the standard independent contract and would each insist on negotiating contracts suitable to themselves.

On September 1, 1982, Israel forwarded to Colovito a letter setting forth information the Union had requested, plus a document purporting to be a contract offer.[5] The proposed contract has a number of interesting features, foremost being that the Union is never mentioned as being a party to the contract. Among the proposed clauses were the following:

> (1) Article 1, stated, inter alia that "The Employer reserves the right to change without notice all or any portion of these Articles after due and reasonable consideration, except where notice is specifically stated."
> (2) "An employee(s) may be dismissed where in the opinion of the Company a disharmonious relationship would result from continued employment."
> (3) Article 19 contains an employee complaint procedure which does not include or mention union representation.

The covering letter of September 1, 1982, states, inter alia:

> We also submit to you the following contractual counterproposal.
> 1. Enclosed is the basic form of Agreement we propose. To the extent, benefits as previously disclosed to you are superior, they are to be substituted for those in this document.
> 2. We also require a strong management rights clause (including control over all matters not covered in the contract), a no strike-no lockout clause, a "just cause" discharge clause, an arbitration clause (AAA).
> 3. Prior employment with the Company is not to be counted for any purpose.
> 4. Working foremen need not be members of the Union, but shall be allowed to do production work. In this regard, the three current highest paid employees shall be deemed to be working foremen.
> 5. There is to be an "open" shop.
> 6. The contract shall be of six years duration commencing October 1, 1982. Across the Board increases equal to the cost of living increase for each prior year shall be given to each then employee on the 1st day of October 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987. Classification rates shall not be affected.

At the next meeting on September 17, Mr. Colovito said that the Company's proposed contract was unacceptable and looked more like work rules than a collective-bargaining agreement. Colovito was told by Israel that the two major concerns of the Company were (1) an open-shop and (2) a long duration contract.

Unlike the negotiation involving Roman Iron Works and some of the other companies, it appears that far less time was spent between Israel and the Union. This may have been due to the somewhat outlandish initial proposals of Peele and that discussions between Israel and Colovito regarding Israel's other employer-clients were following more traditional paths. Suffice it to say that the record suggests that for whatever reason, discussions between Peele and the Union were to a great extent put on the backburner while more intensive negotiations centered on some of the other companies.

On October 5, 1982, Peele sent to the Union a copy of its pension and welfare plans. On December 12, Colovito sent Israel some revisions of the Union's initial contract proposal for all the companies, including Peele. On January 4, 1983, after having been notified by the Regional Director for Region 29 that the withholding of employee addresses was probably illegal, Peele forwarded a list of employee names and addresses to the Union.[6]

On April 8, 1983, Israel sent a letter to the Union modifying Peele's September 1 proposal as follows:

> (1) We will include a checkoff provision to conform to that contained in Section 5 of the Agreement we have proposed with respect to Achilles, Melto, Roman, Mohawk and Zaffino.
> (2) We will include the following grievance procedure clause:
>> Any dispute between the companies and the Union arising out of this agreement or as to the meaning, application, or alleged violation of any provision or provisions of this Agreement, shall upon request of either party to this Agreement, be submitted to an Arbitrator of the American Arbitration Association designated in accordance with its rules and regulations. The Arbitrator's decision shall be final and binding upon the employees involved and upon the parties to this Agreement.
> (3) We will include a provision providing for the furnishing of work shoes or a work shoes allowance, to the extent previously granted by this employer.

---

[4] Of these companies, Master, Mohawk, and Melto ultimately signed contracts with Local 455.

[5] Also forwarded was a list of employees giving their history of wage increases.

[6] Israel took the position that because of certain union misconduct during the strike, the Union was not entitled to employee addresses. It is noted that the delay in furnishing employees' addresses is not alleged as being violative of the Act, but is only offered as background evidence for the General Counsel's contention that the Company engaged in surface bargaining.

In May 1983, Colovito revised his economic demands vis-a-vis all the companies. Thereafter, by letter dated June 6, 1983, Peele revised its offer as follows:

> This letter is being submitted to you as a FINAL offer in advance of our June 7, 1983 negotiating session.
> The offer contained in our letter of September 1, 1982, as thereafter modified in our letter of April 8, 1983, is further modified in the following regards:
> (1) The term of the Agreement shall be five (5) years from October 1, 1982.
> (2) The cross-the-board wage increases shall in no event be less than 50¢ per hour in each year.
> (3) There shall be no restriction on subcontracting.
> We shall be prepared to discuss the final offer at our June 7 meeting.
> In response to your recent inquiry, the Company has been advised of a pending 17% Blue Cross premium increase.

The third meeting exclusively concerning Peele took place on June 13, 1983. At this meeting the Company offered to have the cost-of-living increases take effect in July rather than October and to use New York City cost-of-living statistics as the basis of its COLA proposal. (As noted above, the Company also proposed a 50-cent floor on its COLA proposal.) There also was a discussion of what the Company meant by part-time employees it proposed to exclude from contract coverage. Regarding this issue, the Company asserted that it basically was talking about students who worked 2 hours a day, 4 days a week.

On July 1, 1983, Local 455 and Master Iron Craft entered into a 4-year contract containing, inter alia, a provision allowing the Company the unrestricted right to subcontract.

On July 25, 1983, Colovito wrote to Israel as follows:

> It would greatly help us, and avoid unnecessary confusion in our ongoing negotiations with the above Employers, if you could supply us with a separate statement for each of the Employees, setting forth its last offer, covering all items.

On July 28, 1983, Israel's response included the following economic offer of Peele:

> Peele
> (a) Five year contract from October 1, 1982.
> (b) Across-the-board (not classification minima) cost of living increases on July 1 of each year, commencing July 1, 1983, but in no event less than 50¢ per hour.
> (c) All other existing economic items to remain as is.
> This letter is intended only as the recapitulation you requested. It is not intended to modify any prior offers or current positions and any discrepancy between the prior offers and this recapitulation is to be resolved in favor of the prior offers.
> I wish also to point out that each of the employers requires the same subcontracting clause as negotiated with Master. I mention this item specifically inasmuch as you might consider it as part of the economic package.

A meeting was scheduled for early August but Colovito could not attend and had to call it off on short notice. On August 4, Israel wrote to Colovito as follows:

> I was unable to head off Ed Peele and he was rather put out coming into New York only to find that the collective bargaining session had been cancelled at the last moment. However, and in order to move this matter along, I have been authorized to revise the Peele offer contained in our June 6th letter in the following respects:
> (1) The Company will agree to an Agency shop on terms we can discuss at our next meeting.
> (2) The Company will agree to include a contract provision providing for Union visitation rights.
> (3) The Company will grant Washington's Birthday as an additional paid holiday.
> (4) The Company will agree to notify the Union of job openings and allow the Union to recommend employees under conditions which we will set forth at the next meeting.

At a meeting on September 21 or 25, Israel said he would put together a complete contract offer. As a consequence, Israel, on behalf of Peele, forwarded a contract offer on October 10, 1983. This proposed contract, which is based, to some degree, on the contract proposal made in September 1982, eliminates many of the more absurd aspects of the earlier offer. Thus this contract contains the following provisions:

> (1) A job referral clause wherein the employer agrees to give the Union 48 hours to furnish new employees from its hiring hall.
> (2) A dues check off clause.
> (3) A clause permitting discharge of non-probationary employees only for just cause.
> (4) A union visitation clause.
> (5) An arbitration clause providing for final and binding arbitration of grievances in accordance with the rules of the American Arbitration Association.
> (6) A clause providing super seniority for shop stewards.
> (7) Cost of Living Wage Increases with a floor of 50¢ per hour.
> (8) A clause setting forth three proposed job classification[s] (trainee, experienced, experienced welder) providing for minimum rates of pay for each classification.

Regarding the above-noted contract proposal, it is noted that although the Company continued to propose that working foremen be excluded from the unit, it no longer was defining this category as being the three highest paid employees. As to this issue, the parties had further discussion, without resolution, at a meeting on October 13, 1983.

On October 14, Israel sent a correction of an error in its October 10 contract proposal. On October 27 Israel, in response to the Union's request for employee job classifications, sent a chart purporting to be a description of the jobs performed by each of Peele's employees. Thereafter, there were no further communications between the Union and Peele until January 19, 1984, when Colovito wrote to Israel seeking updated information relating to Peele's employees. Israel responded on January 23 that there were no changes. On February 7, 1983, Israel wrote to Colovito informing him of the hire of a new employee, the granting of wage increases to two employees, and the granting of a Christmas bonus to all employees. On February 10, 1984, Colovito sent another letter to Israel, regarding Peele, in which he modified the Union's economic demands. Although requesting another meeting, Peele did not respond. This was, as far as this record shows, the final communication between Local 455 and Peele.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNILATERAL WAGE INCREASES

At the trial the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to allege that Respondent unilaterally granted wage increases in July 1983 and January and February 1984. I granted that motion to amend, and gave Respondent additional time to respond to the amendment.

Peele's records show that all but one of its employees at its Bay Shore facility received wage increases in early July 1983. These wage increases varied over a fairly wide range and were given by the Company as merit increases. The records also showed that two employees received wage increases in January and February 1984 as described below. There is no dispute that the Union was never notified of these wage increases. In fact, Colovito first learned of the July raises at the hearing after examining certain business records that the General Counsel had subpoenaed.[7]

The Company's records also establish that since at least 1978 all employees, except for newly hired employees, received wage increases each July. (In 1980, the wage increases were given in late June.) The Company's controller, Fred Weber, testified that for many years the Company has had a policy of annually budgeting wage increases as an average percentage increase. He also testified that, based on annual performance reviews, wage increases are granted in July to each of its employees (if employed for more than 6 months) in amounts above or below the predetermined average percentage figure, depending on the employee's performance.

In the case of the two employees who received wage increases in January and February 1984, Weber explained these situations as follows. In the case of Paul Simonson, Weber stated (and the records confirm) that he was hired on February 8, 1983, and therefore did not receive a merit increase in July because he had not yet worked for 6 months. Weber asserts that in accordance with company policy, Simonson nevertheless received, on January 16, 1984, a raise around his anniversary date (50 cents), and would thereafter be eligible for the annual July raises. Regarding Donald O'Sullivan (hired in May 1982), Weber states that on January 20, 1984, O'Sullivan changed from being a part-time to full-time employee and therefore, in accordance with company policy, received a pay adjustment to reflect this change of status. As to the February wage increase, Weber testified that this simply resulted from O'Sullivan's threat to find employment elsewhere unless he got a raise.

Regarding Weber's testimony concerning the annual July raises, the Company's records show the following:[8]

Name	July 1978	July 1979	July 1980	July 1981	July 1982	July 1983
C. Hollamby	$ .25	$ .35	$ .45	$ .50	$ .50	$ .50
G. Pagano	.25	.66	.89	1.05	1.05	1.00
A. Reynolds	.25	.51	.74	1.10	.85	.85
S. Sinclair	.25	.35	N/E*	N/E*	.60	.40
M. Lilly [9]	0	0	0	0	.85	1.00
D. O'Sullivan [10]	0	0	0	0	.60	0
C. Scholl [11]	0	0	0	0	.60	0
C. Ramsden [12]	0	0	1.25	.50	1.00	.40
P. Simonson [13]	0	0	0	0	0	0
A. Torres [14]	0	0	0	.50	.50	.40

* Not employed.

[7] Inasmuch as Colovito was never informed of the July raises until the trial, the Respondent can hardly claim that the Union waived its right to bargain about those wage increases.

[8] It is noted that the Company's records show that there have been occasions when employees have also gotten raises at times other than July. However, the records indicate that such non-July raises have normally been given on a change in an employee's status. For example, when an employee changes from being part time to full time, or when an employee changes classification, or when an employee gains a new skill.

[9] M. Lilly was hired on 12/14/81.

[10] D. O'Sullivan was hired on 5/17/82.

[11] C. Scholl was hired on 2/26/47. His personnel card indicates that as of 7/1/80 he was paid $1985 per month; that on 7/1/81 he was raised to $1620 per month; that on 7/4/82 he was transferred to the weekly payroll at $10.05 per hour; and that on 7/4/83 he received a raise to $10.65 per hour.

[12] C. Ramsden was hired on 10/31/79. His personnel card indicates that on 12/7/81 he became a general mechanic and received a raise of 45 cents per hour.

[13] P. Simonson was hired on 2/8/83.

[14] A. Torres was hired on 6/26/80.

III. ANALYSIS

A. The Wage Increases

Insofar as the July 1983 wage increases, there is no question but that the Union was never informed that those increases were granted. Accordingly the Union was therefore never given either an opportunity to bargain about such wage increases or given the opportunity to waive its right to bargain about this subject.

Insofar as I can determine, the principal defense of the Respondent can only be that because it had a longstanding policy of granting merit increases each July, the July 1983 raises cannot be construed as a unilateral change. Put somewhat differently, Respondent might argue that given this longstanding practice, if it had ceased giving such merit increases during the course of the negotiations, it could be argued that it would have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. See for example Palestine Bottling Co., 269 NLRB 639 (1984), and Southeastern Michigan Gas Co., 198 NLRB 1221 (1972), enfd. 485 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir. 1973). Respondent would therefore argue that it would be anomolous to hold that it would violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by granting the July 1983 wage increases, but on the other hand, subjecting it to liability under Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act if it chose to withhold these increases.

In NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 746 (1962), the Supreme Court held that the company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when, during the course of negotiations and absent an impasse, it granted merit increases to some of its employees without prior notice to the Union. Although arguing that these raises were part of an established practice, the Court noted that the merit raises in question were "in no sense automatic, but were informed by a large measure of discretion. There simply is no way in such case for a union to know whether or not there has been a substantial departure from past practice, and therefore the union may properly insist that the company negotiate as to the procedures and criteria for determining such increases."

In a very recent case, State Bank of India, 273 NLRB 267 (1984), the Board stated at 267:

> Finally, the Bank's contention that it gave the wage increase on the basis of an earlier promise is not a legally sufficient defense. Even accepting the Bank's evidence that the employees were promised a wage increase in April and that the timing of the increase was predetermined, the amount of the increase was discretionary and became a matter as to which the Bank was obligated to consult with the bargaining agent.

Is there therefore an unresolvable dilemma facing employers who embark on labor negotiations while having a past history of granting annual merit increases? The answer to this problem was given in Oneita Knitting Mills, 205 NLRB 500 fn. 1 1973. The Board stated:

> Respondent argues that a finding that the unilateral grant of merit increases was a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) would be inconsistent with the holding of this Board in Southeastern Michigan Gas Company, 198 NLRB No. 8, wherein we found a discontinuance of merit increases to have been a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5). We disagree. An employer with a past history of a merit increase program neither may discontinue that program (as we found in Southeastern Michigan) nor may he any longer continue to unilaterally exercise his discretion with respect to such increases, once an exclusive bargaining agent is selected. N.L.R.B. v. Katz, 396 U.S. 736 (1962). What is required is a maintenance of preexisting practices, i.e., the general outline of the program, however the implementation of that program (to the extent that discretion has existed in determining the amounts or timing of the increases), becomes a matter as to which the bargaining agent is entitled to be consulted.

In view of the above, it is my opinion that by granting the July 1983 merit increases without prior notification to the Union, the Respondent, in the circumstances herein, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[15] On the other hand I do not view the January and February 1984 raises to employees O'Sullivan and Simonson as being violative of the Act. In the case of O'Sullivan, he received a raise on January 20, 1984, when he changed from part-time to full-time status. He received another raise in February 1984 when he threatened to quit unless he got more money. Simonson got his raise on January 16, 1984, because he was not eligible for the July 1983 merit increases. These wage increases were given to the two employees at a time well after bargaining had ceased between the Union and the Company and, at least as far as O'Sullivan was concerned, merely constituted individual pay adjustments.

B. The Surface Bargaining Allegation

Section 8(d) of the Act, which defines the duty to bargain, does not compel either party to a collective-bargaining relationship to agree to a proposal or to make a concession. Therefore, insofar as mandatory subjects of bargaining (generally relating to wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment), the Act does not require either party to yield or compromise its position. In this respect, the Supreme Court in NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404 (1952), stated:

> [T]he Board may not, either directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective bargaining agreements.

The court further stated in H. K. Porter v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99, 107–108 (1970):

> It is implicit in the entire structure of the Act that the Board acts to oversee and referee the process of collective bargaining, leaving the results of the contest to the bargaining strengths of the parties. . . .

[15] For the same reasons set forth in my opinion in Achilles Construction Co., JD–NY–9–85, I reject Respondent's reliance on M & M Contractors, 262 NLRB 1472 (1982), and AAA Motor Lines, 215 NLRB 793 (1974).

> While the parties' freedom of contract is not absolute under the Act, allowing the Board to compel agreement when the parties themselves are unable to agree would violate the fundamental premise on which the Act is based—private bargaining under governmental supervision of the procedure alone, without any official compulsion over the actual terms of the contract.

It also is clear that it was the intention of Congress to permit (within limits) employers and unions to utilize their relative economic strengths vis-a-vis each other as part of the bargaining process.[18] As pointed out by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477, 489 (1960):

> The presence of economic weapons in reserve, and their actual exercise on occasion by the parties, is part and parcel of the system that the Wagner and Taft-Hartley Acts have recognized. . . . [T]he truth of the matter is that at the present statutory stage of our national labor relations policy, the two factors—necessity for good-faith bargaining between parties, and the availability of economic pressure devices to each to make the other party incline to agree on one's terms—exist side by side.

It therefore is not necessarily unlawful for the stronger side to make demands or take positions consistent with its strength. Quite obviously, the respective strength of a union versus a company in bargaining is largely dependent on the support of the employees it represents, their willingness to strike, and the vulnerability of the company to a strike. See, for example, World Publishing Co., 220 NLRB 1065, 1071 (1975), enfd. sub nom. Omaha Typographical Union 190 v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 1138 (8th Cir. 1976). Furthermore, collective bargaining is basically a two-way street. Thus although a union may lawfully make demands designed to improve existing employee wages and benefits, there is nothing in the Act that denies an employer the right, for its part, to demand givebacks. Where the parties are negotiating to replace a prior contract, neither side is precluded from seeking modifications to its own advantage. The Act simply does not preclude an employer from demanding that various provisions of the old contract be modified, altered, or even eliminated. Thus, in the present case, when the General Counsel argues that the Respondent sought to modify or eliminate contractual provisions contained in the contract that expired in 1975, I am unimpressed as to the materiality of such a fact.

Although it is not illegal for a company to engage in hard bargaining, Section 8(a)(5) of the Act nevertheless requires the company to bargain in good faith, which is essentially defined as a willingness to enter into a contract. NLRB v. Insurance Agents, supra, 361 U.S. 477, 485. Thus, although a company may use its relative strength to press for contract terms favorable to itself, it may not use its strength to engage in futile or sham negotiations with the intention of never reaching an agreement. NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 232 (5th Cir. 1960). As stated in Abingdon Nursing Center, 197 NLRB 781, 787 (1972):

> Good faith, or want of it, is concerned essentially with a state of mind. . . . That determination must be based upon reasonable inference drawn from the totality of conduct evidencing the state of mind with which the employer entered into and participated in the bargaining process. . . . All aspects of the Respondent's bargaining and related conduct must be considered in unity, not as separate fragments each to be assessed in isolation.

I have already indicated my view that the initially proposed "contract," tendered by the Respondent on September 1, 1982, was problematical at the very least. However, it is not unusual for both unions and companies to make initial proposals that they know will be unacceptable to the other side and that they do not seriously pursue throughout negotiations. The key question in surface bargaining cases is not what a respondent initially offers, but what its bottom line position is throughout or at the end of the negotiations. In fact, it has been argued that if a company or union comes to the table with a reasonable offer from which it is unwilling to compromise, that such a position would constitute surface bargaining.

Although I view the Respondent's initial contract proposal as being unreasonable, the evidence suggests that Israel on behalf of Peele had every intention of making compromises as the negotiations advanced. For better or worse, however, it seems that progress in these particular negotiations proceeded at a rather slow pace in that Colovito and Israel concentrated their bargaining on some of the other companies with whom Local 455 was simultaneously negotiating.

The evidence in this case shows that the Respondent, during the course of the negotiations, made substantial concessions, eliminated some of its more objectionable proposals, and made significant offers on substantive issues. The following are examples.

(1) Although the initial contract offer tendered on September 1 (G.C. Exh. 6b), made no reference to a union-management grievance procedure, the accompanying letter and later offers make it clear that the Respondent offered a rather traditional grievance-arbitration procedure.

(2) Although the Company's initial contract offer stated that the contract could, in effect, be changed at the Company's sole discretion and without notice, this absurd provision was soon dropped and long forgotten.

(3) The initial company proposal included a provision allowing employees to be dismissed if, in the opinion of the Company, "a disharmonious relationship would result from continued employment." This proposal was thereafter dropped and replaced by a company proposal for a standard clause permitting discharge only for "just cause."

(4) Although the initial company proposal called for the exclusion from the bargaining unit, as working fore-

[18] There are of course statutorily defined limits on each side's use of economic power. Thus for example, Sec. 8(b)(4)(B) prohibits a union from engaging in secondary boycotts, and Sec. 8(a)(3) would preclude an employer from discharging employees who join or support a union.

men, the three highest paid employees, this demand was dropped and replaced by a demand that those persons who were working foremen be excluded from the unit. The evidence, although documenting the company and union positions on this issue, does not, however, establish that the Respondent insisted to impasse or as a condition of reaching agreement, that the bargaining unit be modified to exclude nonsupervisory employees who otherwise should be part of that unit.[17]

(5) The initial company proposal did not offer either union-security or checkoff provisions. However, on August 4, 1983, Peele offered an agency shop and on October 10, offered a dues-checkoff provision. As to a union-security clause, Israel expressed the Company's view that notwithstanding the Court's enforcement of the bargaining order on June 6, 1982, a number of employees were not interested in joining the Union and the Company did not want to compel their membership.

(6) On August 10, 1983, the Company offered to use the Union's hiring hall on a first-call basis, for the referral of new employees.

(7) Insofar as wages, the Company's initial offer was to grant cost-of- living raises each October over the 6-year term of a contract (to September 30, 1988). On June 6, 1983, in response to the Union's modification of its initial demands, the Company offered a cost-of-living increase each year with a floor of 50 cents per hour. On June 13 the Company proposed that such raises be given each July rather than each October. Its final proposal in October 1983 was for cost-of-living increases each July until the contract expired (proposed to be September 30, 1988) with a 50-cent floor.

Notwithstanding the above, there are a number of factors from which an argument might be made that Respondent should be inferred to have bargained without an intention of reaching agreement. Some examples shall be discussed below, but in my opinion they do not, in the context of this entire record, warrant the ultimate conclusion that the General Counsel would draw.

(1) The Respondent refused to furnish the addresses of its employees until January 1983. Notwithstanding the fact that Local 455 was held to have committed some 8(b)(1)(A) violations in 1975, I have no doubt that Peele was legally obligated to furnish the names of its employees in 1982. Gehnrich & Gehnrich, Inc., 238 NLRB 528, 535 (1981). However, the Company's refusal to furnish addresses occurred outside the statute of limitations period and, in my opinion, is only remotely related to the issue of surface bargaining.

(2) The Company gave unilateral increases during the negotiations which I have found above to have constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Unlike the refusal to furnish addresses, it is my opinion that the unilateral wage increases are much more directly related to the issue of surface bargaining. See for example NLRB v. Fitzgerald Mills Corp., 313 F.2d 260, 267 (2d Cir. 1963). Yet here too we are dealing with evidentiary points and I cannot say that such unilateral changes necessarily demonstrate an intent to avoid entering into a contract.

(3) The General Counsel contends that the Company's insistence on a provision that would permit it to subcontract is evidence of its intention to avoid reaching an agreement. Her argument appears to be that if the Company were able to obtain such a clause, it theoretically could subcontract out all of its business and eliminate the bargaining unit.

The subject of subcontracting is a mandatory subject of bargaining, which means that either side may insist on its position regarding the subject. Thus, a union would clearly be within its right if, during negotiations, it insisted on a clause that precluded all subcontracting by a company.[18] By the same token I can see nothing illegal in a company refusing to agree to subcontracting restrictions or, alternatively, insisting on a right to subcontract during the life of the labor agreement. To hold otherwise would, in effect, impose a lack of mutuality in collective bargaining, which I do not believe was envisioned by Congress. In the present case there is no evidence that Peele was taking its positions vis-a-vis subcontracting because it, in fact, intended to take the draconian step of eliminating the bargaining unit. All that can be said is that Israel intended to give the Company the option of subcontracting if economic circumstances made that desirable. I therefore do not believe that the Company's position regarding subcontracting is evidence of surface bargaining in the context of this case.

(4) The General Counsel correctly notes that the Company wanted significant give backs from the last contract it had with Local 455. However, there had been a 7-year hiatus between the expiration of that contract and the resumption of negotiations, and a great many changes had evolved in the Employer's terms of employment during the interim. Moreover, I do not perceive the Act to prohibit a company from demanding give backs. Collective bargaining is a two-way street and each side, based on its relative strength, is entitled to try to get the best deal possible for itself. Gehnrich & Gehnrich, Inc., 258 NLRB 528 (1981).

(5) Although a union-security clause was contained in the contract that expired in 1975, the Company, during these negotiations, offered only an agency-shop and a dues-checkoff provision. However, as noted above, several years had elapsed since the expiration of the last contract and most of the Company's current employees had neither been employed before the strike nor had been members of Local 455. Under such circumstances, I do not view as unreasonable the Company's refusal to agree to a union-security clause.

It seems to me that although the General Counsel has presented some evidence that perhaps in another context might give rise to a prima facie inference of surface bargaining, the record in this case convinces me that she has not sustained her burden of persuasion. Thus, although I would say that the Respondent has engaged in hard bargaining consistent with its relative strength vis-a-vis the Union, I am equally convinced that it did not cross the line into surface bargaining.[19]

[17] In NLRB v. Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342 (1958), the Supreme Court held that although either side may seek to bargain about nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, a Respondent will only violate the Act if it bargains to impasse over that subject or insist on its position vis-a-vis a permissive subject, as a condition of reaching an agreement.

[18] I should note, however, that there are certain types of subcontracting clauses that are illegal pursuant to Sec. 8(e) of the Act. For a discussion of so-called union signatory clauses in the context of Sec. 8(e) see for example Retail Clerks Local 1288 (Nickel's Pay-less), 163 NLRB 817 (1976), enfd. 390 F.2d 856 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, The Peele Co., is and has been, at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By unilaterally granting wage increases to employees in July 1983 without prior notice to, and consultation with, the Union during collective-bargaining negotiations, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. The Employer has not violated the Act in any other respect alleged by the complaint.

REMEDY

Having found that the Employer has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order the Employer to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, The Peele Co., Bay Shore, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO by unilaterally granting wage increases to employees, during the course of collective-bargaining negotiations, without prior notice to, and consultation with, the Union provided, however, that nothing contained in this Order shall compel Respondent to rescind such wage increases previously granted.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) In the event that the Respondent and the Union resume negotiations, Respondent shall notify the Union as to all proposed wage increases to employees in the bargaining unit and shall not implement such wage increases absent an impasse in negotiations or consent by the Union.

(b) Post at its plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[19] The record shows that on February 10, 1984, long after negotiations had ceased, Colovito requested further meetings and that Peele did not respond. The General Counsel does not allege, however, that this action constituted a refusal to bargain. As there was no other evidence regarding this event, and as the Company did not seek to litigate this matter, I shall not find that the Respondent's failure to respond to the Union's February 10, 1984 letter was a violation of the Act.

[20] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION ON REVIEW, DIRECTION, AND ORDER

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On May 29, 1987, the Regional Director for Region 5 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the above-entitled proceeding in which he asserted jurisdiction over the Employer.[1] The Employer filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision. On July 9, 1987, the Board granted the Employer's request for review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record, including the briefs, and finds, in agreement with the Regional Director, that the Employer is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act[2] and that it is appropriate to assert jurisdiction.

Accordingly, we affirm the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election and shall direct that the ballots cast in the June 26 and 27, 1987 election be opened and counted and an appropriate certification issued.

DIRECTION

It is directed that the Regional Director for Region 5 open and count the ballots and thereafter prepare and serve on the parties a tally of ballots and issue an appropriate certification.

ORDER

It is ordered that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 5 for further proceedings.

Member Johansen, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would decline to assert jurisdiction. In my view, this case is covered by my dissenting position in Imperial House Condominium, 279 NLRB 1225 (1986). Here, as there, property owners collectively pay an assessment to the Employer which funds the recreational opportunities and community services provided by the Employer. When individual homeowners pool their resources in order to secure these types of services for themselves, in my view, this is not the type of enterprise to which the Board should attach jurisdiction.

APPENDIX

The parties stipulated that the Columbia Park and Recreation Association, Inc. is a non-profit Maryland corporation with annual gross revenues in excess of $1,000,000 and that in the past 12 months the Association has purchased and received goods and services in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Maryland. The parties also stipulated that the Association operates a transit system (also known as ColumBus) that annually generates approximately $125,000 in fares and receives approximately $300,000 in state and federal grants. Petitioner seeks to represent all full-time and regular part-time drivers and mechanics. The petitioned-for unit comprises approximately 16 employees. There is no dispute concerning unit issues, as set forth below.

The sole issue in this matter arises out of the Association's claim that it is exempt from the Board's jurisdiction as a "political subdivision" within the meaning of Section 2(2). Petitioner argues that the Association is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2).

The parties agree that the Association's status under Section 2(2) is to be resolved by applying the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. The Natural Gas Utility District of Hawkins County, Tennessee, 402 U.S. 600 (1971), which affirmed the Board's determination that an employing entity is a political subdivision within the meaning of Section 2(2) if such entity is: 1) created directly by the state so as to constitute a department or administrative arm of the government; or 2) administered by individuals who are responsible to public officials or to the general electorate. See, e.g., Detroit Institute of Art, 271 NLRB 285 (1984). Applying these standards, I make the following findings.

Columbia is a planned community located in Howard County, Maryland that was created in the 1960's by Howard Research and Development Corporation. It is not an incorporated city. The Association is the governing body of Columbia and was incorporated in 1965. In 1966, a Deed, Agreement and Declaration of Covenants, Easements, Charges and Liens (Declaration of Covenants) was filed in Howard County covering Columbia and its lands. The Declaration of Covenants, inter alia, created easements, and use requirements, and various property encumbrances. It also established an assessment that is payable to the Association. The assessment is based on the assessed value of property in Columbia as [1] An election was conducted June 26 and 27, 1987, and the ballots were impounded.

[2] The pertinent part of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election (the text of fn. 3) is attached as an appendix. In agreeing with the Regional Director that the Employer is not a political subdivision, we note particularly that the composition of the Employer's nine-member board is established by its "Amended and Restated Charter," not by law. Therefore, to the extent that the members may be accountable to the general electorate of the villages from which they were elected, they are accountable by choice rather than law. Accordingly, the Employer does not qualify as a political subdivision. See Jefferson County Community Center v. NLRB, 732 F.2d 122, 125 fn. 3 (10th Cir. 1984); Crestline Memorial Hospital Assn. v. NLRB, 668 F.2d 243, 245 (6th Cir. 1982).

We note that the Board's decision in Imperial House Condominium, 279 NLRB 1225 (1986), which reaffirmed the policy of asserting jurisdiction over residential condominiums and cooperatives, was enforced recently by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, NLRB v. Imperial House Condominium, 831 F.2d 999 (1987).

determined by the Howard County property tax assessment of such property. The assessment has priority over mortgages, is normally paid by assesses as part of their mortgage, is not deductible from Federal taxes, and does not serve as a credit or offset to property owners' Howard County taxes. This assessment is the primary revenue source for the Association. While the Association can impose special assessments, it has never done so. The Association has no tax imposition authority. Nor does it exercise any sovereign powers such as eminent domain.

The Association is controlled by the Columbia Council (hereinafter the Council). The Council is composed of nine members, one from each "village" in Columbia. Council members are elected annually. Eight of the nine villages vote based upon a single vote being accorded each property interest. One village allows each resident of the village to vote. Thus, only property interest holders (in eight villages) or residents (in one village) are entitled to vote. Council members are subject to recall. Council members are not state or local officials and Columbia residents are not represented separately in the Howard County Council.

Based on the foregoing, it does not appear that the Association was created directly by the state so as to constitute a department or administrative arm of the government. Minneapolis Society of Fine Arts, 194 NLRB 371 (1971). Rather, it was created by private individuals to serve, in essence, as a homeowner's association for the purpose of providing services to Columbia land owners and residents.

Indeed, it does not appear that the Employer argues otherwise. Thus, in seeking to meet the first prong of the Hawkins criteria, the Employer does not claim that the state created the Association, but rather, it presented evidence at the hearing and argues in its brief that the Association is "for all intents and purposes, the local government of Columbia." The Employer presented evidence of the vast array of services that the Association provides, ranging from parks and recreation facilities to child care and public transportation. In essence, the Employer argues that the Association is the functional equivalent of a city government.

Under current Board law, however, the Employer's contentions in this regard do not advance its claim of political subdivision status. Rather, its evidence and arguments amount to an attempt to apply the "intimate connection" test whereby an employing entity that performs functions that are intimately related to the traditional functions of an exempt government entity is excluded from the Act's coverage. See, e.g., Rural Fire Protection Co., 216 NLRB 584 (1975). That standard, however, was rejected by the Board in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), and again in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986). Thus, regardless of how similar the Association's functions might be to those of a "typical" city government, those similarities alone do not provide a basis for excluding the Association from the Act's coverage. Moreover, even if the Employer's evidence concerning the Association's purported functional equivalence to a city government was aimed at an attempt to apply the Res-Care standard, the Employer conceded at the hearing that the Association retains, with regard to the petitioned-for employees, the ultimate authority to hire, fire, train, supervise, evaluate, discipline and handle employee grievances and in addition has control over wages and benefits. Accordingly, absent a right of control being exercised by an exempt entity, the degree of similarity between the Association and a city government is irrelevant. Res-Care, supra at 672.

In addition, the evidence presented reveals that the Association is more aptly analogous to a homeowners' or condominium association, which are entities that the Board has recently reaffirmed fall within the Act's jurisdiction. Imperial House Condominium, 279 NLRB 1225 (1986). Granted, the Association here provides many more services than does the typical condominium association. That difference, however, appears to arise out of the Association's unique opportunity to command significant assets rather than out of any municipal or governmental status.

Regarding the second prong of the Hawkins test, the Employer argues that its Council is responsible to public officials and the general electorate. As noted, while the Council is elected and subject to recall, the Council is not responsible to the general electorate. Rather, it is only Columbia property interest holders or, in one of nine villages, residents to whom the Council is responsible.

Concerning the Council's responsibility to public officials, the record shows that the Council is responsible to various county, state and federal officials by virtue of the Association's dependence upon public funding through various grants, the requirements imposed by those grants, and various licensing requirements imposed by government. Such "dependence" and grant administration oversight, however, do not establish that the Council members are responsible to public officials. Cf. D. T. Watson Home for Crippled Children, 242 NLRB 1368, 1370 (1979) cited with approval in Res-Care, supra at 674 fn. 22. Indeed, under the Employer's argument, any business entity that received state or federal grants, or was subject to state or federal regulation would be "responsible to public officials" under Hawkins.

In sum, the record fails to support a finding that the Employer is a "political subdivision" within the meaning of Section 2(2). See cases cited by Petitioner: Truman Medical Center, 239 NLRB 1067 (1978), 247 NLRB 396 (1980), enfd. 641 F.2d 570, 574 (8th Cir. 1981); Minneapolis Society of Fine Arts, supra. Accordingly, I find that the Association is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, and that it is appropriate for the Board to assert jurisdiction herein.

Of the cases cited by the Employer, I note that MTL Inc., 223 NLRB 1071 (1976) and Transit Systems, Inc., 221 NLRB 299 (1975), both were decided under the standard set forth in Rural Fire Protection, supra. Since National Transportation, supra, this standard is no longer viable, and those cases cannot control this one. The employers in The City Public Service Board of San Antonio, 197 NLRB 312 (1972), and the Pennsylvania State Association of Boroughs, 267 NLRB 71 (1983), both were found to meet the second part of the Hawkins test. The Employer here, as discussed above, does not, in the opinion of the undersigned, meet that test.

Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super, and Jerry's United Super, Inc.[1] and United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782. Case 17–CA–10188

June 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 20, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached decision. Respondent Woods Chapel United Super filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super, Blue Springs, Missouri, and Jerry's United Super, Inc., Independence, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] We have amended the caption to add Jerry's United Super, Inc., which the judge found to be a single employer with Respondent Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (Woods Chapel United Super).

[2] We reject Respondent Woods Chapel United Super's contention that we should dismiss the complaint and that the Board has no authority to issue an order against Jerry's United Super, Inc. "because of General Counsel's failure to join Jerry's United Super, Inc. as a party to this action." Although Jerry's United Super, Inc. was not named in the complaint caption, the complaint alleges that it and Respondent Woods Chapel United Super were a single employer and that issue was fully litigated at the hearing. Also, both entities share common stock ownership and corporate officers. We therefore find Jerry's United Super, Inc. had its "day in court." Contrast George C. Shearer Exhibitors Delivery Service, 246 NLRB 416 fn. 3 (1979), enfd. mem. 636 F.2d 1210 (3d Cir. 1980), on which Respondent Woods Chapel United Super relies. In that case, the Board held that it would not issue an order against an alter ego not named in the complaint and whose alter ego status was not alleged until after the hearing.

[3] We amend the judge's remedy to provide that the Respondent shall pay backpay as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971). Further, in accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Naomi L. Stuart, Esq., for the General Counsel.
James P. Willard, Esq. (Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne), of Kansas City, Missouri, for the Respondent.
Robert L. Dameron, Esq. (Blake & Uhlig), of Kansas City, Kansas, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed on February 20, 1981, by United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782 (the Union), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 17, Kansas City, Kansas, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on March 31, 1981, against Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (the Respondent), alleging that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1)and (5) and 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The Respondent, by counsel, denied the material allegations in the complaint by answer dated April 8, 1981 .

A hearing was held before me in Kansas City, Kansas, on October 15, 1981. At the close of the General Counsel's case the Respondent moved to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that > [T]here is no evidence on the record that a demand has ever been made that the Woods Chapel group be added to the Jerry's contract or the Fisher's contract . . . that a demand is a condition precedent to any obligation that hasn't been made . . . .

I denied the motion. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. Thereafter, the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Charging Party filed briefs. In its brief the Respondent requests that, "This fatally flawed Complaint should be dismissed for all the reasons set forth in this brief."[1] For the reasons appearing hereinafter, I deny the Respondent's request to dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and on my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

[1] As stated by the Respondent in its brief

> Among these reasons the major flaws include (1) there is no single employer status here and even if there were it would be a three-store unit with two existing contracts precluding merger. In any event the Complaint does not name the necessary parties to allow the remedy sought by counsel for the General Counsel. (2) The Union made no demand for merger of the Woods Chapel unit into the Noland Road unit and in fact the Union did not seek or desire such merger. (3) The Union did not have a card majority among the employees in the unit at any relevant time. (4) There was no after acquired store clause in effect at any relevant time.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Respondent, at all times material, has been a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, maintaining its principal office and place of business at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, and Blue Springs, Missouri, where it is, and has been at all times material, continuously engaged in the retail sale of grocery and related products. In the course and conduct of the Respondent's business operations during the preceding 12 months, these operations, being representative of its operations at all times material, the Respondent purchased goods and services valued in excess of $50,000, directly from sources located outside the State of Missouri, and the Respondent's annual gross volume of business at this store exceeded $500,000. The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Additionally, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material, Gerald E. Fisher, the Respondent's president, and Jerry Lee Fisher[2] and Gary Minton, comanagers of the Woods Chapel store, are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and have been and are now agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782 is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges, in substance, that the Respondent violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) and 8(d) of the Act by failing and refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit. The Respondent denies this allegation.

A. Background

The evidence discloses that in May 1965, Gerald E. Fisher opened a United Super Store[3] under the corporate name Jerry's United Super, Inc., located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri (the Noland Road store).[4] Sometime thereafter, "another Fisher family United Super" store was opened under the corporate name Fisher's United Super, Inc., located at 2604 South Chrysler, Independence, Missouri (the Chrysler store).[5] In December 1979, Gerald E. Fisher opened an additional grocery store under the corporate name of the Respondent here, located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri (the Woods Chapel store).[6]

Gerald E. Fisher is the sole owner of all the stock of Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) and of the Respondent (Woods Chapel store) and "made all capital investments" in Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store). Gerald E. Fisher is also the president, treasurer, and director of the Respondent and of Jerry's United Super, Inc., with his wife, Charlene Fisher, being the vice president and secretary. However, his son, Richard Fisher, is president of Fisher's United Super, Inc.[7]

Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from May 14, 1979, to May 9, 1981.[8] Article II of this agreement is entitled "Bargaining Unit" and Section 2.1 reads as follows:

> 2.1 The Employer hereby recognizes the Union as the sole and exclusive collective bargaining agent with respect to rates of pay, hours, and all other terms and conditions of employment for the appropriate bargaining unit herein established and described as follows: All employees employed by the Employer working in the Employer' s present and future retail establishments situated within Jackson, Clay, Platte, and Cass Counties, Missouri, and Johnson and Wyandotte Counties, Kansas, engaged in handling or selling merchandise or performing other services incidental or related thereto, except supervisory employees within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act of 1947, as amended, and employees whose work is exclusively and wholly performed within the meat department locations of the retail establishment. For the purpose of this Article, the term "retail establishments" includes only full line grocery stores generally known as supermarkets and does not include free standing specialty stores (e.g., dairy stores, liquor stores, or deli).

[2] Jerry Lee Fisher is the son of Gerald E. Fisher, and although the Respondent's answer characterizes him as a vice president of the Respondent, the evidence does not confirm this.

[3] Fisher commenced his retail grocery business in or about 1951 when he first opened a United Super grocery store in the Kansas City area. The evidence shows that "United Super" is a trade name for a group of independently owned and operated grocery stores served by the Fleming Food Company, a wholesale grocer or "broker." There are some "twenty to thirty" United Super stores in the Kansas City metropolitan area with Fleming Foods setting the "pricing zones" and performing all the accounting services for these stores.

[4] The Noland Road store was managed by Gary Minton until his transfer, as comanager, of the new Woods Chapel store sometime in October, November, or early December 1979. Thereafter, this store has been managed by Kent Fisher, a son of Gerald E. Fisher.

[6] The Woods Chapel store is comanage by Gary Minton and Jerry Lee Fisher.

[7] See Jt. Exh. 3. This agreement is signed by Richard E. Fisher as president of Fisher's United Super, Inc.

[8] See Jt. Exh. 1. This agreement is signed by Gerald E. Fisher, president, on behalf of Jerry's United Super, Inc.

There was also a collective-bargaining agreement in effect from May 7, 1978, through May 9, 1981, between Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store) and the Union with the exact same provision as set forth above.[9] At the time these agreements were executed the Woods Chapel store was not yet in existence. In or about the first week of December 1979, however, the Respondent opened its Woods Chapel store for business.

The Woods Chapel store is located about 8 miles from the Noland Road store and some 9 or 10 miles from the Chrysler store. The Noland Road and Chrysler stores are approximately 1-1/2 miles apart.

B. The Evidence

Earl G. Davis, president of the Union, testified that sometime in late September 1979, he received a telephone call from Gerald E. Fisher, president of Jerry's United Super, Inc., the owner of the Noland Road store, who advised him that, "You know we' re going to open a new store on Woods Chapel Road in Blue Springs and we'd like to sit down and talk to you about it." Pursuant thereto, on October 2, 1979, Davis met with Fisher at the Noland Road store with Gary Minton, who managed the store at the time, and Richard Fisher, the "owner-manager" of the Chrysler store, also being present. Davis stated that regarding the new Woods Chapel store, the following was agreed to between himself and Gerald E. Fisher: That the "Effective date for bargaining agreement . . . will be 5-4-1980 and the agreement will remain into (sic) effect thru May 9, 1981"; that employees transferred from the Noland Road store to the new Woods Chapel store would continue to have "contribution made" to the Union's health and welfare and pension programs "in their behalf"; that employee David Lindsey, comanager of the Noland Road store with 20 year's credit in the "Company's pension plan" would retain such credit on his transfer to the Woods Chapel store as produce manager; and that these agreed-on terms and conditions were "an [accretion] to the agreements that are in effect with an effective date delayed until May 4, 1980."[10] Davis related that he wrote these items down and the resulting document was then signed by himself and Gerald E. Fisher and witnessed by Richard Fisher and Minton.[11] He added that, subsequently, after receiving a request from Gerald E. Fisher for a copy, on November 1, 1979, he mailed a copy of the "hand-written paper" signed by the parties on October 2, 1979, with covering letter, to Fisher at the Noland Road store.[12]

Davis continued that in November 1979, he received a written request from the Respondent for the Union's acceptance of a waiver, by an employee hired for the Woods Chapel store, of her rights under the "Retail Clerks Union Contract of May 14, 1978" to have past "comparable supermarket experience" credited towards her salary level placement, she having agreed to accept a lesser starting wage. This request was signed by Gary Minton as "Company Officer" of the Respondent, and by the employee, Julia Edgar, and Davis related that he signed it on behalf of the Union and returned a copy to the Respondent on November 27, 1979.[13] At this time the Woods chapel store had still not been opened to the public for business.

The evidence shows that the Woods Chapel store opened for business on or about December 5, 1979. Just prior thereto, however, on December 3, 1979, several employees at the Noland Road store were transferred to the Woods Chapel store permanently. Gary Minton, manager of the Noland Road store, became the Woods Chapel store manager; Jerry Lee Fisher, a son of Gerald E. Fisher, became comanager, with Minton, of the Woods Chapel store,[14] and employees Robert Leiblie, Mary Tignor, Dave Lindsey, Betty Hoy, and Dale Hunt all were transferred to the new store. Moreover, pursuant to the October 2, 1979 agreement, contributions to the Union's health and welfare, and pension funds were made on behalf of Leiblie, Tignor, and Hoy, and additionally union dues deductions were remitted to the Union for these employees and at least one other employee, through the end of April or May 1980.[15]

Davis testified that sometime in late April 1980, he received a telegram from Gerald E. Fisher that stated, in substance, that Fisher had been advised that if the Union considered the "meeting notes dated October 2, 1979 by which Retail Store Employees Union Number 782 claims to represent the employees of Woods Chapel United Super, Inc." to be an agreement between the Respondent and the Union, "such purported agreement would be in violation of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended," since it was agreed to and signed prior to any employees being hired at the Woods Chapel store by the Respondent. Fisher then "repudiate[d] any such purported agreement."[16] Moreover, contributions to the Union's health and welfare, and pension funds, and the withholding and forwarding of union dues for the aforementioned employees that had transferred from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store were discontinued by Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store).[17] Davis

[10] Davis testified that Gerald E. Fisher had requested an effective date of May 4, 1980, because that was the date "new rates" under the Noland Road store contract were going into effect and this would save "a lot of bookkeeping and time."

The telegram dated April 29, 1980, also states that should the Union "desire to represent" the Respondent's employees at Woods Chapel store," said representation can only be obtained and granted through appropriate procedures of the National Labor Relations Board under the National Labor Relations Act."

[17] Jerry Lee Fisher's testimony concerning the discontinuance of such payments was contradictory and equivocal in part. He testified that sometime in April or May 1980, he was advised by employee Dale Minton, the son of Gary Minton, the Woods Chapel store manager, that some of the Woods Chapel employees had held a meeting at the store and voted against representation by the Union. Fisher related that based on this, the Respondent decided to "get our own health and welfare set up" and to include all Woods Chapel employees including those who had transferred from the Noland Road store and therefore to discontinue the contribu-stated that had he not received the telegram from Gerald E. Fisher repudiating the "purported agreement" of October 2, 1979; the Union, as is normally done, would have prepared a collective-bargaining agreement for Gerald E. Fisher to sign concerning the Woods Chapel store.[18] Davis added that after receiving the telegram, he then called into his office Union Organizer James Hillen and instructed him "to go out and sign the people up."

1. The Union's organizational campaign

James Hillen, employed by the Union as an organizer, testified that the Union commenced its organizing campaign to represent the Respondent's Woods Chapel store employees in or about June 1980. Hillen stated that he distributed union authorization cards to various employees, who signed the card in his presence and returned it to him.[19] The evidence shows that the following employees signed union authorization cards and returned them to Hillen: Donald Gann and Marvin Paul, authorization cards dated June 14, 1980;[20] Betty Hoy, whose card is dated July 1, 1980;[21] Madalene Hunt, whose card is dated July 29, 1980; Robert Leiblie, whose card is dated August 26, 1980;[22] Joan Prine, whose card is dated November 13, 1980; Bernadette Cox, whose card is dated November 18, 1980; Mary Cooper, whose card is dated July 3, 1980; Tim Hicks, whose card is dated January 1, 1981; Cheryl Baker, whose card is dated January 16, 1981; Cindy Kreiser, whose card is dated January 18, 1981; Mary Lou Watters, whose card is dated January 19, 1981; and Ruth Grey, whose card is dated February 3, 1981.[23] The authorization cards of Gann, Paul, Hoy, Hunt, Leiblie, Prine, Cox, and Cooper all have the following heading: "Retail Store Employees Union Local 782 chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union (affiliated with the AFL-CIO & CLC).[24] Those of Hicks, Baker, Kreiser, Watters, and Grey all have the following heading: "United Food & Commercial Workers International Union affiliated with AFL-CIO-CLC."[25]

Hillen testified that at the time he distributed the authorization cards to these employees and solicited their signatures he told them that,

> [W]e had an organizing campaign going. I told them that the cards would be confidential unless we went to a hearing. I told them that the cards could be used in several different ways. I said, "If we get a majority of the employees signed up, that we'll request a card check . . . ." And I said, "Another route we can take is the election route if the Company refuses to grant us a card check. We can file for an election with the Labor Board."

Hillen related that he also told these employees that if the Union "got recognition on a card check or won an election," it would then "sit down with the Employer and would negotiate contracts to cover their wages, hours and conditions of employment" and that any resulting agreement would be submitted to the employees for approval with "a chance to vote on the contract."[26]

Shaun Barclay, employed as a union representative for the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Region 10, testified that he was involved in the Union's organizational campaign at the Woods Chapel store in the fall of 1980 and "into part of 1981" distributing authorization cards and soliciting employee signatures.[27] The evidence shows that the following employees signed authorization cards and returned them to Barclay: Sondra Hertzog, whose authorization card is dated August 27, 1980;[28] Sondra Straw, whose card is dated September 9, 1980; Jeanne Hubbard, whose card is dated September 8, 1980; Barbara Robinson,[29] whose card is tions being made on their behalf to the Union's health and welfare pension funds and the dues withholding payments.

On cross-examination, however, Fisher testified that their then legal counsel, Rick Noble, had advised him and his father, Gerald E. Fisher, that the payments being made for the transferred employees should cease, which was done. He then changed his testimony, asserting that the basis for the above action was the employees' desires not to be represented by the Union.

It appeared to me that Fisher's testimony was contrived and evidenced a desire on his part to testify in furtherance of the Respondent's position rather than the truth of what actually occurred.

[18] The Respondent in its brief states:

> While the agreement [G.C. Exh. 2] is unclear and incomplete on its face, Union President Davis testified that had the purported agreement not been repudiated he would have prepared a separate contract for Woods Chapel (Tr. 59) consistent with the contracts with the other Fisher family stores (Jt. Exhs. 1 and 3) and consistent with the acknowledgment of two agreements.

Whatever counsel for the Respondent means by this, I agree that Davis' testimony could well be construed to mean that the bargaining agreement to be prepared would have been in physical form, a separate agreement, and one consistent in content with the contracts then in existence covering the Noland Road and Chrysler stores.

[19] Hillen testified that at the time the signed authorization cards were returned to him, he made a notation on each of them indicating the date, from whom he had received it, the place he received it, and that he personally had been given the card.

[20] Hillen testified that these cards were actually signed on June 13, 1980, and his notation lists the date as Friday, June 13, 1980. See G.C. Exhs. 9-10, respectively.

[21] Hillen's notation on the card lists the date as April 1, 1980. He testified that Hoy signed and returned the authorization card to him on July 1, 1980, but that he inadvertently wrote down "4/1/80" instead of "7/1/80." See G.C. Exh. 11.

[22] The notation on Leiblie's authorization card indicates that Representatives Mark Perrone and Shaun Barclay of the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, the Union's international parent organization, were also present at the time Leiblie signed and returned the card to Hillen.

[23] The notation by Hillen on Grey's card indicates that International Union Representative Mark Peronne was present when she signed and returned her authorization card to Hillen.

[24] See G.C. Exhs. 9-16, respectively.

[25] See G.C. Exhs. 17-21, respectively.

[26] Ruth Gray testified that when Hillen gave her an authorization card to sign he said that, "they were getting a majority of the cards to have a union, you know, in the store." She stated that it was her understanding from what Hillen had said that if the Union got in it would negotiate a "regular contract" with the Respondent on behalf of the employees.

[27] Barclay testified that when the signed authorization cards were returned to him he noted on them the date, time of day, place, and identity of the employee who had signed and given him the card.

[28] The notation on Hertzog's authorization card indicates that International Union Representative Mark Perrone was also present when she signed and returned her card to Barclay.

[29] Robinson testified that when she signed the authorization card on September 10, 1980, Barclay "just said how we needed to get—we were signing the cards to get the majority. And then we could go on from there, you know. We had to get a majority.

dated September 10, 1980; and Mary Tignor, whose card is dated September 10, 1980.[30] The authorization cards of Hertzog, Straw, and Hubbard have the Union's heading while the cards of Robinson and Tignor are entitled, "Retail Clerk's International Union, affiliated with AFL–CIO–CLC."

Hillen testified that, by letter dated January 16, 1981, the Union notified the Respondent that it represented a majority of the Respondent's Woods Chapel employees and requested recognition as the employee's "exclusive bargaining representative, and bargaining."[31] In response, according to the testimony of Union President Davis, the Respondent, by letter dated January 22, 1981, advised the Union that it disbelieved the Union's claim of majority representation, declined to recognize and bargain with the Union, and expressed its position that "only through the process of a [Board] secret election" could the employees' rights under the Act and their wishes concerning representation be "properly expressed."[32]

Hillen testified that on Tuesday, January 20, 1981, subsequent to the Union's receipt of the Respondent's letter refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union, he, Shaun Barclay, and Mark Perrone visited the Noland Road store and Hillen asked Gerald E. Fisher if they could speak to him about the Union's letter demanding recognition and bargaining. Hillen stated that Fisher referred them to his attorney, Rick Noble, who was "handling everything" and stated that he was going on vacation and that they should "Talk to my attorney," whereupon Fisher left the store. Hillen continued that Fisher had indicated that Noble would contact the Union and towards the end of that week, Friday, January 23, 1981, the Union received a telephone call from James R. Willard, an attorney, but since Hillen was not in the office at the time, no discussion ensued. Hillen added that he was successful in contacting Willard by telephone on the following Monday, January 26, 1981, and Willard informed Hillen that he was now representing the Respondent. Hillen related that he told Willard that the Union represented a majority of the Respondent's employees at its Woods Chapel store and asked Willard, "[H]ow about a card check?" According to Hillen, Willard responded, "Well, I won't give you a card check. But I won't fight you too hard if you go to an election."

Hillen testified that the Union filed its "Petition" with the Board on January 30, 1981, seeking an election and certification as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit.[33] On February 13, 1981, the Respondent and the Union, by counsel, executed a "Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election." The appropriate bargaining unit stipulated there was,

> All employees employed at the Employer's facility located at 1201 North Woods Chapel, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department employees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.[34]

The evidence also shows that Hillen issued a letter dated February 10, 1981, to the Respondent's employees at the Woods Chapel store in which the employees were notified that a picket line would be instituted "in front of Jerry's United Super in Blue Springs" for "advertising to the public that Jerry's United Super is not providing you with a union contract . . . continued to refuse to recognize Local 782 in spite of the fact that a majority of the employees have signed authorization cards . . . . This picket line, hopefully, will influence Jerry's United Super to give us recognition or at least bring about a speedy election . . . ."[35] Additionally, the Union sent a letter dated Febuary 18, 1981, to the Woods Chapel store employees notifying them that the "Certification Upon Consent Election" stipulation had been approved by the Board and that an election would soon be held negating the need for a picket line. The employees were also informed that the Union had "uncovered some additional information which leads me to believe the store in which you work should already be Union according to the Federal Labor Law," and that the Union had filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board against the Respondent that might "slow our progress to get an election."[36]

2. The operation of the Woods Chapel, Noland Road, and Chrysler stores

The evidence shows that although the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores are owned by separate corporations, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super and Jerry's United Super, Inc., respectively, Gerald E. Fisher owns all the stock in both corporations, and the corporate officers thereof are the same, with Fisher being the president, treasurer, and director, and his wife, Charlene Fisher, the vice president. Regarding the third "Fisher family United Super" store, the Chrysler store, the evidence discloses that although Gerald E. Fisher contributed all the capital investment needed to open this retail grocery store, his son, Richard Fisher, is the president of the corporate owner thereof, Fisher's United Super, Inc.[37] Moreover, Jerry Lee Fisher, another son of Gerald E. Fisher and "co-manager" of the Woods Chapel store, testified that all the business licenses necessary and required to operate the Woods Chapel grocery store were issued to Gerald E. Fisher and he assumed that this was also true of the Noland Road and Chrysler stores as well.[38] The Woods

Chapel store is managed by Jerry Lee Fisher and Gary Minton, the Noland Road store by William Kent Fisher, and the Chrysler store by Richard Fisher.[39] According to the testimony of Jerry Lee Fisher, the Respondent owns the equipment, fixtures, and inventory of the Woods Chapel store and holds the licenses required to operate this grocery store.[40]

3. The role of Gerald E. Fisher in the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores

The testimony concerning the role of Gerald E. Fisher in the management and operation of these stores tended to be primarily limited to the Woods Chapel store and was somewhat conflicting in nature between the witnesses for the Respondent and the General Counsel. Jerry Lee Fisher, a witness for the Respondent, testified that although his father, Gerald E. Fisher, owns all the stock of the Woods Chapel store, he receives no salary therefrom. He stated, "From mid-1980 up to the present time [Gerald E. Fisher] does very little at Woods Chapel United Super. He does show up there occasionally. He goes up to an office upstairs that we have—that we use jointly."[41] Jerry Lee Fisher continued that Gerald E. Fisher "had nothing to do with the hiring of any employees there at Woods Chapel," nor is his father "involved any longer" in the firing and layoff of employees at Woods Chapel. He recounted that he and Minton set the wage rates for employees and discuss this with Gerald E. Fisher "after we've already made the adjustments, we notify him of what we've done."[42]

Jerry Lee Fisher testified that the Respondent had a hospital insurance program for its employees with Connecticut General but that he became unhappy with it and changed to coverage with Bankers Life of New York, adding disability coverage for the employees under this new plan. He stated that after the change in plans was made, he told his father, Gerald E. Fisher, about it, "I had told him that I felt we needed to do that for the people." According to Fisher his father responded, "[I]f that's what you think we ought to do, then go ahead and do it, you know."[43]

Fisher also related that he had decided to discharge the Respondent's labor counsel, Rick Noble, and on January 22 or 23, 1981, he advised Noble of this decision. He added that he then hired Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne, Esqs., to represent the Respondent in its labor relations.[44] Although it can be reasonably inferred from the record evidence that Noble represented Gerald E. Fisher concerning labor relations at both the Noland Road and Woods Chapel stores until January 1981, subsequently the law firm of Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne, Esqs., represented only the Woods Chapel store. Fisher did not know who represented the Noland Road and Chrysler stores thereafter.

In summing up his testimony concerning the role of his father, Gerald E. Fisher, in the operation of the Woods Chapel store, Jerry Lee Fisher testified,

> As far as day to day procedures or, you know, how the store runs, dad doesn't take any active role. I advise him of what decisions Gary and I make. And, you know, I guess if he doesn't like it, he'll let me know he doesn't like it. But, you know, I make the final decisions. He doesn't ever reverse a decision that I've made.[45]

Fisher also acknowledged that his father had the authority to remove him as comanager of the Woods Chapel store if he so desired.

Comanager of the Woods Chapel store, Gary Minton, testified that he reports any "fall-off" of business to Gerald E. Fisher, as well as store damage, major equipment failure, and replacement. He stated that he had reported Cathy Choates' layoff to Fisher when and after this occurred, more about which will be set forth.

[39] Jerry Lee Fisher used the term "owner-manager" in his testimony describing the relationship of the Fisher brothers to the respective stores that they manage. There is no evidence in the record, however, other than this, that Jerry Lee Fisher or William Kent Fisher have any ownership interest in the Woods Chapel or Noland Road stores, respectively, albeit as previously noted, Richard Fisher is the president of the corporate entity that owns the Chrysler store, Fisher's United Super, Inc. If anything, the evidence clearly shows that the actual owner of the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores, and possibly the Chrysler store as well, is their father, Gerald E. Fisher. Additionally, almost all of the evidence submitted in this proceeding centered on the operation of the Woods Chapel store and its interaction, actual and/or alleged, with the Noland Road store.

[40] As indicated before, however, Fisher also testified on cross-examination that the required licenses are all in the name of Gerald E. Fisher.

[41] Both Jerry Lee Fisher and Gary Minton testified that they also use this office on occasion, and he, Minton, his father, Gerald E. Fisher, and Robert Leiblie, the Woods Chapel assistant manager, all have keys to the office.

[42] Gary Minton testified that as manager of the Woods Chapel store he reports to Gerald E. Fisher such things as the "fall-off" of business, layoff of employees, store damage, and major store equipment failure and replacement.

[43] Although Fisher maintained that he had effectuated the health plan coverage change before he discussed it with his father, Gerald E. Fisher, a careful reading of his testimony indicates that he may well have sought his father's acquiescence in the change before it was implemented, not after.

[44] Fisher's testimony on cross-examination concerning the hiring of this law firm was evasive and contradictory. He, at first, testified that he had contacted the law firm of Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne, Esqs. He then testified that he could not recall whether it was he or his father, Gerald E. Fisher, who contacted them. He then changed his testimony when questioned by the administrative law judge, stating that he had made the decision to, and actually did, contact this law firm to retain them as labor counsel. The record reflects that counsel for the Respondent, James E. Willard, Esq., of this law firm, submitted a "position paper" to the Board during the investigative segment of this case and a copy was sent to Gerald E. Fisher, not Jerry Lee Fisher. I am unconvinced that Willard admittedly sent copies of correspondence to the Union, and the Board to Gerald E. Fisher instead of Jerry Lee Fisher, mistakenly or inadvertently, as he asserted at the hearing. Willard impressed me as being intelligent and a highly experienced and able labor attorney, and I believe copies of such correspondence and documents were sent to Gerald E. Fisher because he was still the owner and chief executive officer of the Woods Chapel store, and until the Respondent realized that it might be faced with a "Kroger" type issue in this case, a prerequisite thereof being the "single employer" issue, as will be discussed.

[45] Fisher testified that his father calls the Woods Chapel store "three, four, five times a week" to find out how much money was taken in that day.

Robert Leiblie,[46] assistant manager of the Woods Chapel store and a witness for the General Counsel, testified that Gerald E. Fisher appeared at the Woods Chapel store "many times . . . maybe every other day, once a day. It would just depend on what he comes down there for. He was there a lot though." He stated that Fisher would come to the store during the morning or afternoon hours, would speak to various employees, inquire about the day's business at the "courtesy booth" and then proceed to "his office upstairs right next to the deli eating area," remaining in the store anywhere from "five or ten minutes to a couple of hours." According to the evidence, this office is located on a second floor level above the liquor shop and while Leiblie characterized the office as being that of Gerald E. Fisher's, as did other witnesses, Leiblie acknowledged that Jerry Lee Fisher also uses his father's office at times and that Gary Minton uses it also, but only "Once in a great while."[47] Leiblie continued, "I've seen [Gerald E. Fisher] pay bills before, going over the daily record, you know, what we did yesterday and comparing it with last year or with the Noland Road store. You know, a number of different things." Leiblie added that he had observed Jerry Lee Fisher, Kent Fisher, Richard Fisher,[48] Gary Minton, and the "Fleming representative" talking to Gerald E. Fisher at various times in Fisher's office.[49]

Marvin Paul and Cathy Choate, witnesses for the General Counsel, also testified that they had seen Gerald E. Fisher at the Woods Chapel store. Paul, a former employee,[50] related that Fisher would come to the Woods Chapel store "about every other day in the afternoon," talk to some of the employees, and then "he would go upstairs to his office . . . . And he would pay bills and stuff." Paul stated that he had never seen either Jerry Lee Fisher or Gary Minton use Fisher's upstairs office, although on occasion Gerald E. Fisher would summon Minton to his office over the public address system at the store. Cathy Choate testified that while employed as a checker at both the Woods Chapel and, thereafter, the Noland Road store, and although she usually worked the night shift, she had observed Gerald E. Fisher "a couple of times a week" at these stores when she sometimes worked earlier hours. Choate added that Fisher used the upstairs office at the Woods Chapel store on these occasions and the main office at the Noland Road store. She recounted that she had never seen Jerry Lee Fisher use his father's office at the Woods Chapel store.

Another of the General Counsel's witnesses, Ruth Gray, testified that she had seen Gerald E. Fisher at the Woods Chapel store, "maybe every other day, maybe two or three times a week. Sometimes he's not there for three or four days." She stated that when he is present at the store, "He usually stops by the service desk and then he comes through and picks up bills and he goes upstairs. Well he takes my liquor bills." Gray related that at various times while Gerald E. Fisher was in his office at the store she has observed Richard and Kent Fisher, Gary Minton, and the "Fleming people" up there with him. She added that she has also seen Gary Minton using Fisher's office at times when Fisher was not present at the Woods Chapel store.

Leiblie testified that sometime in February or March 1981, Jerry Lee Fisher told him that consideration was being given to making Gary Minton a "floating manager" to oversee or manage the operations of the Woods Chapel, Noland Road, and Chrysler stores. He stated that Fisher said that if this should happen Leiblie would then become comanager of the Woods Chapel store along with Fisher.[51] Apropos of this, Minton testified that he often visits the other stores owned by Gerald E. Fisher, especially the Noland Road store, and discusses with the other store managers business problems, although he was never instructed to do so by anybody. In this connection, Mary Lee Tignor, employed by the Respondent in its Woods Chapel store bakery and deli departments[52] since December 3, 1979, testified that sometime in February 1981, Gary Minton had informed her that "eventually he would probably become floating manager and go between the three stores."[53]

Additionally, Marvin Paul testified that in or about February 1981, while he, another employee, Ruth Gray, and Gerald E. Fisher were together in the liquor department of the Woods Chapel store, Fisher told them that he had taken $20,000 from the Noland Road store to help finance the new Woods Chapel store and that, "[I]f any department didn't carry its own weight, he would shut them down because he wasn't going to go in the hole for anybody." Ruth Gray testified similarly regarding this conversation.

4. Interrelations of operations

Concerning employee interchange between the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores, the evidence shows that several employees were transferred from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store to staff the new store when it opened for business on December 5, 1979. Gary Minton was transferred to the Woods Chapel store as manager from his position as manager of the Noland Road store.[54] Robert Leiblie became assistant manager

[46] Leiblie testified that he was originally hired as a clerk at the Noland Road store prior to December 3, 1979, and that on or about November 26 or 27, 1979, he was offered the assistant manager's position at the new Woods Chapel store in a meeting attended by Gerald E. Fisher, Kent, Richard Fisher, and Gary Minton, effective December 3, 1979.

[47] The evidence shows that there is another office located at the Woods Chapel store in the "courtesy booth," which is used regularly by comanagers Gary Minton and Jerry Lee Fisher as their office.

[48] Leiblie testified that over a period of approximately "six months to a year," he had seen Richard Fisher at the Woods Chapel store with Gerald E. Fisher about "twenty times, maybe less . . . . It's hard telling if he's doing business . . . or if he's in there just as a visit or what."

[49] Leiblie related that when the Woods Chapel store first opened for business, the Fisher's, father and sons, met regularly once weekly and that "later on as the store got going more on itself," they met once monthly.

[50] Paul was hired by Gary Minton as a baker at the Woods Chapel store in April 1980 and worked there until February 28, 1981, when he was laid off.

[51] Although Jerry Lee Fisher testified, he did not deny this testimony.

[52] The Woods Chapel store is operated as a retail grocery store and supermarket with various departments, i.e., bakery, produce, dairy, meat, liquors, and deli.

at Woods Chapel from his former position as a clerk at the Noland Road store. Dale Hunt, a butcher employed at the Noland Road store, was transferred to the Woods Chapel store, I assume in the same capacity. Dale Minton, Gary Minton's son, transferred over to the Woods Chapel store from the Noland Road store presumably when his father did so. Noland Road store employees Betty Hoy and David Lindsey were also transferred to the Woods Chapel store along with the others listed above.

Additionally, Mary Lee Tignor was brought over from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store in and around the same time as the other above employees. Tignor testified that during the summer and early fall of 1979 while she was still employed at the Noland Road store, Gerald E. Fisher spoke to her about working at the new Woods Chapel store when it opened for business because he needed experienced employees there. Tignor stated that subsequently, in October 1979, Fisher again urged her to transfer to the Woods Chapel store and when she asked him, "What if I don't want to go down there," Fisher told her that, "I didn't have but one choice because they needed people down there that knew, you know, an employee that knew the bakery and the deli operation."

Cathy Choate[55] testified that she had been hired by Gary Minton, as a "checker" on April 1, 1980, for the Woods Chapel store. She related that subsequently Minton asked her to work at the Noland Road store to fill in for an employee on 90-day leave of absence. Choate related that since the Union represented employees at the Noland Road store and that employees had to join the Union after 30 days, Minton wanted her to work there for 30 days, after which she would return to the Woods Chapel store and another employee would be sent to the Noland Road store for the next 30 days, after which Choate would fill in again at Noland Road for the last 30 days. Choate stated that she began work at the Noland Road store on June 3, 1980, and after the 30-day period was up she was told to continue working there and was instructed to join the Union, which she did, becoming a permanent employee at the Noland Road store, where she is still employed.[56]

Regarding this, Gary Minton testified that Choate was employed at the Woods Chapel store, "about March or April, April or May [1980], she worked about two months," and because "business was down" in and around this time and Choate was "low on the seniority list," Minton considered laying her off. Minton stated that he constantly keeps in touch with employees at the Noland Road store,[57] since he trained and is friendly with some of them, and had learned about a job opening there due to an employee's illness requiring a leave of absence. According to Minton, when he told Choate "probably the day before," that she was being laid off effective May 24, 1980, he also advised her about the job opportunity at the Noland Road store and suggested that she contact Kent Fisher and see if he would hire her. He added that Choate acted on his advice and started working at the Noland Road store, "I would say two or three days at the soonest" after she was laid off at the Woods Chapel store.[58]

Sondra Hertzog,[59] employed by the Respondent as a "checker" at the Woods Chapel store, testified that shortly after the store opened for business in December 1979, a "sacker" working there was transferred to the Noland Road store because "they needed some help up there." However, Hertzog could not remember the employee's name. Hertzog continued that in March or April 1981, an employee named John Pettit, a "sacker," was transferred from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store for "two or three days, the weekend or something" to replace an employee named "Andy." Another of the Respondent's employees, Barbara Robinson[60] testified that Pettit, a "checker" from the Noland Road store, was brought to the Woods Chapel store to work there "just for a few days." Regarding Pettit, employee Ruth Gray also testified similarly relating that in February or March, 1981, a "sacker" at the Woods Chapel store was scheduled to be absent and an employee from the Noland Road store named "John" was transferred to the Woods Chapel store to fill in for the absent employee "for two or three days."

Concerning the above employee transfers, Minton, while acknowledging that the Respondent had employed a "sacker" named "Andy" at the Woods Chapel store and that John Pettit had been employed as a "sacker" at the Noland Road Store, disputed as "unlikely" that Pettit had been temporarily transferred to the Woods Chapel

Fisher, who had worked at the Noland Road store for approximately 1 month, became comanager with Minton of the Woods Chapel store. Previously, Jerry Lee Fisher had worked for the Kansas City Power and Light Company for "nine and a half years."

[55] Cathy Choate also appears in the record as Cathy McWilliams.

[56] Choate testified that when she transferred from the Woods Chapel store to the Noland Road store she was not required to fill out a new employment application since the transfer was supposed to be temporary.

[57] Minton testified that he visits regularly with Kent Fisher, manager of the Noland Road store, Bill Englebrecht, the assistant manager, and Earl Holland, the meat department manager "probably two or three times a week," and also speaks to them over the telephone "once or twice" weekly. Minton added that he usually talks to Kent Fisher and Englebrecht about business problems and with Englebrecht about personal things since they have been friends for some time.

[58] Choate denied that Minton had ever told her that she was being laid off. However, Choate acknowledged on cross-examination that business at the Woods Chapel store had fallen off in and around the time of her transfer to the Noland Road store, which resulted in a reduction of her hours of work at Woods Chapel from "around 20" hours weekly to 10 hours weekly since she was the "most junior checker" among the employees at the store. Moreover, Choate's payroll records at Woods Chapel (R. Exh. 5) reflect that in May 1980, her weekly work hours for 3 weeks of that month fell to 10 hours from the previous month's weekly work hours, ranging from 14 to 23 hours. In the last week in May 1980, just before she left her Woods Chapel store job, Choate worked 20 hours. Choate's payroll record has written thereon the following, "Laid Off Business Down Low on Seniority List." However, while Minton testified that the writing on this record was not his but "possibly" could be that of Jerry Lee Fisher, Fisher never confirmed this in his testimony. In fact, he was never asked about it. I found Minton's testimony regarding Choate's alleged layoff and about her payroll records equivocal and at times evasively guarded; it just did not seem forthright.

[59] Hertzog commenced her employment with the Respondent at the Woods Chapel store when it opened for business in December 1979. She was called as a witness for the General Counsel.

[60] Robinson commenced her employment with the Respondent also at the time the Woods Chapel store opened for business in December 1979. She testified as a witness for the General Counsel.

store from the Noland Road store to fill in as a "sacker," testifying that it was "unlikely that we would bring another sacker down from some place else." His testimony was similar regarding the "sacker" who was transferred temporarily from the Woods Chapel store to the Noland Road store.[61]

5. Other instances of store interaction

Robert Leiblie testified that sometime in March or April 1980, the Woods Chapel store "started transferring bakery goods over to the Noland Road store and to the Chrysler store. And that continued for approximately a year." He stated that the bakery goods were baked on the Woods Chapel premises with the "bulk of it" being sold at the Woods Chapel store and the rest transferred daily to the Noland Road and Chrysler stores for sale there.[62] Marvin Paul and Mary Tignor[63] testified somewhat similarly. Paul related that the baking was done at the Woods Chapel store and the bakery goods then delivered to the Noland Road and Chrysler stores in the approximate proportion of one-third the production to each store, each day, except Sunday. He stated that this continued until February 28, 1981, when he was advised by Minton that he was being laid off because the Noland Road and Chrysler stores were "discontinuing taking bakery goods." He recounted that Mary Tignor "the deli and bakery supervisor" recommended that he call Gerald E. Fisher to ascertain if "he still wanted to have bakery goods delivered to the Noland Road store" presumably to see if a baker's job might again be available for Paul. Paul added that he called Fisher a few days later and asked Fisher "if he was going to continue the bakery goods and Fisher responded, "No, that there were always problems with delivery."

Regarding this, Jerry Lee Fisher testified that the Woods Chapel store had been producing bakery goods for its own retail trade and also for the Noland Road and Chrysler stores until he and Minton decided that there was insufficient profit in this operation because of the problems involving the transfer and delivery of the baked goods to the other stores, whereupon it was discontinued. He stated, > Gary [Minton] and I discussed, you know, that things weren't working out the way they should in the best interest of all three stores, you know. It was hurting everybody. We just ceased to transfer bakery goods to other stores.

I noted that while, throughout his testimony, Jerry Lee Fisher sought to create the impression that his father, Gerald E. Fisher, had no input concerning important and significant changes or innovations instituted in the operation of the Woods Chapel store, yet his testimony ensuing after the above quote is instructive, significant, and compelling

> Q. And you're telling the Administrative Law Judge here that you didn't go to your father first, before you implemented that decision?
> A. I told him what I would like to do and he said, you know, "If that's what you need to do, fine, go ahead and do it."
> Q. And then you implemented it, right?
> A. Yes, sir.[64]

Moreover, Fisher testified that the Respondent purchases items from the Noland Road and Chrysler stores for sale at Woods Chapel in instances where the Woods Chapel store has run short, or when one of the other stores is overstocked with an item, i.e., meat or chicken, produce, etc., and the Woods Chapel store will purchase the overstocked item at cost. He continued that the Respondent also makes such purchases from other United Super stores in the area, although such transactions constitute only a small percentage of the Respondent's purchases and sales, less than 1 percent.[65]

Additionally, Leiblie testified that in the early part of 1981 he was told by Jerry Lee Fisher that consideration was being given to the transfer of "cash registers that we've got at our store [Woods Chapel] over to the Noland Road store and Woods Chapel buying scanners." Also, Ruth Gray,[66] the Woods Chapel store's "liquor manager," testified that in March 1981, at Minton's request, she assisted Richard Fisher in "setting up" a liquor department at the Chrysler store. Gray added that Minton had advised her that Richard Fisher would pay her out of Chrysler store funds for the day she had worked there since this had been her scheduled day off.

6. Other evidence

Union President Davis testified that he had negotiated on behalf of the Union a new collective-bargaining agreement with representatives of an "employer's group," which included Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) effective May 10, 1981, through March 1984. Davis related that after the agreement had been signed by all the parties on July 15, 1981, the Union found "some errors in the deli in reference to the rates of pay" and Davis contacted Gerald E. Fisher about this in July 1981. Davis recounted that he met with Fisher at the Noland Road store, at which time Fisher introduced him to his son, William Kent Fisher, and said, "One of these days I'm going to get completely out of it." Rates of pay for two employees, John Woods and Genevieve Jacobs, were agreed on by Davis and Gerald E. Fisher at this meeting.[67] The evidence shows that during these above negotiations the Noland Road store and the Chrysler store were represented by the law firm of Stinson, Mag & Fizzell, Esqs.

[61] Although Minton maintained that part-time employees at the respective stores would be used to fill in for employees out for one reason or another, it should be noted that he kept using phrases in his testimony such as, "I don't recall him coming down and working" and "It doesn't seem likely," when testifying about the interchange of "sacker" employees between the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores.

[62] Leiblie testified that the Woods Chapel store kept 50 percent of the baked goods for store sale and sent 30 percent of the bakery goods to the Noland Road store, and 20 percent to the Chrysler store.

[63] Mary Tignor testified that bakery goods were baked at the Woods Chapel store and, starting in the spring or summer of 1980 until February 1981, part of the production was shipped to the Noland Road and Chrysler stores. According to Tignor, the Chrysler store would submit orders regarding how much of the bakery goods it wanted, and the Woods Chapel employees would themselves "guess" at the Noland Road store needs and supply it. Employees at the Woods Chapel bakery department would record what bakery goods were to be shipped and "Gary Minton would take care of it."

[64] Also see fn. 43 as another example of such testimony by Jerry Lee Fisher.

[65] According to Fisher, the Respondent purchases dried flowers for resale at the Woods Chapel store from Raytown United Super.

[66] Gray related that when Minton hired her at the time of the opening of the Woods Chapel store, he stated to her that "within six months there'd probably be a Union."

Furthermore, the General Counsel introduced into evidence a newspaper advertisement from the Kansas City Star dated Sunday, October 4, 1981.[68] "United Super" is prominently displayed in the lower right-hand corner of the advertisement. This advertisement, approximately three-quarters of an average newspaper page in size, features a picture of Kent Fisher, Gerald E. Fisher[69] and Richard Fisher,[70] largely displayed in full length, posing side by side and holding canned goods and produce.[71] Listed in the advertisement are their names and underneath the picture the following: "Jerry's United Super, 35th & Noland Road, Indep., Mo.; Jerry's United Super, 1201 N. Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Mo.; Fisher's United Super, 2604 S. Chrysler Ave., Indep., Mo." There also appears therein a copy extolling the variety and quality of the grocery products obtainable at the "independent United Super store," with the use of the words "we" and "our" throughout the text. Jerry Lee Fisher testified, however, that the Respondent does not usually jointly advertise with the Noland Road or Chrysler stores, but does advertise independently the Woods Chapel store in the "Pony Express," a "separate paper" in Blue Springs, Missouri, in which only the Woods Chapel store appears.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The single employer issue

The threshold issue presented is whether the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (Woods Chapel store), and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) together constitute a "single employer" as alleged by the General Counsel and the Charging Party or, as contended by the Respondent, each is a separate, distinct, and individual employer.[72] As will become clear from the discussion of this issue that follows, the question of "single employer" status is a close one based on the facts present in this case.

As the court stated in United Telegraph Workers v. NLRB, 571 F.2d 667 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cert. denied 99 S.Ct. 101:

> As in other areas of the law, corporations normally are treated as separate entities under the Labor Act. The Board treats multiple corporations as a single employer only when it is established that the nominally separate corporations are in fact operated as a single integrated business enterprise.[73]

In Malcolm Boring Co., 259 NLRB 597, 600-601 (1981), the Board affirmed the decision of an administrative law judge in which the tests for "single employer" were set forth as follows:[74]

> In Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians Local Union 1264, IBEW v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), the Supreme Court held that in determining whether enterprises constitute a single employer: "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership."[16] Though the Board and the courts have not always agreed on how to apply the standards enunciated by the Supreme Court, the decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO [South Prairie Construction Company and Peter Kiewat Sons' Co.] v. N.L.R.B., 518 F.2d 1040 (1967), appears to be controlling. In that case the court of appeals reversed the Decision of the Board in Peter Kiewat Sons' Co. and South Prairie Construction Co., 206 NLRB 562 (1973). Part of the circuit court's decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO, 425 U.S. 800 (1976). The Board had made two separate findings. The first was that two entities did not constitute a single employer and the second was that each entity had a separate appropriate bargaining unit for collective-bargaining purposes. The court of appeals disagreed and found both a single employer and a single unit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed that part of the court of appeals' decision which found that the two entities were a single employer and reversed and remanded to the court of appeals that part of the decision which related to the unit question.[17] As the Supreme Court has affirmed the circuit Courts' decision with regard to the single employer,

[72] The Respondent also asserts, however, that if these employers are found to be a "single employer," then consideration must be given to the inclusion of Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store) within the scope of this "single employer" status. It should be noted that the complaint makes no mention of Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store). Moreover, although the General Counsel stated at the hearing that,

> [T]he Fishers, although they have three stores and the Employer's position is they are all separately run, in fact consult together and that there is common management not only between the Jerry's United Super at Noland Road and Woods chapel but also the other store at Chrysler.

in her brief she maintains that the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (Woods Chapel store) and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) are a "single employer," as does the complaint.

the language of the circuit court is of particular importance. That circuit court held [518 F.2d at 1045–46]:

Guidelines for "Single Employer" Status

In Radio Union v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255 . . . (1965), the Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion affirming "a single employer" holding below, said:

> "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership."

"The court cited several NLRB decisions including one affirmed in Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 . . . (1965). In Sakrete, the Ninth Circuit stated, at 907:

> "[E]ven if the substantial evidence shows interrelationship of operations, centralized control of labor relations, or common management only at the executive or top level, we do not agree that this precludes application of the "single employer"concept."

It pointed out that these three criteria "deal not with power and authority, as such, but with its exercise," and that such criteria, "on any level, are considerations in addition to the factor of common ownership or financial control."[8]

Although the Supreme Court in Radio Union, supra, commented that the record in that case was more than adequate to show that all of the four "controlling criteria" were present, it does not appear that all four criteria must be present. In one of the NLRB cases cited, Canton, Carpets, Inc., 125 NLRB 483 (1959), the Board observed that it had on several occasions made a finding of a single employer status in the absence of a common labor relations policy, and even when it had been affirmatively shown that each of two corporations held to be a single employer established its own labor relations policy. In another of the NLRB cases cited, V.I.P. Radio, Inc., 128 NLRB 113 (1960), the Board found that there was little or no employee interchange; but 90 percent stock ownership of the second corporation, the same officers and directors, and centralized control of "general labor policy" and operations resulted in a "single employer" holding. In still another cited NLRB case, Overton Markets, Inc., 142 NLRB 615 (1963), the Board noted, at 619, that the circumstances were not "characteristic of the arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."[9] Its conclusion that there was a "single employer" for purposes of the Act rested on consideration of "all the circumstances" of the case.[76]

From the foregoing, we conclude that "single employer" status, for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, depends upon all the circumstances of the case, that not all of the "controlling criteria" specified by the Supreme Court need be present; that, in addition to the criterion of common ownership or financial control, the other criteria, whether or not they are present at the top level of management, are "controlling" indicia of the actual exercise of the power of common ownership or financial control and that the standard for evaluating such exercise of power is whether, as a matter of substance, there is the "arms length relationship found among unintegrated companies."

Moreover, in Gerace Construction, 193 NLRB 645 (1971), the Board stated:

> A critical factor in determining whether separate legal entities operate as a single employing enterprise is the degree of common control of labor relations policies.[1] Thus, the Board has found common ownership not determinative where requisite common control was not shown,[2] and the Board has held with court approval that such common control must be actual or active, as distinguished from potential control.[3]

[17] On remand the Board issued a Supplemental Decision reported at 231 NLRB 76 (1977) in which it noted that the Supreme Court had affirmed the circuit court's finding that the two entities were a single employer. The Board reconsidered the single-unit question and concluded that, even though the entities were a single employer, separate units were appropriate.

[8] In a later decision, N.L.R.B. v. Welcome-American Fertilizer Co., 443 F.2d 19, 21 (9th Cir. 1971), the Ninth Circuit, citing Sakrete, said that no one of the four criteria is controlling.

The record evidence shows that although the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (Woods Chapel store) and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) are separate legal entities with operations at different store locations approximately 8 miles apart, they are commonly owned by Gerald E. Fisher and have the same corporate officers and directors.[78] Additionally, each Company maintains its own separate bank account, account books, and payrolls. Although both use the services of the "Fleming Corporation" for accounting purposes, so do all the other 20 to 30 United Super stores in the metropolitan Kansas City area, and separate records are kept by Fleming for each individual Company serviced.

Moreover, except for the initial transfer of managerial and other experienced employees from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store, when the new store opened for business in December 1979,[79] there has been little employee interchange between the two stores.[80] It also should be noted that Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) continued to make contributions into the Union's health and welfare and pension funds, and to deduct union dues payments on behalf of several of the employees who had been transferred from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store when the latter opened for business in December 1979 until May 24, and March 1980, respectively, although they were now employees of the Woods Chapel store.[81] These employees also retained their seniority when transferred to the new store.

As previously stated, a critical factor in determining whether separate legal entities are in fact a single employing enterprise is the degree of common control of labor relations policies.[82] Although the Respondent admits in its brief that "Gerald E. Fisher was actively involved in labor relations policies at Woods Chapel in the fall of 1979 before the store opened. This is indicated by his October 2 meeting with Earl Davis which produced an 'agreement' involving Woods Chapel," the Respondent also asserts that, "There is no showing, moreover, that this early involvement of Gerald E. Fisher which occurred more than a year before, continued through the critical events in this case." I do not concur with the Respondent's latter assessment of the evidence.

Initially it is clear from the evidence that Gerald E. Fisher maintains ultimate operational control over both the Noland Road and Woods Chapel stores. Furthermore, the record shows that the telegram, dated April 29, 1980, sent by the Respondent to the Union repudiating the October 2, 1979 "'agreement' between them as being unlawful under the Act, was signed by Gerald E. Fisher. The Respondent in its brief asserts that actually Fisher's son, Jerry Lee Fisher, was the moving party behind the repudiation." The evidence, however, does not support this assertion. The fact that the telegram was signed by Gerald E. Fisher and not by Jerry Lee Fisher raises a strong inference that Gerald E. Fisher was the one who made the decision set forth concerning this "agreement." Moreover, while testifying about the meeting between his father, himself, and Rick Noble, "our counsel," during which Noble informed them of the "illegality," of the October 2, 1979 "agreement," Jerry Lee Fisher never actually stated that he had made this decision or influenced its making in any way. He acknowledged awareness that the telegram was going to be sent, but denied sending it himself.[83]

[78] Gerald E. Fisher owns all the stock of both corporations, with Fisher being the president, treasurer, and director, while his wife, Charlene Fisher, is the vice president and secretary of these companies. The evidence also shows that Gerald E. Fisher contributed all the capital investment in Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store) although the record does not disclose whether he owns the stock of that corporation, or is an officer or director there. Richard Fisher, one of his sons, appears to be the president of Fisher's United Super, Inc. (See Jt. Exh. 3.)

[79] The Board has held that such initial transfer of employees in and of itself has "no significance and merely indicates, at most, where potential control might reside." See Poole's Warehousing, 158 NLRB 1281 (1966). Also see Western Union Corp., supra; Gerace Construction, supra.

[80] Cathy Choate was transferred, ultimately as a permanent employee, from the Woods Chapel to the Noland Road store, and two "sackers" were interchanged between these stores on a temporary basis to fill in for absent employees. Although the testimony of these employee interchanges was contradictory and disputed as between the witnesses for the General Counsel and those called by the Respondent, I credit the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses as to this. Both Sondra Hertzog and Barbara Robinson were still employed at the Respondent's Woods Chapel store at the time they testified and as employees of the Respondent, their testimony, somewhat adverse to the Respondent's position, was given at risk of possible economic reprisal, including loss of employment or promotion, and thus not likely to be false. See Parkview Acres Convalescent Center, 255 NLRB 1164 (1981); Shop-Rite Supermarket, 231 NLRB 500 (1977); Georgia Rug Mills, 131 NLRB 1304 (1961). Although Cathy Choate was employed by Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) at the time she testified in this proceeding, the fact that Gerald E. Fisher owns both the Noland Road and Woods Chapel stores would reasonably make the foregoing applicable to her as well. Moreover, Minton's testimony concerning this, given on behalf of the Respondent, was equivocal and as a managerial employee of long standing with the Fisher family stores and being considered for a future higher managerial position, that of "floating manager" of all the Fisher stores, he had substantial reason to testify in a favorable manner for the Respondent without regard to the accuracy.

[81] Robert Leiblie, Mary Tignor, and Betty Hoy.

[82] Soule Glass & Glazing Co., supra; Western Union Corp., supra.

[83] Jerry Lee Fisher's testimony concerning his father's involvement in the operation of the Woods Chapel store was at times equivocal, confusing, and contradictory, leading me inexorably to the conclusion that such testimony was given on the basis of supporting the Respondent's allegations and positions rather than as to the actual truth. For example, Fisher testified on direct examination that the Respondent "holds" the licenses required to operate the Woods Chapel store. On cross-examination, however, Fisher admitted that these licenses were acquired by his father and are held in his father's name, Gerald E. Fisher. Additionally, Fisher testified that he and Minton made all the management decisions concerning the operation of the Woods Chapel store without, or before, consulting with his father. However, a careful reading of Jerry Lee Fisher's own testimony casts doubt on this assertion. Regarding the change in the Respondent's employee health insurance program, Fisher testified that he had discussed this with his father, Gerald E. Fisher, after the change had been made, but his testimony reads as follows:

> Q. Did you discuss this with Gerald Fisher?
> A. After I'd made the changes I did. I had told him that I felt like we needed to do that for the people.
> JUDGE KLEIMAN: And what did he say?
> A. He said what—you know if that's what you think we ought to do, then go ahead and do it, you know. [Emphasis added.]

Additionally, the whole tenor of Fisher's testimony gives rise to the strong inference that although his father had never disagreed with his major operational proposals, yet Jerry Lee Fisher had first apprised his father thereof before he implemented them. This is reinforced by Minton's testimony to the effect that he brought to Gerald E. Fisher's attention all major actions that are taken at the Woods Chapel store, i.e., fall-

Continued

Moreover, it was Gerald E. Fisher who met with the Union's representatives at the Noland Road store on January 20, 1981, wherein the Union demanded recognition and bargaining as the collective-bargaining representative of a majority of the Respondent's employees at the Woods Chapel store, with Fisher referring the Union to his attorney for further discussion. It was Gerald E. Fisher who, by letter dated January 22, 1981, advised the Union that the Respondent disbelieved the Union's claim to majority representative of the Woods Chapel employees and refused to recognize and bargain with the Union, recommending instead a Board conducted election. It was Gerald E. Fisher who met with Union President Earl Davis in July 1981 to negotiate wage rates of deli employees at the Noland Road store. And it should also be noted that Gerald E. Fisher, not Jerry Lee Fisher or Gary Minton, was "copied" on letters sent by various legal counsel employed by the Respondent in this matter.[84]

Of particular significance in this case is the undisputed fact that Gerald E. Fisher visits the Woods Chapel store at least every other day at which time, utilizing an office provided and maintained for his use when on the premises,[85] he pays the store bills, reviews the daily sales records, consults with the Woods Chapel store managers and employees, and meets with representatives of the Respondent's food distributors. Certainly the above in no way can be construed as "characteristic of the arms length relationship found among unintegrated companies."

Additionally, from March 1980 until March 1981, the bakery department at the Woods Chapel store produced and delivered bakery goods to the Noland Road and Chrysler stores for sale by these stores in their bakery goods departments. Although this in and of itself has limited significance in determining the issue of single employer status, yet the circumstances surrounding the discontinuance of the transfer of such bakery goods at the other stores impacts on this issue through the role of Gerald E. Fisher in the management and operation of the Woods Chapel store. The Respondent maintains that Fisher played no role at all therein. However, consider the following evidence: According to the uncontradicted testimony of employees Marvin Paul and Ruth Gray, Gerald E. Fisher told them sometime in February 1981 that he would "shut down" any department at the Woods Chapel store that "didn't carry its weight"; Jerry Lee Fisher, while asserting that he and Minton had made the decision to discontinue the production of bakery goods for transfer to and sale by the other Fisher family stores, revealingly testified that he and Minton had discussed that "things weren't working out the way they should in the best interest of all three stores, . . . It was hurting everybody. We just ceased to transfer bakery goods to other stores, . . . Well, everybody was losing money." After acknowledging that Gerald E. Fisher owns all three Fisher family stores, Fisher's testimony appears as follows:

> Q. And you're telling the Administrative Law Judge here that you didn't go to your father first, before you implemented that decision?
> A. I told him what I would like to do and he said, you know, "If that's what you need to do, fine, go ahead and do it."
> Q. And then you implemented it, right?
> A. Yes, sir.

Finally, Paul testified that in February 1981 he was advised by Minton that he was being laid off because the Respondent had decided to discontinue baking goods for the Noland Road and Chrysler stores. He stated that soon after his layoff, he telephoned Gerald E. Fisher and inquired, "if [Fisher] was going to continue the bakery goods," whereupon Fisher replied, "No, that there were always problems with delivery and he—that's all, there were problems with delivery." The implication that Gerald E. Fisher made the decision whether to continue the transference of bakery goods to the other stores, implicit in this answer, is too strong to ignore. From all the above, there arises a strong inference that Gerald E. Fisher actually and realistically makes the major policy decisions for both the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores.[86]

Importantly and applicable to the resolution of the issues here, it should be noted that Gerald E. Fisher did not testify at the hearing. Fisher, being perhaps the person best qualified to testify regarding his role in the management and operation of the various stores, particularly the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores, it seems clear to me that he is in the nature of an indispensable witness. This being true, the failure of the Respondent to call him as a witness can only be construed to mean that had he testified, his testimony would have off of business, replacement of machinery, etc., albeit Minton maintained that he did so only after taking the necessary actions required. The record shows this assertion to be a blatant attempt to bolster the Respondent's position that Gerald E. Fisher had little to do regarding the management and operation of the Woods Chapel store, with the evidence being replete with other instances contradicting this, as will be set forth.

[86] The Respondent asserts in its brief that "Counsel for the General Counsel faces an even more difficult obstacle to her case because there are three corporations involved here, not two." The Respondent correctly states that the burden of proof on the issue of "single employer" status is on the General Counsel, who alleges the existence thereof. However, once the General Counsel has met this burden by offering sufficient proof to show that, as alleged in the complaint, the Respondent (Woods Chapel store) and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) constitute a "single employer," then the Respondent has the obligation of proving that the "single employer" is other than as shown by the General Counsel's proof. The Respondent failed to offer any proof regarding Fisher's United Super, Inc. (Chrysler store). The only facts evidenced in the record concerning this corporation are that at least one of the officers is different than those in connection with the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores, that bakery goods were dispatched to the Chrysler store for sale from the Woods Chapel store, and that Ruth Gray, a Woods Chapel employee, was sent to the Chrysler store to help in establishing a liquor department, for which she received additional compensation from the corporate entity that owns that store.

been adverse to the Respondent's positions on the issues here.[87]

In considering all the above and the close family connection, and the lack of an arm's-length relationship commonly found among unintegrated companies, I find that the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super, and Jerry's United Super, Inc.[88] were and are a single employer for the purposes of collective bargaining.[89]

2. The additional store clause

Having found that the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super (Woods Chapel store) and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) constitute a single employer for purposes of the Act, the next issue to be resolved is whether the "additional store clause" in the collective-bargaining agreement between Jerry's United Super, Inc. and the Union is applicable to the Respondent's Woods Chapel store.

In Kroger Co., 219 NLRB 388 (1975), the Board stated at 388, 389:

> We begin our reconsideration of this case by stating again our acknowledgement, recognized by the court, that the principles of accretion do not resolve the issue presented in this case, inasmuch as the stores in question have a sufficient separate existence to constitute separate appropriate units.[3] We also acknowledge that the Board has held that "additional store clauses" are valid in situations where the Board is satisfied that the employees affected are not denied their right to have a say in the selection of their bargaining representative.[4] . . .
> Interpreting these clauses to mean that an employer can voluntarily recognize a union or demand an election renders them totally meaningless and without effect, for unions need no contract authorization to establish their representation status in a Board-conducted election. However, these clauses can be read to require recognition upon proof of majority status by a union. . . .
> The court examined these clauses in the context of this case and found that they constituted a waiver by Kroger of its right to demand an election in these circumstances. Upon reconsideration we now adopt this view as the only reasonable interpretation which saves these clauses from meaninglessness or from impinging on functions reserved solely to the Board. . . .
> As we have interpreted them, these clauses are contractual commitments by the Employer to forgo its right to resort to the use of the Board's election process in determining the Union's representation status in these new stores. To permit the Employer to claim the very right which it has forgone, perhaps in return for concessions in other areas, would violate the basic national labor policy requiring the Board to respect the integrity of collective-bargaining agreements. . . . The Board has held that an employer may agree in advance of a card count to recognize a union on the basis of a card majority,[7] and we can perceive of no reason why it may not contract with the union to do so in advance of the time the union has commenced organization.

> [7] Fred Snow, Harold Snow and Tom Snow d/b/a Snow & Sons, 134 NLRB 709 (1961).

From the foregoing, it is clear that the Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super, and Jerry's United Super, Inc., as a single employer, is obligated to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in an appropriate unit when the Union represents a majority of the employees in that unit.[90]

[87] From the failure of a party to produce material witnesses obviously within its control without satisfactory explanation, the trier of the facts may draw an inference that such testimony would be unfavorable to that party. See 7-Eleven Food Store, 257 NLRB 108 (1981); Publishers Printing Co., 233 NLRB 1070 (1977); Martin Luther King, Sr. Nursing Center, 231 NLRB 15 (1977); Broadmoor Lumber Co., 227 NLRB 1123 (1977).

[88] The Respondent, in its brief, asserts that any order that may be issued here premised on a finding of "single employer" is unenforceable since Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) was not "named as a respondent or even a party in interest." I do not agree. The complaint itself clearly asserts that the Respondent and "Jerry's United Super, Inc." constitute a single employer, and that the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining includes employees of both corporate owner's stores, the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores. Because Gerald E. Fisher is the owner, president, and treasurer of both corporate entities, it would be incredible to suppose that "fair notice and an opportunity to litigate fully" the question of "single employer" status was not had here. See George C. Shearer Exhibition Delivery Service, 246 NLRB 416 (1979). It should be noted that in the Shearer case, no allegation had been set forth in the complaint regarding the "alter ego" status of the other corporation, while here the complaint distinctly alleges "single employer" status regarding the Respondent and Jerry's United Super, Inc. The Respondent cites the case of NLRB v. Doug Neal Management Co., 620 F.2d 1133 (6th Cir. 1980), in its brief in support of its above contentions. However, a critical distinguishing factor between the cited case and the instant one is the lack of the existence of some connective ownership link that would make notice to one separate corporate entity sufficient notice to the other. In the Doug Neal Management Co. case, the owner of the property was not named as a party therein, but only the company managing the property. In the instant case, however, the Respondent and Jerry's United Super, Inc. are commonly owned and have been found to be a "single employer." This finding of "single employer" status also distinguishes this case from the other case cited by the Respondent in its brief to support its contention, Concrete Haulers, 106 NLRB 690 (1953).

Although the better procedure would have been to name Jerry's United Super, Inc., as also a party here, as is done in most cases involving separate legal entities regarding a "single employer" issue, the failure to do so does not in this case negate the enforceability of any order imposed for the reasons set forth above. See Arundel Corp., 252 NLRB 397 (1980), wherein "single employer" status was found and only one of the corporate entities involved is named in the heading. Also see Jacob Wirth Restaurant, 248 NLRB 191 (1980).

It should be noted that the Respondent and Jerry's United Super, Inc., as a single employer, will also be referred to as the Employer when necessary for purposes of an easier reading of this decision.

3. The Union's majority representation

In Joseph Magnin Co., 257 NLRB 656 (1981), the Board stated:

> In Houston Division of the Kroger Co.,[4] the Board concluded that a contractual clause such as the one by which Respondent is bound constitutes a waiver of an employer's right to insist upon a Board-conducted election when faced with a demand for recognition but that it does not relieve a union of its obligation to provide the employer with proof of its majority status among the employees in the group to be added to the existing unit. By this interpretation of after-acquired-stores provisions, the Board allows parties as much freedom as possible to structure their bargaining relationship through negotiations without permitting them to deny to affected employees the statutory right to select or reject a bargaining representative. Under usual circumstances, therefore, Respondent's statutory duty to recognize the Union as the representative of the Gucci store employees and to apply the current collective-bargaining agreement to the new operation would have arisen only if the Union presented it with concrete evidence of support by a majority of the Gucci store employees.

4. The appropriate unit

The complaint alleges that

> All employees employed at the Employer's facilities located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, and 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department employees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act. The Respondent denies this allegation in its answer and affirmatively states that "the only appropriate unit for the employees of Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. is a unit limited to the store employees at 1201 North Woods Chapel, Blue Springs, Missouri."

That the Woods Chapel store has a sufficient separate existence to constitute a separate appropriate unit is clearly evidenced. However, this does not necessarily mean that a unit limited to the employees at the Woods Chapel store is the only unit that may be found to be appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining. It should be remembered that the Respondent and Jerry's United Super, Inc. have been found to be a single employer. With the Noland Road agreement containing an "after-acquired-store" clause, it becomes evident that the Kroger case is applicable to the instant case. In Kroger, the Board held at 219 NLRB at 389 fn. 6

> While these clauses could be interpreted as an agreement concerning the appropriate unit, we agree with the court that the Board's ultimate right to establish units would render them illusory if they were so construed, since any such agreement which did not coincide with Board Policy would be unenforceable whenever a Board certification was involved.

Therefore, in order that "after-acquired-store" clauses not be rendered totally meaningless and without effect, a unit composed of the employees of an employer's store covered by the collective-bargaining agreement containing the "after-acquired-store" clause and the new store employees must also be appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining unless contrary to Board law or policy. In this connection, the Respondent failed to introduce any evidence to show that the unit alleged by the General Counsel as appropriate was repugnant or contrary to Board law or policy concerning the appropriateness.

Because of the above, I find and conclude that the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act consists of:

> All employees employed at the Employer's facilities located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, and 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department employees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.[91]

5. Unit placement of employees

The parties stipulated at the hearing that there were 33 unit employees at the Woods Chapel store during the relevant period, January 16 through February 13, 1981, these employees being: Cheryl Earlene Baker, Cheri Lynn Borchers, Teresa Borchers, Crysanne Casteel, Michael D. Childs, Cheryl K. Coffman, Mary Kay Cooper, Bernadette Cox, Donald Howard Gann, Ruth Gray, Matthew Hankel, Andy Henry, Sondra Hertzog, Tim Hicks, Betty Hoy, Jeanne Hubbard, Madalene R. Hunt, Brian Kackly, Andy Kreiser, Robert Leiblie; David Lindsey, Dale P. Minton, Marvin Paul, Joan Viola Prine, Barbara Ann Robinson, Jeff Sargent, Donnie Scardino, Sandra A. Straw, Mary Tignor, Greg Warnock, Richard Washburn, Mary Watters and Gregory M. Wochner.[92] Despite this stipulation, the Respondent asserts in its brief that Robert Leiblie is a supervisory and/or managerial employee, and that Mary Tignor and Ruth Gray are managerial employees and they, therefore, should be excluded from the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining.[93]

[91] The Respondent and the Union executed a "Stipulation For Certification Upon Consent Election" in Case 17-RC-9193 on February 13, 1981, in which the unit set forth as appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining was:

> All employees located at the Employer's facility located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department employees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

I do not find that this changes in any way my above finding and conclusion. The Union sought alternately to establish its right to represent the Woods Chapel employees by means of a Board-conducted election as authorized under the Act after the Employer unequivocally refused its recognition request.

a. Robert Leiblie

Robert Leiblie is the assistant manager of the Woods Chapel store. Leiblie testified that his duties include, "Well, you close up and . . . you run a certain department if you've got one. You do the books and you cash checks, you know, do all the running. You solve problems, you know. Basically, that's about it." Minton, the Woods Chapel store manager, testified that Leiblie's "main function is the Dairy Department[94] opening and closing up and generally running the store."[95] Minton related that Leiblie has keys to the store, the cash registers, and the offices, and possesses the combination to the safe at the Woods Chapel store. Comanagers Minton and Jerry Lee Fisher, and Leiblie are the only employees who "open and close" the store. Minton stated that when he and Fisher are absent from the store, Leiblie is then in charge.[96] Leiblie is paid on a salary basis and receives no overtime pay for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week.

Although Minton's testimony concerning whether Leiblie has the authority to discharge and/or discipline employees was at times equivocal,[97] he did testify that he had informed Leiblie that he had such authority and "will take care of" disciplinary matters at Woods Chapel when Minton and Fisher are not present. However, in agreement with Leiblie's testimony, Minton acknowledged that he does all the hiring of employees and that Leiblie "has never disciplined, never issued, say, a written discipline to an employee at the Woods Chapel store," nor terminated any employee therein.

Significantly, Leiblie testified that sometime in the summer of 1980, he had reported to Minton that employee Greg Grace was a "goof-off," taking extensive break periods, and recommended Grace's termination. When Grace appeared for work that day, Minton fired him. Minton testified that he had discharged Grace "within the next two or three minutes" after Leiblie had recommended his dismissal. Concerning this, however, Minton related that Grace "was a problem" employee and that other employees may have complained to him about Grace on prior occasions.

Leiblie also testified that sometime in December 1979, he and Jerry Lee Fisher had questioned employee Rich Washburn about food thefts at the Woods Chapel store and Washburn had apparently implicated other employees involved, whereupon either Fisher or Minton discharged two of these employees with Leiblie having no input in the decision whether to fire the employees or not and which employees were to be discharged.

Moreover Leiblie testified that he never attends any of the management meetings at the Woods Chapel store among Gerald E. Fisher, Jerry Lee Fisher, and Minton. He stated that he brings all his work-related or employee problems to Minton, as do the other employees at the store, "I would say 90 percent of the time it's Gary Minton. You go to him because he makes the schedules out and that's usually what the biggest complaint, you know, you want off or you need a vacation, whatever. But he usually is the one you usually go to." Minton acknowledged that problems concerning the Woods Chapel employees are generally brought to him for resolution.[98] However, Minton also testified, "Well, anytime that we've got a problem with some people that I can't talk to personally when I go home of an evening before they come in or something [Leiblie] takes care of that situation. He'll talk to them and he'll tell them what needs to be done and if there's any discipline. . . . When I'm not there, yes, he will take care of it."[99]

Furthermore, the evidence shows that the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) includes the position of assistant manager in the wage rate schedule. The record also shows that William Englebrecht, the Noland Road store's assistant manager, performs the same duties at that store as does Robert Leiblie, the assistant manager of the Woods Chapel store, and that Englebrecht is included in the bargaining unit as set forth in that agreement, with the Employer making monthly contributions to the Union's health and welfare and pension plan on behalf of Englebrecht, as well as deducting union dues from his paycheck that are remitted to the Union.[100] Additionally, Jerry Lee Fisher testified

[93] The Respondent in its brief maintains that "There are at least four distinct circumstances based on the evidence in this case that cause the Union's apparent majority of 18 of 33 employees to disappear. Each of them stands alone and is an independent basis for finding that no card majority exists." The Respondent discusses this particular one in its brief as the "third reason for finding no majority."

[94] According to Minton, Leiblie's duties in "running the Dairy Department" are to order dairy products, set displays, stock the milk, and "put up cheese." Leiblie is the only employee in this department, although at times other employees will assist him in stocking the shelves, and Leiblie spends between 20–24 hours a week "physically in the Dairy Department."

[95] Minton testified that the Woods Chapel store is open 24 hours a day. He stated that "opening the store," usually done at 7 a.m., consists in, "We open the safe. We pull the two night drawers out of the cash register and we put the four—five register drawers in the registers ready for the day's business. Take the cash out of the bottom of the safe, put it in the cash drawers in the office ready for the day's business. . . . Closing the store consists of counting the daily cash drawers down. Putting the night drawers into the registers. Making up the deposit for the next day. Taking all the money out of the cash drawer and putting it into the safe. Putting the day drawers into the safe. Locking the safe."

[97] When Minton was asked if he had told Leiblie about such authority, Minton at first responded that "[Leiblie] realizes that, I believe, yes." When pressed for a more direct response, Minton then answered, "Yes," that he had actually told Leiblie this.

[99] Minton related that he generally spends from 10–12 hours daily at the Woods Chapel store, 6 days a week, sometimes being present during the day hours and sometimes during the evening hours depending on need, such as truck deliveries of goods. Minton's testimony concerning this was somewhat equivocal.

[100] See Jt. Exh. 1, G.C. Exhs. 28–33, and the testimony of Gary Minton. Moreover, while Leiblie testified that when he worked at the Noland Road store, Dave Lindsey was the assistant manager and that he believed that Lindsey was not "a member of the unit covered by the Collective Bargaining Agreement," there is much evidentiary confusion concerning this. Union President Davis identified Lindsey as "co-manager" of the Noland Road store with Gary Minton prior to the opening of the Woods Chapel store. Leiblie himself initially was not sure if Lindsey was that he had observed a notice posted by Leiblie in the dairy department that stated, "The next clown I catch eating food or drinking milk or whatever in this department, I will fire on the spot."

The Respondent alleges that Robert Leiblie is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and a managerial employee as defined by the Board in case law. The General Counsel and the Charging Party assert that Leiblie is neither a supervisory nor a managerial employee.

Section 2(11) of the Act provides:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or reasonably to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Supervisors are excluded from collective-bargaining units of rank-and-file employees.[101]

The status of supervisor under the Act is determined by an individuals' duties, not by his title or job classification.[102] It is well settled that an employee cannot be transformed into a supervisor merely by the vesting of a title and theoretical power to perform one or more of the enumerated functions in Section 2(11) of the Act.[103] To qualify as a supervisor, it is not necessary that an individual possess all of these powers. Rather, possession of any one of them is sufficient to confer supervisory status.[104] However, although these enumerated functions in Section 2(11) of the Act are to be read in the disjunctive, that Section also "states the requirement of independence of judgment in the conjunctive with what goes before."[105] Thus the individual must consistently display true independent judgment in performing one of the functions in Section 2(11) of the Act. The exercise of some supervisory tasks in a merely "routine," "clerical," "perfunctory," or "sporadic" manner does not elevate an employee into the supervisory ranks.[106] Further, the existence of independent judgment alone will not suffice; "the decisive question is whether [the individual involved has] been found to possess authority to use [his or her] independent judgment with respect to the exercise . . . of some one or more of the specific authorities listed in Section 2(11) of the Act."[107] In short, "some kinship to management, some empathetic relationship between employer and employee must exist before the latter becomes a supervisor for the former."[108] Moreover, in connection with the authority to recommend actions, Section 2(11) requires that the recommendation must be effective.[109]

The Board has also excluded managerial employees from bargaining units of rank-and-file employees, with approval of the Courts.[110] The Board has defined "managerial employees" as those who formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employers, and those who have discretion in the performance of their jobs independent of their employer's established policy.[111] As concerns "managerial employees," the Supreme Court, in NLRB v. Textron, Inc.,[112] stated:

> Of course the specific job title of the employees involved is not in itself controlling. Rather, the question whether particular employees are "managerial" must be answered in terms of the employees' actual job responsibilities, authority, and relationship to management.

The Board itself, in Textron, Inc., 219 NLRB at 385, stated:

> . . . managerial status is not conferred upon rank-and-file workers, or upon those who perform routinely, but rather it is reserved for those in executive-type positions, those who are closely aligned comanager or assistant manager. Davis' uncontradicted testimony shows that Gerald E. Fisher had arranged to continue forwarding health and welfare and pension benefit payments for Lindsey under the Noland Road store agreement on Lindsey's transfer to the Woods Chapel store in order to ensure Lindsey's continuity of accrued credit for pension benefit purposes and to ensure that no lapse in benefit coverage would occur. Because union dues payments were continued by Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) for all the employees who had transferred to the Woods Chapel store, excepting Lindsey, I am uncertain whether Leiblie might not have said or meant that Lindsey was not a member of the "Union" rather than the "unit" and that the record transcript contains an inadvertent or typographical error that was not picked up by the parties. Lindsey's transfer to the Woods Chapel store as "produce manager" when he was either comanager or assistant manager of the entire Noland Road store tends only to further confuse this. Be that as it may, the above was never clarified by any of the parties here.

> with management as true representatives of management.

The General Counsel asserts that "it is irrelevant whether Leiblie's job responsibilities as assistant manager are supervisory within the meaning of Section 2(11) because the Union's and the Employer's bargaining history, practice, and agreement is that the assistant manager is included in the bargaining unit." I do not agree. The Board, in Washington Post Co., 254 NLRB 168, 169 (1981), held:

> Thus, except in certain limited and well-defined factual situations, the Board, when presented with an appropriate petition or claim, is required to exclude positions from a bargaining unit where the inclusion of those positions would violate the principles of the Act. While it may be that certain of the positions sought to be excluded by a unit clarification petition have long been included under previous contracts, and the job duties of those positions have remained unchanged, nonetheless, if it can be shown that the persons in such positions meet the test for establishing supervisory, managerial, or confidential status, we are compelled to exclude them.[113] . . . Of course, a history of inclusion in the bargaining unit for many years may be evidence that such a classification in fact is properly included in the unit. If there are no changed circumstances in terms of job duties, this, too, may constitute evidence on the status of the individuals sought to be excluded.[12]

In applying all the above to the question of Leiblie's supervisory status, I find and conclude that he is indeed a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. As assistant manager, his duties include "opening and closing" the Woods Chapel store, tasks that are performed only by himself and store comanagers Minton and Fisher. He also "does the books, cashes checks, solves problems" and "does all the running of the store," when the comanagers are not present. Since Leiblie spends between 20-24 hours a week attending to duties in the dairy department, he therefore performs the duties enumerated above as assistant manager for anywhere from 40-50 percent of his worktime during which he "solves problems" and sees to the "running of the store" with or without the presence of a comanager on the premises. Along with the comanagers, he has keys to the store, the offices, and the cash registers. He also has the combination to the safe. Leiblie is paid differently than most of the other employees, on a salary basis and he receives no overtime pay for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Although the evidence is contradictory whether Leiblie possesses the right to discharge employees, and although he admittedly has never terminated or disciplined any employee, he has, on at least one occasion, effectively recommended an employee's discharge. And despite his own testimony to the contrary, Leiblie must believe, and most likely has been told, that he has the authority to at least effectively recommend discharge, if not terminate employees himself, as evidenced by the sign he posted in the dairy department threatening employees with dismissal if they are found "eating food or drinking milk."[114] Therefore I will exclude Robert Leiblie from the unit of employees found appropriate.

b. Mary Tignor

Tignor testified that she works in the bakery and delicatessen department at the Woods Chapel store along with eight or nine other employees.[115] She stated that her duties entail ordering the "bakery stuff," reporting to Minton what bakery goods are on hand, and discussing with Minton what bakery items should be placed on sale. Tignor related that although she works alongside the other employees in the department performing the same kinds of work that they do, she does tell employees what has to be done that day after consulting with Minton regarding the day's bakery needs. On occasion, albeit not occurring often or regularly, Tignor has complained to Minton about an employee's work or conduct, and Minton has spoken to the employee about this.[116] According to the testimony of Tignor, all employee requests for time off and all personnel problems in the department are brought to Minton directly by the employees themselves and not by her. Minton admittedly handles all such problems himself. She added that Minton schedules employees' work hours, including her own, and where they work. The evidence also shows that Tignor performs the same work as the other employees in the bakery and deli departments, baking goods and stocking bakery items on the shelves.

Marvin Paul, a former bakery employee at the Woods Chapel store, testified that Mary Tignor was the "deli and bakery supervisor" and "in charge of the deli and the bakery, seeing that things got done and seeing that people did what they were supposed to do." Paul related that Minton and Tignor would discuss the operation of the department every day, that Tignor orders the supplies for the bakery and deli department,[117] and that any requests for time off by employees and any other personnel problems in the department were handled by Minton. He stated that at the time that Minton had interviewed and hired him for the job, Minton had also introduced him to Tignor, stating that Paul would "be working with her" (emphasis added). Paul recounted that Tignor performed the same kind of work as did the other employees in the bakery and deli department, working alongside the other employees.

[12] See, e.g., McAlester Hospital Foundation, Inc., d/b/a McAlester General Hospital, 223 NLRB 589 (1977), where the Board concluded that the disputed employees were intended to be included in the unit, but, in so deciding, placed the burden on the employer, which wanted to exclude the employees, to demonstrate that they were statutory supervisors at the time of the stipulation or that circumstances had changed justifying their exclusion. The employer's prior agreement that the disputed employees were not statutory employees at the time of the stipulation, although not controlling, was found by the Board to be "considerable in assessing any conflict that may arise" out of contrasting testimony. Id. 233 NLRB 589, fn. 1. [115] Marvin Paul testified that there were about "15-20" employees in this department when he worked there. This could mean over the entire period and include different employees at different times.

Minton testified that Tignor was in charge of the bakery and deli department, making sure that the bakery products are available, that the quality of the products is maintained, and that the employees perform their work properly. He stated that he consults with Tignor daily regarding how many employees are needed in the department and what bakery products should be put on "special," with Tignor determining the quantity of the bakery goods needed because of her more extensive experience in bakery goods production. Minton related that Tignor discusses employee problems with him and makes recommendations. He added that in the event Tignor recommends an employee's termination, Minton usually speaks to the employee to ascertain all the facts and, if discharge is necessary, Minton fires the employee. Tignor has no authority to discharge employees.

The Respondent asserts that Mary Tignor is a managerial employee and should be excluded from the unit of employees at the Woods Chapel store. The General Counsel and the Charging Party dispute this. On the facts in this case, I find and conclude that Tignor is neither a managerial nor a supervisory employee as defined by Board law and the Act, respectively. Tignor does not "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employers" and "does not have discretion in the performance of her job independent of her employer's established policy." The record shows that Tignor was transferred from the Noland Road store to the Woods Chapel store to provide an "experienced employee" in the bakery and deli department. Moreover, Tignor has no authority to resolve any personnel problems in her department, has no authority to hire, fire, or discipline employees, and the record does not show that she effectively recommended any of the above.[118] Additionally, while Tignor, apparently as part of her duties, sees that the work is performed properly, she does not schedule the employees regarding their work hours or where they work.

It is clear from all of the above that Tignor is neither a managerial nor supervisory employee but, because of her vaster experience and knowledge of the operation of a bakery and deli department, functions more likely in the nature of a working foreman. In view thereof, Mary Tignor should be included in the appropriate unit of employees at the Woods Chapel store.

c. Ruth Gray

Ruth Gray is the "Liquor Manager" at the Woods Chapel store. She is the sole employee in the liquor department. Her duties consist of ordering the stock, checking invoices regarding cost charges, counting the items when liquor deliveries are received, deciding what and how much inventory is needed, and stocking the shelves. However, she does not prepare payment of the invoices; Gerald E. Fisher does. The Respondent asserts that "With this broad power to affect Respondent's business and pledge its credit, she is clearly a managerial employee and should be excluded from the bargaining unit." I do not agree. A careful reading of her testimony concerning her duties does not support the Respondent's contention in any way. A substantial part of Gray's duties entail the kind that would normally be performed by a "head clerk," not requiring the formulation and effectuation of management policies, nor does she exercise the discretion usually associated with an independence in the performance of her job beyond her employer's established policy. Nor is Gray a supervisory employee as defined in the Act.[119] Because of all the above, I find and conclude that Ruth Gray should be included in the unit.

6. The Union's majority status

As indicated, the parties stipulated that there were 33 unit employees at the Woods Chapel store during the relevant period here. My finding that Robert Leiblie is a supervisory employee and should be excluded from this unit decreases this to 32 unit employees. The General Counsel submitted signed authorization cards for the following employees in the unit: Cheryl Earlene Baker, Mary Kay Cooper, Bernadette Cox, Donald Gann, Ruth [118] While Minton sought in his testimony to clothe Tignor with at least the authority to effectively recommend such actions, for the reasons noted concerning Minton's testimony, I credit that of Tignor and Paul over his. Besides, Tignor was still employed by the Respondent at the time she testified and, her testimony being somewhat adverse to the position of the Respondent, was given at some risk of possible reprisal and, therefore, not likely to be false. See Parkview Acres Convalescent Center, supra, and cases cited therein.

[119] See Smith's Complete Market, 237 NLRB 1424 (1978), and cases cited in fn. 6.

The Respondent cites Parkwood IGA Foodliner, 210 NLRB 349 (1974), and Ed's Foodland of Springfield, 159 NLRB 1256 (1966), in support of its contention that Gray is a managerial or supervisory employee. Both cases are distinguishable from the instant case. In Parkwood IGA Foodliner, the "produce manager," unlike Gray, had a part-time employee as an assistant four mornings a week, received a percentage of the profits from the produce department under certain circumstances, received certain fringe benefits provided only for supervisory and managerial employees, and set his own hours of work.

Again in Ed's Foodland of Springfield, the "meat department manager" had the authority to hire and discharge or effectively recommend the same." He did all the meat buying and chose the items to be put on the special list each week. He directed the meat department employees in their work and assigned them their work schedules . . . made the primary decision as to the choice of the specials . . . it was his duty and responsibility to see to it that the meat department made a profit." The administrative law judge in the case found on the basis of the above that the "meat department manager" was "a supervisor and that in any event because of his duties of meat buying and thereby pledging the Respondent's credit and because of his duties in making up the ads and the specials in the meat department, he was an employee closely allied with management." Aside from the obvious fact that Gray is not a supervisory employee as was the "meat manager" in the cited cases, regarding her managerial status the apparent differences are: that the "meat department manager" had discretion in the purchasing of meat that would imply the choice of quality, and price, with further discretion about what items to consider as a "special," while it would seem that Gray ordered standard brands on the basis of stock needs, with "specials" dictated by the wholesalers' pricing of the item rather than her independent judgment thereof; under the Respondent's theory, it could be said of anyone who places an order for merchandise, without more, that the employee is a managerial employee because he pledges an employer's credit. The Board certainly did not intend such a result when it carefully evolved the case law defining a managerial employee. Circumstances such as nature, scope, discretion, and other duties, must be considered in determining this.

Gray, Sondra Hertzog, Tim Hicks, Betty Hoy, Jeanne Hubbard, Madalene Hunt, Cinda Kreiser, Marvin Paul, Joan Prine, Barbara Robinson, Sandra Straw, Mary Tignor, Mary Watters. Thus, 17 of 32 unit employees authorized the Union to represent them for purposes of collective bargaining, clearly a majority of the employees in the appropriate unit.

However, the Respondent in its brief asserts that statements made by James Hillen, a union organizer, to unit employees at the time he solicited their signatures on authorization cards (12 in number) constituted a material misrepresentation sufficient to negate these cards and that they therefore should "be disregarded" with the result that the Union has no majority representation among the employees in the appropriate unit.[120] The Respondent maintains,

> The critical factor however is that [Hillen] represented to each of these employees that they would have a chance to vote on any contract which might cover them. Such a representation would not offset the validity of the cards in an ordinary 8(a)(5) bargaining order case but this is not an ordinary case. In this case, Counsel for General Counsel contends that the cards should be used to support an order including these employees in an existing collective-bargaining agreement without an opportunity to vote. Respondent does not doubt that Hillen was sincere in making this representation to the employees because, as previously discussed, it was the Union's intention to negotiate a separate contract for Woods Chapel and there is no reason to doubt the Union would have kept the promise. However, the fact is that these cards are not being used for the purpose for which they were signed and under the circumstances the promise of a vote is a material misrepresentation that undermines the validity of the cards. No one can say now if these employees would have signed their cards if they had understood they were to be used to make them junior employees in a two-store unit to be named later with the resulting reduction in their protection against layoffs.

Hillen testified at the hearing that he told the employees when he solicited their signatures on the union authorization cards, in substance, that the Union was conducting an organizing campaign, that "the cards could be used in several different ways," that if the Union obtained "a majority of the employees signed up," it would request a "card check" and if the "Company refuses to grant us a card check," the Union could seek a Board election. Hillen also told them that should the Company recognize the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the Woods Chapel employees in the appropriate unit, or the Union wins an election, then the Union and the Company would "sit down" and "negotiate contracts to cover their wages, hours and conditions of employment." Hillen acknowledged that he had additionally told them that "they would have a chance to vote on the contract."

The Supreme Court, in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 606-607 (1969), stated concerning the validity of disputed authorization cards:

> [W]e think it sufficient to point out that employees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is deliberately and clearly canceled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature. . . . We cannot agree with the employers here that employees as a rule are too unsophisticated to be bound by what they sign unless expressly told that their act of signing represents something else . . . .
> [F]or cards to be invalidated on the basis of such misrepresentation, it is necessary that the asserted reliance on the misrepresentation be established by objective evidence corroborating or supporting the subjective assertion.

A misrepresentation will be disregarded when it is clear that the employees did not rely on it in executing the authorization cards.[121] And if the card unequivocally and unconditionally gives the union authority, then misrepresentation, to invalidate the card, must have indicated that the card would be used only for a different, more limited purpose than that stated on the card.[122] That the authorization cards given to the employees applicable here were unambiguous is evident from the record. These were single purpose authorization cards. The card states on its face that the signer authorizes the Union to represent the employee for collective-bargaining purposes.[123] Moreover, it is the Respondent who must show clear and convincing evidence of material misrepresentation to invalidate otherwise unambiguous authorization cards, and it has failed to do so.[124]

The Respondent also challenges the Union's majority representation on the grounds that:

> [T]wo cards obtained by Union representative Barclay (G.C. Exhs. 37 and 38) do not designate either Retail Store Employees Union Local 782 or the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union. Instead, Exhibits 37 and 38 designate the Retail Clerks International Union. There is no record evidence explaining what this Union may be and the cards were somewhere in the middle of the time sequence. It is submitted that at best Retail Clerks International Union was non-existent at the

[120] This is the first of the circumstances set forth in the Respondent's brief as a "basis for finding that no card majority exists."

Although several employees who had signed union authorization cards testified here, not one of them testified that they had signed the card solely in reliance on Hillen's statement to them that "they would have a chance to vote on the contract." The record in this case clearly shows that the employees signed union authorization cards because they wanted union representation.

> time the cards were signed. In any event, in the absence of record evidence that this Union is the same or somehow connected with either Retail Store Employees Union Local 782 or the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, then these cards cannot be counted.[125]

Again, I do not agree.

Initially, the Board has long held, with court approval, that an authorization card designating a parent labor organization serves as a valid designation of its affiliate.[126] The Union was the sole union seeking to organize and represent the employees.[127] Moreover, there is no evidence that the card signers were, in fact, confused, or believed that they were designating any other union separate from the Union here, which was requesting their signatures. There is no reason to believe in this case that employees were either presented with different possible representatives or were being requested to choose a yet-to-be-determined representative.[128] I, therefore, find the authorization cards in question sufficient to evidence the employees' desire to be represented by the Union.

The Respondent additionally asserts:

> The fourth reason that there was no majority relates to the dates that certain cards were signed, specifically General Counsel Exhibits 19 through 21. The only written demand for recognition and the only demand alleged in the complaint or the petition for an election was the demand mailed January 16, 1981. There is a certain lack of logic to the argument for a "continuing demand" because at least in theory it could run forever and an employer might never know when the actual bargaining obligation attached. The better rule, especially in a Kroger-type case, would be to insist that the Union have a majority at the time the formal demand is made. Gould, Inc., Electrical Components Division, 263 NLRB No. 35 (1982). However, even under the existing Board cases, a demand does not last forever. If Robert Leiblie is excluded from the unit as a supervisor, the Union has 17 cards in a unit of 32 employees. In Stoutco, Inc., 180 NLRB 178, the Board adopted the determination of Trial Examiner Maurice S. Busch at page 185 that even a continuing demand for recognition terminates when a petition for an election is filed. At the time the petition was filed on January 30 (R. Ex.1), the Union lacked a majority because the final necessary card was not signed until February 3, 1981 (GC Ex. 21). Thus, at the time the Union's demand or demands expired with the filing of the petition, the Union had only 16 cards in a unit of 32 and lacked majority status.

Again, I must disagree with this argument.[129]

As the record clearly shows, Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement whose term ran from May 14, 1979, to May 9, 1981. The agreement contains what can only be reasonably construed as an "after-acquired store" clause, stating

> 2.1 The Employer hereby recognizes the Union as the sole and exclusive collective bargaining agent . . . for the appropriate bargaining unit herein established and described as follows: All employees employed by the Employer working in the Employer's present and future retail establishments.

Thus, at the relevant and material times set forth, the agreement was in full force and effect including the "after-acquired store" clause therein.[130]

Significantly, the Employer itself recognized that there was an "after acquired store" clause in its Noland Road store agreement with the Union that required it to recognize and bargain with the Union about its new proposed Woods Chapel store. What other interpretation could reasonably arise from the actions of Gerald E. Fisher in initially contacting the Union with the information that a new supermarket, the Woods Chapel store, was to be opened, and would the union president meet with Fisher to collectively bargain about the Woods Chapel employees, and in the wording in the October 2, 1979 memorandum regarding the application of the Noland Road store contract to the Woods Chapel store after the meeting between the parties took place.

[126] NLRB v. Bradford Dyeing Assn., 310 U.S. 318 (1940); NLRB v. Franks Bros. Co., 137 F.2d 989 (1st Cir. 1943).

[129] Although disagreeing with counsel for the Respondent consistently, I would be remiss if I did not note, with some admiration, the fertility of his mind regarding his arguments in support of the Respondent's positions on the various issues raised here.

[130] The Respondent contends that the memorandum of October 2, 1979, "effectively rescinded such clause by providing a significantly different procedure for dealing with Woods Chapel. . . . Substitution of a different agreement has the effect of rescinding the prior agreement with regard to after acquired stores." The Respondent asserts that, therefore, no agreement containing an "after acquired store" clause "existed at any relevant time." I do not agree with this contention. At best, the memorandum of October 2, 1979, if valid, would be a modification of the bargaining agreement between the parties, not a rescission thereof as concerns the new Woods Chapel store. No other meaning can be reasoned therefrom in view of the parties' agreement that this was an "accretion" to the agreement already in effect at the Noland Road store. Although the word "accretion" is improperly used, the "after acquired store" clause interpretation and application is evident. Moreover, the case cited by the Respondent to support this contention does not in fact do so. In that case, "Local Union 1617, United Steelworkers of America, et al. v. GF Business Equipment, Inc., 105 LRRM 2762, 2764 (U.S. Dist. Ct. N.D. Ohio, 1978)," the memorandum of agreement between the parties provided for improved benefits to employees by modifying the severance allowance provision of an existing collective-bargaining agreement specifically, "in lieu of any commitment" by the employer to continue its operations at a specified location. As the court stated:

> [T]he September 15, 1976 Memorandum of Agreement sets forth in clear and unambiguous language an agreement whereby for the consideration of additional severance allowance provided by the defendant, plaintiffs recognized the company had no commitment to continue its operations in Youngstown. If there was any prior contract to build a new facility in Youngstown, it would, by its very nature, have implied additional commitment by the company to its operations in Youngstown. Thus, the 1976 Memorandum of Agreement is inherently inconsistent with any 1972 agreement to build a new facility, and must be viewed as effecting a rescission of any 1972 contract. [Emphasis added.]

In the instant case, however, the modifications made in the October 2, 1979 "agreement," if it had been valid, was not "in lieu" of any obligation contained in the Noland Road agreement and thus cannot be perceived as a rescission of that agreement. Actually the reference in the October 2, 1979 "agreement" regarding the application thereof to the Woods Chapel employees as an "accretion" to the Noland Road agreement would negate any such finding of a rescission.

In late April 1980, by telegram, the Employer informed the Union that it was repudiating the October 2, 1979 "purported agreement" and that union representation of the Woods Chapel employees "can only be obtained and granted through appropriate procedures of the National Labor Relations Board under the National Labor Relations Act" (emphasis added). This wording in the Employer's telegram carries the strong indication that thereafter and only by means of the Board's election procedures could the Union hope to secure recognition as the collective-bargaining representative of the Woods Chapel employees. But under the Board's ruling in Kroger,[131] the Employer had waived its right to demand an election to determine representation pursuant to the "after acquired store" clause in the Noland Road agreement and was duty bound to recognize the Union when and if the Union presented unequivocal evidence in the form of signed authorization cards that it represented a majority of the Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit.

With this as background, the Union now sought to secure signed authorization cards from a majority of the Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit. By letter dated January 17, 1981, the Union notified the Employer that it represented a majority of unit employees at Woods Chapel and requested recognition and bargaining. In response, the Employer, by letter dated January 22, 1981, again asserted its refusal to acknowledge or accept any claim by the Union to majority representation outside a Board conducted election, again apparently foreclosing any consideration by it of the possibility of recognition based on a signed authorization card count. The Employer also stated that, "We do not believe you represent the majority of our employees."

Despite the above, the Union again sought to obtain recognition on the basis of what it believed to be its majority representation of the Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit as evidenced by signed authorization cards by visiting the Employer's Noland Road store and demanding recognition and bargaining from Gerald E. Fisher, the Employer's owner. The record indicates that Fisher refused to discuss recognition and bargaining with the Union and referred the Union to the Employer's legal counsel for any further discussion or action. On January 26, 1981, in a telephone conversation, Union Organizer Hillen and Willard, the Employer's newly hired legal counsel, the Employer, through Willard, again refused to accept a "card check," but indicated, in effect, its acquiescence to a Board election; whereupon, on January 30, 1981, the Union filed its "Petition" with the Board seeking, by means of the Board's elective processes, recognition as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Employer's Woods Chapel employees.[132]

Under the circumstances presented above, I cannot find that the Union's demand for recognition and bargaining did not continue after the filing of its petition with the Board on January 30, 1981. While in fact the Union did not represent a majority of the Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit when it made its demands for recognition and bargaining up to the date of the filing of its petition, the Kroger case would, of necessity, require the presence of a continuing demand regarding an "after acquired store" clause until the Union obtained a majority of the new store employees or failed to do so at any time, or until the "after acquired store" clause was negated in a subsequent agreement between the parties. Therefore, according to my previous findings, the Union attained bargaining representative status of a majority of the Employer's Woods Chapel employees on February 3, 1981, when it obtained the signed authorization card of Ruth Gray. Since the Union's demand continued in force and effect even after it filed its petition with the Board, the obligation of the Employer to recognize and bargain therewith became effective on that date.

The case cited by the Employer, Stoutco, Inc., 180 NLRB 178 (1969), to support its contention that the Union's demand for recognition and bargaining was made at a time when the Union had not yet attained its majority status and such demand was "exhausted, spent, and unoperative" when the Union finally attained majority status after it had filed its petition with the Board for an election, is clearly distinguishable on the facts. First, it should be noted that the "Trial Examiner" specifically limited his ruling to "the full circumstances of this case." Next, he himself set forth the differences in that case and what, in effect, are the circumstances in the instant case. He stated:

> Counsel for General Counsel also advances the further argument that ". . . even if the original demand were not a continuing one, the Union's processing of its representation petition in itself constituted a continuing demand sufficient to place on Respondent a duty to bargain." . . . American Compressed Steel Corporation, 146 NLRB 1463, 1470–71, enfd. 343 F.2d 307. . . . cited by Government counsel in support of these propositions, contain factual situations so entirely dissimilar from here as to be inapposite. In the American Compressed Steel Corporation, the Union made written demand for recognition on April 18, filed a petition for election on April 22, but did not attain majority status until [132] I am not unaware that the Union actually had not as yet obtained signed authorization cards from a numerative majority of such employees at this time. However, the Employer refused and failed to view the signed authorization cards already in the Union's possession and tendered by the Union for review by the Employer, to determine if, in fact, the Union did represent a majority of the Woods Chapel employees. Moreover, under the circumstances in this case, the Union had reason to believe, although incorrectly, that it did represent a majority of these employees since, of 33 employees alleged to be in the appropriate unit, the Union had 17 signed authorization cards, with Leiblie's.

> April 25, 1963. The Trial Examiner in that case whose decision the Board adopted, found a violation of Section 8(a)(5) but only because the Employer in that case had totally ignored the Union's demand letter and thus evinced "an outright refusal of the Union's request without regard to the number of cards here." Under these circumstances, the Examiner in the American Compressed case held "it would have been futile for the Union formally to renew its request after April 25." In the instant case, as seen, the Company did reply by letter of June 24 to the Union's request, declining recognition because of a stated honest belief that the Union did not represent a majority of its employees and suggesting that the Union file an election petition. There is no indication in Respondent's letter or any other conduct of the Respondent that it might not have acceded to a later request for recognition based on a card count. The fact that the Union, on June 12, 1968, entered into a stipulation with Respondent for a consent election is an indication that the Union from and after the filing of its petition for an election on June 25 was no longer insisting that the Company recognize the Union as the representative of its employees on the basis of a card count.

That the circumstances in the instant case differentiate the above is obvious. First, as previously indicated, the Employer was obligated under the "after acquired store" clause in the Noland Road agreement to submit to a card count. Second, the Employer foreclosed any consideration of the possibility of recognition based on a card count in its telegram of April 29, 1980, in which it stated that "representation can only be obtained and granted through appropriate procedures of the National Labor Relations Board"; again in its letter dated January 22, 1981, in response to the Union's demand for recognition and bargaining wherein it unequivocally refused to recognize the Union unless the Board' s election procedures were used; and once again in its position conveyed to the Union by its legal counsel Willard on January 26, 1981, that it would not accept a "card check," but also would not oppose an election. That the Employer's actions constituted "an outright refusal of the Union's request without regard to the number of cards here" is evident. Also clear from the above is the fact that "it would have been futile for the Union formally to renew its request" after January 26, 1981, based on the above.

Furthermore, under these circumstances, the fact that the Union filed a petition for an election and on February 13, 1981, executed a "Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election" does not have the same effect as similar action by the union in the Stoutco, Inc. case where it was construed to mean that the Union was "no longer insisting that the Company recognize the Union as the representative of its employees on the basis of a card count." Faced with the Employer's intransigent position, the Union did what it could under the circumstances and followed Board procedure for an election and subsequently filed an unfair labor practice charge.

Moreover, the Employer's "good-faith doubt" of the Union's majority representation was based on an employee's assertion that several of the Woods Chapel employees had held a meeting during which they agreed that they did not desire union representation, this employee being the son of Gary Minton, a comanager of the Woods Chapel store. A review of the signed authorization cards by the Employer could have ascertained, in fact, whether the Union represented a majority and the Employer was obligated to do this anyway. Unlike the instant case, analogously, in the Stoutco, Inc. case, the respondent there experienced "very large labor turnovers, with four out of six employees quitting their jobs shortly after hiring," reasonably giving rise to the respondent's "good-faith doubt" regarding the Union's then majority.[133]

And finally, in its brief, the Employer, in substance, asserts that the Union failed to communicate, in its demand for recognition and bargaining, the fact that it was requiring the Employer to include or "fold in" the Woods Chapel employees into the unit appropriate under the Noland Road contract pursuant to the "after acquired store" clause in that collective-bargaining agreement between Jerry's United Super, Inc. (Noland Road store) and the Union. "Respondent submits that while the January 16, 1981 letter was a sufficiently clear request for individual bargaining by Woods Chapel, it did not put Respondent on notice that something more than bargaining was required." The brief continues:

> The facts of this case demonstrate that the Union did not intend that the Woods Chapel unit be merged with the Noland Road unit, let alone request such a result. The request (GC Ex. 7) was directed to Gary Minton, manager. . . . The language of the request refers simply to bargaining for the Woods Chapel employees and contains absolutely no reference to the Noland Road store. . . .
> The Union's course of action for an entire month after the January 16 demand suggested that they sought only recognition and bargaining in the Woods Chapel unit. The other stores were not mentioned. As the Third Circuit has observed, "the acts of the union and the employer at the time the demand is alleged to have been made are not to be viewed in isolation. Events subsequent to the request may be examined in making the determination . . ." Steel City Transport, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 389 F.2d 753, 759 (3rd Cir. 1968).
> The petition for an election in Case 17-RC-9193 (R. Ex. 1) and the election agreement (R. Ex. 2) deal exclusively with the Woods Chapel unit and the election agreement contains the express statement that Woods Chapel is the only facility involved. . . .
> The Union's true intention and change in plan may be discerned from its communications to the Woods Chapel employees of February 10 and 18, 1981. On February 10 the Union was interested in a "speedy election" (R. Ex. 3) but on February 18 (R. Ex. 4) the Union announced that it has "uncovered

---

[133] Also for the reasons asserted above, Gould, Inc., supra, cited by the Employer, does not support its contentions.

> some additional information which leads it to believe the store in which you work should already be union according to the Federal Labor Law." [Emphasis added.]
> The only inference which can be drawn from this course of action, including the communications to the employees, is that it never occurred to the Union that it might be able to insist that Woods Chapel be included under the Noland Road contract at the time the demand was made, at the time the petition was filed or the election agreement was entered into. Since the Union was not aware of that possibility at that time, under no conceivable circumstances could it have made a demand to invoke the after-acquired store clause of the Noland Road contract. Had it made such a demand, even at that late date and given Respondent an opportunity to consider its alternative in view of the type of request, the card check might have been accepted, but instead the Union left it in the posture of a demand to represent the Woods Chapel employees separately and in that situation Respondent was entitled to an election.

Regarding the Court's own finding, as cited by the Respondent, "the acts of the union and the employer at the time the demand is alleged to have been made are not to be viewed in isolation," and it should be noted that the Employer itself was aware that the Woods Chapel employees could fall within the purview of the Noland Road contract's "additional" or "after-acquired store" clause and acknowledged the same when, with the Union, it signed the October 2, 1979 "agreement," although this "agreement" was unlawful under the Act.[134] As indicated above the only possible interpretation and meaning of the October 2, 1979 "agreement" between the Respondent[135] and the Union[136] under the facts and circumstances of this case can be that the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties in effect at the Noland Road store would become applicable to the new Woods Chapel store pursuant to the "after-acquired store" clause present therein, but with the modifications worked out by the parties. As set forth above this is clearly evidenced by the following: that Gerald E. Fisher, owner of both the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores, himself sought out the Union regarding the Union's representation of the Respondent's new Woods Chapel store employees; that the October 2, 1979 "agreement" makes reference to its being an "accretion" to the Noland Road store collective-bargaining agreement already in force and effect, albeit an incorrect usage of the word; that Fisher's request for a concession deferring the effective date and application of the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement to May 4, 1980, and his statement to Davis that this date coincides with the new wage rates going into effect, which would save him a "lot of bookkeeping" and time, clearly referring to the Noland Road bargaining agreement; and the arrangements made to cover employees transferred from the Noland Road to the Woods Chapel store so that there would be no loss of their pension and health and welfare coverage under the bargaining agreement covering the Noland Road store employees for the deferred period.[137]

Subsequently the telegram dated April 25, 1980, and signed by Gerald E. Fisher, again to be noted as the owner of both the Noland Road and Woods Chapel stores, the Employer clearly repudiated the October 2, 1979 "agreement" as being unlawful under the Act. Pointing to its significance again, the telegram states:

> In the event you desire to represent the employees of Woods Chapel United Super, Inc., said representation can only be obtained and granted through appropriate procedures of the National Labor Relations Board.

This clear, unequivocal, and final statement of the Employer's position regarding recognition and bargaining, when read in connection with the content and meaning of the entire telegram, could only convey one certain impression, that being that the Employer refused under any circumstances to grant force and effect to the "after-acquired store" clause of the Noland Road agreement regarding its application to the Woods Chapel store employees.

As set forth, the Employer's position was restated in its letter of response to the Union's request for recognition and bargaining dated January 17, 1981, made clear again when the Union's representatives demanded recognition in a face-to-face meeting at the Noland Road store on January 20, 1981, with Gerald E. Fisher, and once more in a telephone conversation with the Employer's legal counsel, Willard, on January 26, 1981.

Because of the foregoing, I neither can credit nor comprehend how the Respondent can now allege unawareness of the Union's intent concerning its demand for recognition and bargaining or the confusion thereof. The Employer had foreclosed its consideration of the Union's demand for application of the Noland Road bargaining agreement to the Woods Chapel store employees on more than one occasion. What other course of action did the Employer leave open to the Union than to proceed as it did. Now the Employer complains about this as resulting in confusion and being misleading. The Kroger case mandates that the Union represent a majority of the Woods Chapel store employees in an appropriate unit prior to the Employer becoming obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union. Since, under Kroger, that bargaining would entail the application of the Noland Road agreement to the Woods Chapel store employees as is, or with modifications based on the needs of the Woods Chapel store employees, as perceived and agreed on by the Employer and the Union, and since the Employer had previously repudiated the October 2, 1979 "agreement" as unlawful, there having been no employees hired at Woods Chapel at the time, after having initially evidenced knowledge and acceptance of the "after-acquired store" clause in the Noland Road agreement, it could well be argued that the Union's demand concerning the Woods Chapel employees intended compliance with the Kroger requirement of majority representation, and to remedy the Employer's previous basis for its refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union thereunder. The Employer was represented by competent legal counsel and had already, once before, acknowledged possible Kroger compliance. The Employer cannot now assert it had no knowledge concerning what the Union was seeking when it demanded recognition and bargaining. Under the circumstances in this case, the Union could have validly been seeking either a Kroger case result or a Board election without the Employer being entitled to challenge the efficacy of the Union's demand on the basis of conclusion or being mislead. Significantly the Employer never raised this in its contacts with the Union at any time.[138]

[134] The Woods Chapel store was not even in operation when this "agreement" was entered into, no employees had been hired at that time or "were in place," and under the Kroger case rule, the Union did not represent a majority of the Woods Chapel employees at the time.

[135] It should be remembered that Gerald E. Fisher, the owner of both the Woods Chapel and Noland Road stores negotiated and signed the agreement on behalf of the Respondent.

[136] The Union's president, Earl Davis, negotiated and signed the agreement in the Union's behalf.

[137] I find this to be true despite the use of the plural "agreements" in the October 2, 1979 "agreement." None of the circumstances described could possibly refer to the Chrysler store bargaining agreement but only to that affecting the Noland Road store.

From all the above, I find and conclude that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it failed and refused to recognize and bargain with the Union on February 3, 1981, when the Union represented a majority of the Woods Chapel employees in an appropriate unit. As a single employer, this Employer was committed to recognize the Union, under the "after-acquired store" clause, as the exclusive bargaining representative of such employees and to apply the collective-bargaining agreement the new Woods Chapel store operation, and its refusal and failure to do so was violative of the Act.[139]

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Employer set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring concerning its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Employer has engaged in certain unfair labor pactices, I recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I shall recommend that the Employer be ordered to recognize and bargain with the Union on request as the exclusive representative of the Woods Chapel store employees in the unit found appropriate; on request, to apply and extend the existing collective-bargaining agreement it has with the Union at the Noland Road store with retroactive effect from and after February 3, 1981, the date the Union attained its majority representation of the Woods Chapel store employees; make the unit employees at the Woods Chapel store whole for any loss of pay and benefits resulting from the Employer's failure to apply the terms and conditions of such collective-bargaining agreement to them, the backpay due thereunder shall be computed with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977);[140] post an appropriate notice at its Noland Road and Woods Chapel stores as provided for here; and cease and desist from in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act.[141]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super and Jerry's United Super, Inc. constitute a "single employer" within the intendment of Board doctrine.

3. United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. All employees employed at the Employer's facilities located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, and 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department em-

[138] Regarding its assertion that the Union failed to make proper demand, the Employer in its brief also maintains

> The Board has faced a somewhat similar problem in an accretion context and has imposed upon the Union a duty to make its demands known at the earliest possible stage, observing that:
> > Also the Seafarers apparently did not consider the Siboney as accreted to the existing unit; inasmuch as the Seafarers failed to raise the accretion issue at the time Respondent requested information as to what type of area contract might be applicable in the contemplated use of the Siboney. Reynolds Metal Company, 219 NLRB 624, 625 (1975).
> Before a person can be required to take certain action on the demand of another, that demand must be clear enough to put the person on notice that certain conduct is requested. A demand for recognition and bargaining addressed to the manager of one corporation surely cannot trigger an obligation of an unidentified separate corporation whatever the maximum effect of the single employer doctrine may be.

I find that the Employer's position is untenable because of the facts and circumstances present in this case and my above findings concerning the demand. Moreover, the case cited by the Employer in support of the above, Reynolds Metal Co., supra, is clearly distinguishable from the instant case. Aside from the obvious difference that accretion and Kroger-type cases have different principles applicable thereto, in Reynolds Metal the existing bargaining agreement was found to have no application to the new ship involved, and the union failed to raise the accretion issue when specifically asked by the employer about "what type of contract might be applicable in the contemplated use of the Siboney." In the instant case, the Noland Road agreement was applicable under Kroger to the new Woods Chapel store, the Employer was aware that it was that agreement and none other under consideration initially, and though the Union never indicated a change, and in certain terms indicated such in its demand requests, yet the Employer, if confused, never requested clarification or any information.

ployees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

5. The collective-bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Union concerning the store located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, effective May 14, 1979, through May 9, 1981, contains a valid "after-acquired store" clause.

6. Since February 3, 1981, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees employed in the unit found appropriate in Conclusion 4, above, more particularly those employed at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. By refusing, on or after February 3, 1981, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees employed at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the appropriate unit, the Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. By refusing, on or after February 3, 1981, to apply and extend to the employees in its store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the appropriate unit, the existing collective-bargaining agreement it has with the Union at its store located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, the Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

9. The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[142]

ORDER

The Respondent, Woods Chapel United Super, Inc. d/b/a Jerry's United Super and Jerry's United Super, Inc., their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, Blue Springs and Independence, Missouri, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, as the exclusive representative of their employees in their store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the unit found appropriate here.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, recognize and bargain collectively with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, as the exclusive representative of their employees in their store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the appropriate unit.

(b) On request, apply and extend to the employees in their store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the appropriate unit, the existing collective-bargaining agreement they have with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, at their store located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, with retroactive effect from and after February 3, 1981.

(c) Make the employees employed at their store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, in the appropriate unit, whole for any loss of pay or benefits with interest they may have suffered by reason of the unfair labor practices engaged in by the Employer here.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at their stores located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri and 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[143] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17,after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

[142] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[143] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain collectively with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, as the exclusive representative of our employees at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the appropriate unit noted below regarding wages, hours, or any other terms or conditions of employment, to wit:

> All employees employed at the Employer's facilities located at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, and 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, but excluding all meat department employees, office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782, as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees in the appropriate multistore unit as set forth above.

WE WILL, on request, apply our existing contract with United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 782 at our store at 3443 South Noland Road, Independence, Missouri, to the employees in our store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, as part of the multistore appropriate unit described above, with retroactive effect from February 3, 1981.

WE WILL make our employees at our store located at 1201 North Woods Chapel Road, Blue Springs, Missouri, whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from our unfair labor practices, plus interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 18, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Walter J. Alprin issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[2] findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Southern Foods, Inc., Bowling Green, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 2(e).

"(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

---

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to the judge's ruling at the hearing excluding evidence purporting to show that the real reason employees Donnie Thompson and Charles Fulcher were disciplined was not because they responded to a Board subpoena, but because of their intentional and malicious participation in a union scheme to abuse Board processes and disrupt and injure the Respondent's business. After carefully considering the matter, we find no merit in the Respondent's exception. In so finding, we rely particularly on the fact that the January 15, 1987 letter the Respondent sent the employees informing them of their terminations sets forth the Respondent's reasons for discharging them, but makes no mention of the alleged scheme or plot. Therefore, we conclude that this alleged misconduct, even if established, was not a factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge the two employees, and the Respondent's claim now that the employees participated in such a scheme has all the markings of an afterthought. For this reason, we affirm the judge's ruling excluding the evidence in question. Of course, our decision should not be construed as in any way condoning the kind of tactics alleged to have been engaged in here.

We also note that, as the judge observed, the Respondent could have sought to alleviate business inconvenience by at least calling the Regional Office to inquire into the possibility of a postponement that would permit the testimony of employees Fulcher and Thompson to be taken at a time less inconvenient for the Respondent's operations. Instead of making such an effort at accommodation, the Respondent simply discharged the subpoenaed employees.

Member Babson, in affirming the judge's ruling, relies on the reasons set forth by the judge in his decision.

[3] The judge stated in sec. II, par. 2, of his decision that Kenneth Howell, the Union's business agent, did not receive the Board subpoenas until about 8 p.m. at the union meeting on January 8, 1987. Howell testified that he received the subpoenas "around 7 p.m."

In sec. II, par. 6, of the decision, the judge stated that when employees Fulcher and Thompson reported to work the morning after the hearing, their supervisor told them to write an explanation of why they should get their jobs back. The record indicates that Joe Natcher, the Respondent's vice president, not their supervisor, told the employees to write the explanation. These inaccuracies in the judge's decision do not affect the decision in this case.

[4] The judge included a visitatorial clause in his recommended Order authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

Although the judge found that the Respondent's conduct warranted broad cease-and-desist language, he failed to include this language in his recommended Order. We have considered this case in light of the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), however, and have concluded that a broad remedial order is inappropriate inasmuch as it has not been shown that the Respondent has a proclivity to violate the Act or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER J. ALPRIN, Administrative Law Judge. On 14 January 1987[1] General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 89, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Ware-housemen & Helpers of America (the Union) filed a charge, amended on 5 February, alleging that Southern Foods, Inc. (Respondent) engaged in unfair labor practices by discharging Donnie D. Thompson and Charles R. Fulcher because they joined, supported or assisted the Union, and engaged in concerted activities and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), and with interfering with the processes of the Board in violation of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act. On 9 February a complaint thereon was issued, and the matter was heard before me at Bowling Green, Kentucky, on 27 March and 2 April. Briefs were submitted.[2]

On the entire record of the case and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

[1] All dates are in 1987 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Respondent's supplement to its brief is not accepted. It added two points—an appeal and decision of which I was already aware, and emphasis on matters in the record only as offers of proof and not admitted as evidence. Further, the Board Rules, Sec. 102.42, makes no provision for such "supplement."

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Kentucky corporation with an office and place of business at Bowling Green, Kentucky, where it engages in the nonretail sale and distribution of frozen foods and related products. It admits it is and I find it to be an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It also admits that the Union is, and I find it to be, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

During December 1986 the Union was engaged in a campaign to organize a unit of Respondent's employees consisting generally of drivers and warehouse employees. On 17 December 1986 it filed a petition with the Board for certification as exclusive bargaining representative. The union business agent in charge of the campaign, Kenneth Howell, advised supporting employees that there would probably be a representation hearing before the Board as to inclusion within the unit of certain leadmen and order takers. He told them he would need about three witnesses and asked for volunteers. Three employees, not the alleged discriminatees, volunteered.

On 29 December 1986, notice was issued by the Board of a representation hearing to be held on 9 January. Howell was out of town on vacation and did not learn the date of the representation hearing until his return on 7 January, and the following evening, 8 January, he met with union supporters. At the meeting Howell was told that Thompson and Fulcher would be the witnesses to be subpoenaed by the union to testify on its behalf. Howell did not receive the actual subpoenas until about 8 p.m., at the meeting. The subpoenas were not completed with the names of Thompson and Fulcher, and given to them, until that night. The employer warehouse was then closed, and messages could not be taken from the telephone answering machine until the warehouse opened in the morning. In response to their questions, Howell told Thompson and Fulcher to show the subpoenas to their superior upon reporting for work in the morning, advising him that they would have to leave work at 9 or 9:30 a.m. in order to honor the subpoenas.

Starting time on the next day, 9 January, also the day of the Board hearing, was 5 a.m. Thompson and Fulcher had arrived before the warehouse opened and when admitted made the suggested statement to their supervisor. He took the subpoenas into the then empty office of Willard Atkinson, the Respondent's president. Thompson and Fulcher went to work pulling orders and/or readying their trucks.

About 5:30 a.m. Atkinson arrived at the warehouse, and the supervisor showed him the two subpoenas. Atkinson called Thompson and Fulcher from their work. Because both were scheduled for their regular "long runs," which required that they be out of the warehouse without returning until the end of the day, they would not be able to start their runs if they had to leave midmorning. Atkinson told them that they were needed in order to do their work and could not leave work to testify in response to the subpoenas. Thompson and Fulcher insisted that they were bound by the Board's order to appear and testify, and Atkinson finally told them that they would either take their scheduled runs or, if they were going to obey the subpoena, to "hit the clock" and leave. They both left the warehouse and later attended and testified at the representation hearing pursuant to the subpoenas.

At the representation hearing, Atkinson was asked to name the drivers employed by Respondent. He did so, leaving out Thompson's and Fulcher's names. When asked why he did not name them, on the advice of counsel Atkinson did not reply.

The next morning Thompson and Fulcher appeared at the warehouse at the proper time for work, but were met by their supervisor, who gave each of them pen and paper and told them to write an explanation of why they "should have their jobs back." They pointed out that since they had not been advised that they had lost their jobs they did not understand why they should explain why they should get them back. They were told to go home. The next workday, Monday, 12 January, the same scene was reenacted.

The following morning, 13 January, when Thompson and Fulcher reported for work they were each given an envelope containing a letter from Joe Natchez, an officer of Respondent, stating in full as follows:

> This will confirm what you were told last Friday morning when you refused to perform your assigned duties. You were sent home pending an investigation of the total circumstances.
> On Saturday morning I asked you why you should have your job back, and on Monday morning I asked you why you should be entitled to work. Both times you did not give me any reasons whatsoever.
> I also asked you to write down for me your reasons. On Saturday morning, you replied, why should we write the reasons down if we have not been fired? On Monday morning, you said you were not going to write any reasons down. Both times I asked if you were refusing to write your reasons down, and both times you said yes.
> We are seeking legal counsel, and you should not report to work until further notice. We expect to make a decision within a few days and will notify you. If you have any reasons, please provide them.

That Saturday they each received a letter from Atkinson by certified mail, stating in full as follows:

> After waiting until the end of today to receive from you any statement of reasons why you should be reinstated, considering all factors known to us, and consulting legal counsel, I regret to tell you that your employment at Southern Foods, Inc., is being terminated.
> We recognize fully the rights of employees to decide for themselves whether they wish to be represented by the Teamsters' Union or any other > union. This includes your individual rights to testify at an NLRB hearing. However, your rights must be balanced with the need to serve our customers and operate our business.

> The hearing date was scheduled well in advance. We think you must have known several days ahead that you would likely want to be absent from work on that Friday. You testified at the hearing that you learned on Thursday evening, while attending a Union meeting, that there was a subpoena issued for you.
> We believe it was your responsibility to notify us as soon as possible of your intended absence. You knew your scheduled route for the day was a long out-of-town one. With advance notice, even as late as Thursday evening we could have made arrangements, which would have minimized the disruption of our business, which was caused by your presenting the subpoena, and refusing to work at the time you were scheduled to leave.
> On Friday morning, after I learned of the subpoena, I told you that you would have to make a choice whether to carry out my direction to perform your usual duties on that day, or to attend the NLRB hearing. I told you that we were fully scheduled and that you were needed to work. You chose not to do so. [Emphasis added.]

Discussion

The pertinent facts of this matter are simple. Two employees were subpoenaed by the Union to give testimony at a representation hearing the following morning. When they presented the subpoenas to the Respondent and requested to be excused from work to honor the subpoenas, the employer directed them to continue working and not honor the subpoenas. When they questioned his order, the employer gave them a simple option: ignore the subpoena and work for me, or honor the subpoena and "hit the clock." When the employees insisted on honoring the subpoena the employer denied at the hearing that they worked for him, refused to allow them to return to work without a written explanation of why they should "get their jobs back" [emphasis added], and eventually officially "terminated" their employment.

The decision is equally simple. These were not employees voluntarily seeking to leave work without authority to attend a Board hearing, as to whom there must be a balancing of their personal desires on the one hand, and, on the other, the damage to the employer's business. These employees had been served with subpoenas requiring their attendance. Respondent's attempt to interfere with such subpoenas is a violation of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act.

Respondent's argument is based on a consistent, though both incorrect and unstated refusal to recognize that the Board, and the courts, distinguish between employees leaving work without permission into those doing so in response to a subpoena, on the one hand, and, on the other, "voluntarily" and without having been served with a subpoena. Thus, its entire position is incorrectly predicated on the decisions relating to unexcused "voluntary" absence, as to which a balancing test measures employee rights versus business needs, though the facts clearly show that the employees involved did not absent themselves voluntarily, but in response to a subpoena.

It was Respondent's primary argument at the hearing that the majority opinion of the Board in Rich Plan of Western Reserve, 271 NLRB 1010 (1985), should be reversed in favor of the dissenting opinion of Chairman Dotson. Respondent alleged that the dissent held it is incumbent to balance the requirements of a subpoena served on an employee against the need of the employer for the employees' services at the time. In point of fact the dissenting opinion of Chairman Dotson was adopted by the Sixth Circuit in Rich Plan of Western Reserve v. NLRB, 796 F.2d 864 (6th Cir. 1986). Unfortunately for Respondent, the dissent of Chairman Dotson was not as presented by counsel here, and neither it nor the opinion of the court pertains to this case.

The Rich Plan case, before the Board and the court, involved the rights of employees to leave work without authority when not yet served with subpoenas when they had been told that subpoenas awaited service at the hearing and they believed themselves subject to penalty if they failed to appear. The Board's majority held that the employees in such circumstances had the status as having already been served. Chairman Dotson could "find no reason for the sudden departure from the universally established and accepted legal requirement of service." Rich Plan, supra at 1013. The court agreed, adding that "Although the employees may have reasonably believed they were under a legal obligation to attend the hearing, we do not believe that this is an adequate substitute for actual service in the circumstances of this case." Rich Plan v. NLRB, supra at 879.

The case at bar is completely different. Here the employees had already been subpoenaed and the Employer knew it. The Employer even held the subpoenas in his hand when he ordered the employees to remain at work and issued his ultimatum. This is completely different from Chairman Dotson's dissent, which made it abundantly clear he was referring to employees on whom no subpoena had been served, e.g., at 1012 "unless they were subpoenaed," "The rights of these unsubpoenaed employees" and "in the absence of a showing that they had been subpoenaed" and at 1013 his approving quotation from and citing of Standard Packaging Corp., 140 NLRB 628, 630 (1963) that the employees "were under no subpoena to appear," and that "Accordingly, I find that the employees who were not served with subpoenas therefor left work voluntarily . . . ."[3]

[3] During oral argument in the course of the hearing, counsel for Respondent continually and incorrectly represented that the dissent involved balancing the rights of subpoenaed employees. Tr. 37 shows him stating that "It was the position of Chairman Dotson in his vigorous dissent [and impliedly accepted] by the majority, too, that the subpoena must balance [the] need to call this witness to put on the case[,] and the extent to which it will disrupt the employers' business." (Bracketed material makes obvious corrections to the transcript.) Lest one think this a slip of the tongue, at Tr. 43 counsel continues "I wanted to quote where he said 'It must be balanced, must be balanced, the right of the union to subpoena witnesses and have them appear with the disruption with the amount of the disruption to the Employer's business.'" (Reporter's mark-

The "balancing test" and "business justification" are concepts limited to "voluntary," i.e., nonsubpoenaed, attendance at Board hearings or at Board offices to obtain or give information or file charges. "In the absence of a subpoena, it is well established, both under appellate authority and Board precedent, that an employee does not have a statutorily protected right to absent himself from work without permission even though he seeks to voluntarily testify at a Board proceeding; rather, a balance must be struck between the interests of the employee in attending the proceeding and the interests of the employer in maintaining production and discipline over his work force." Rich Plan v. NLRB, supra at 876, emphasis added. "We note that there are cases which hold that once a subpoena is served upon an employee the employer's motivation is irrelevant and the employer's obligation is one of noninterference with the employee's duty to respond to the subpoena." (Rich Plan v. NLRB, supra at 873, emphasis added.)

In its brief Respondent finally recognized that the issue in Rich Plan related to whether the employees had been subpoenaed. It continued, however, to perniciously confuse the requirements of balancing business justification where employees are not subpoenaed with the situation here, where the employees had been subpoenaed, by citing and quoting from Earringhouse Imports, 227 NLRB 1107 (1977), and the circuit court's refusal to enforce the Board's Order, Service Employees Local 250 v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 930 (D.C. Cir. 1979). That case is also one in which the employees discharged had left work voluntarily and not subject to subpoena. No one who read the Board's Rich Plan decision, dissent, and appeal, or the Earringhouse decision and appeal, could possibly, under any circumstances, ever consider that they applied to the fact situation present here and known to the Respondent, to wit, that subpoenas had already been served on the employees. Respondent must eventually realize that although a business has a recognized right to restrain employees from leaving work for voluntary purposes, it has no right to interfere with the writ of subpoena, one of the great writs of English common law and on which much of our present trial procedure is based.

Respondent's second argument is that the discipline imposed on Thompson and Fulcher was not the result of their testifying at a Board hearing or responding to a subpoena, but because of their failure to follow employer policy to give prior notice of inability to be at work, because of alleged participation in a secret union plot to damage the Employer by subpoenaing the employees most necessary to business operations, and because of their refusal to give written statements asking to be rehired.[4] The issue here is, however, exactly that of Walt Disney World Co., 216 NLRB 836, 837-839 (1975). The following extensive quotation expresses the law on point in full, and is on all fours with the matter herein:

> The Act and the Rules and Regulations of the Board clearly provide that a person served with a subpena is required to appear and to give testimony pursuant to the subpena. . . . A respondent employer's "obligation with respect to subpoenaed employee witnesses is one of noninterference, nonrestraint and noncoercion as to such employees' right and obligation to attend scheduled hearings as subpoenaed witnesses, and one of nonreprisal to such employees because they are subpoenaed witnesses." (Emphasis added.) "Once an employee has been subpoenaed," the Supreme Court has said, "he should be protected from retaliatory action regardless of whether he has filed a charge or has actually testified."
> Respondent contends that it disciplined Davis and Winkler not because of their attendance at the NLRB hearing or for responding to an NLRB subpena, but because they violated established and recognized company rules concerning the proper procedures for seeking an authorized leave of absence. But Respondent's rules of procedure cannot limit or restrict an individual's obligation to respond to a Board subpena. . . .
> As this conduct had the tendency to deprive the employees of vindication by the Board of their statutory rights, it violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Moreover, as Respondent's disciplinary action against Winkler and Davis tended to restrain them and other employees from participating in Board proceedings, we find that by such conduct Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

Arguing against its own position, Respondent's brief even quotes from Walt Disney World Co., supra, that

> If [the employer] anticipated that the attendance [of the employees] at the hearing would be seriously disruptive of its operations, the remedy was not to warn the employees not to respond to the subpoenas, but to work out an accommodation . . . . [216 NLRB at 838, fn. 9, emphasis added.]

Although time was short and accommodation might not have been possible, Respondent made no attempt to do anything but threaten the subpoenaed employees. The fact of the threat, an interference with and restraint, and coercion of not only Thompson and Fulcher but of all employees in the exercise of their rights, was of itself a full and complete violation of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act. The attempt to force Thompson and Fulcher to give written excuses, like schoolboys, before they would be permitted to return to work after obeying the subpoenas, was demeaning in the extreme and whether planned as such was to be an excellent demonstration to all the employees attempting to unionize that their rights are not protected by law but entirely subject to the Employer's dictates.

As in Walt Disney World Co., supra, and other cases, in view of finding violations of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act, it is not necessary to decide whether, as alleged ing of subquotes not as orally stated, but as per counsel's emphasis. Obvious subquote is as to words "must be balanced.") (Emphasis added to both quotations.)

[4] On these points Respondent relies entirely upon matters not admitted into evidence, placed in the record only as an offer of proof, as to which counsel for the General Counsel properly did not raise other valid objections, cross-examine, or present rebuttal.

in the complaint, the foregoing conduct was also a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, inasmuch as the remedy would be the same even if the additional violations were found.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The conduct of Respondent set forth above has a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tends to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent Southern Foods, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Sections 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act by interfering with the process of this Board through threatening and discriminatorily interfering with the employment of Donnie Thompson and of Charles Fulcher for absenting themselves from work without authority in order to attend an NLRB hearing pursuant to subpoena.

3. The unfair labor practices engaged in by Respondent affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom. In order to effectuate the policies of the Act, the Respondent must offer Donnie Thompson and Charles Fulcher reinstatement and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits from 9 January 1987, computed on a quarterly basis from that date to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[5] Because Respondent's conduct demonstrated a general disregard of the employees' fundamental rights to respond to the Board's subpoena, I find it necessary to issue a broad order, requiring Respondent to cease and desist from infringing in any other manner on rights guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act.[6] For the same reasons, and particularly because the violation pertains directly to the integrity of Board process, I find it necessary to include the provision of visitatorial rights for the General Counsel in matters of enforcement.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondent, Southern Foods, Inc., Bowling Green, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interfering with the right of employees to absent themselves from work without authority in order to attend hearings of the National Labor Relations Board pursuant to subpoena.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Donnie Thompson and Charles Fulcher immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Bowling Green, Kentucky, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this Order, the Board, or any of its duly authorized representatives, may obtain discovery from the Respondent, its officers, agents, successors or assigns, or any other person having knowledge concerning any compliance matter, in the manner provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Such discovery shall be conducted under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order and may be had upon any matter reasonably related to compliance with this Order, as enforced by the court.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT interfere with employees leaving work during working hours to attend a Board hearing pursuant to Board subpoena.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Donnie Thompson and Charles Fulcher immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify them that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharges and that their discharges will not be used against them in any way.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 24, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Frank H. Itkin issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to reaffirm its Order previously issued in this proceeding at 275 NLRB 1032 (1985).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board reaffirms its Order previously issued in this proceeding at 275 NLRB 1032 (1985).

---

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions Unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

FRANK H. ITKIN, Administrative Law Judge. On July 9, 1985, the Board found in the instant case that Respondent Employer had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by failing and refusing to reinstate certain of its employees engaged in an economic strike on the Union's September 30, 1979 unconditional application on their behalf to return to work, and by instead thereafter hiring four new employees and reinstating one striker out of seniority.[1] The Board's Decision and Order are reported at 275 NLRB 1032. The Employer had argued, inter alia, that the underlying unfair labor practice charge, filed by the Union in the instant case on January 26, 1983, and amended on March 28, 1983, was time-barred under Section 10(b) of the Act. The Board, in rejecting this contention, found:

> Respondent, by refusing from October 1979 until November 1982 to furnish the Union with the requested names of new hires and their dates of hire, unlawfully concealed from the Union the information necessary to put the Union on notice of the Laidlaw violations. Once provided with that information, the Union filed the instant charge within the limitations period . . . .

On October 28, 1986, the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, on cross-applications for review and enforcement of the Board's Order in the instant case, vacated the Board's Order and remanded the case for further proceedings. The court found that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that the Union had made an unconditional application on behalf of the strikers to return to work on September 30, 1979. The court, in discussing the 10(b) issue, stated: "Whether this is viewed as a case of unlawful concealment or an application of the general rule that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the moving party discovers or should have discovered the relevant facts, the Union must meet the due diligence requirement"; "there is absent any discussion of the due diligence factor by either the ALJ or the Board"; and

> The ALJ and the Board therefore may have applied an incorrect legal standard in failing to consider whether the Union had exercised due diligence in discovering the operative facts giving rise to its claim of an unfair labor practice when the Company hired replacement employees.

Accordingly, the court remanded this case "in order that the NLRB may ascertain whether the Union exercised due diligence in discovering the facts giving rise to its claim."[2]

On May 19, 1987, the Board issued its Order remanding the instant proceeding to the administrative law judge. The Board noted that it had accepted the court's remand and had notified the parties that it would take appropriate action consistent with the court's remand; that, having considered the entire record, it "finds that the fact-finding desired by the Court cannot be made on the basis of the evidence in the existing record"; and that, consequently, it is remanding the case to the administrative law judge for a further hearing.

On May 27, 1987, the administrative law judge thereupon issued a notice of hearing on remand. A supplemental hearing was held on July 7, 1987, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. On the entire record in this proceeding, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

[2] Circuit Judge Weis, in his concurring and dissenting opinion, joined in the opinion of the court "explaining the legal error in the standard used by the Board to toll"; however, he would not have remanded the case to the Board.

FINDINGS OF FACT[3]

The Union was certified by the Board as collective-bargaining agent of the Employer's New Castle, Pennsylvania production and maintenance employees in 1973. The parties thereafter entered into a series of collective-bargaining agreements. On February 20, 1979, the parties began negotiations for a new agreement. On April 25, 1979, the employees went on strike in support of their contract demands. There were at the time some 108 production and maintenance employees. On June 25, 1979, the Employer notified the striking employees that it intended to resume operations and would replace strikers who did not return to work. On September 27, 1979, the Employer discharged certain strikers for strike misconduct. On September 30, 1979, the Union made an unconditional application on behalf of the strikers to return to work. The Employer, by letter dated October 5, 1979, withdrew recognition from the Union.

On October 19, 1979, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges in Case 6-CA-12842. An amended charge was filed on December 21, 1979. The General Counsel issued a complaint in that proceeding alleging, inter alia, that the Employer had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by inducing employees to sign a petition asserting that they no longer wished to be represented by the Union; by discharging three employees for alleged strike misconduct; by refusing to acknowledge, reduce to writing, execute or be bound by the collective-bargaining agreement agreed to by the parties at strike's end; and by withdrawing recognition from the Union. Hearings on this complaint were held before an administrative law judge on April 28 and 29 and May 6, 1980. The administrative law judge issued his decision on October 15, 1980. The Board, on review, issued its Decision and Order on April 6, 1981, reported at 255 NLRB 620. The Board found that the Employer had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union; by refusing to acknowledge, reduce to writing, execute, and abide by the contract agreed to by the parties at strike's end; by inducing, encouraging, and aiding employees on the Employer's premises during worktime to circulate and sign anti Union petitions; and by discharging strikers for alleged misconduct. On June 29, 1982, the United States Court of Appeals for The Third Circuit, insofar as pertinent here, sustained the Board's findings, in its Decision reported at 683 F.2d 731.

The instant case involves, as noted, the poststrike reinstatement rights of the economic strikers. The earlier proceedings, as demonstrated above, did not involve this issue. For, as the Board explained in 275 NLRB at 1032 fn. 1, the reinstatement rights of the economic strikers were not the subject of the earlier charges; the Union did not make its unconditional application on behalf of the strikers until September 30, 1979; the Employer did not subsequently hire any new employees until commencing on October 8, 1979; and the charge filed on October 19, 1979, "did not raise or encompass any Laidlaw violations." Moreover, Howard Grossinger, attorney for the Union, as previously found (275 NLRB at 1033), credibly explained that he was not then aware of the hiring of new employees or reinstatement of strikers "after October 1, 1979"; the earlier charges had no "purpose with respect to any post-October 1, 1979 hirings and reinstatements"; and > we knew of no post-October 1, 1979 replacements or hires by [Respondent] for those who were on strike or in jobs formerly held by those on strike.

There were some 108 production and maintenance unit employees as of April 25, 1979. As previously found (275 NLRB at 1037–1038), the Employer hired some 50 striker replacements between July 30 and September 28, 1979. On September 17, 1979, James Ferber, the Employer's attorney, gave the Union a document stating generally that 48 striker replacements had been hired. Ferber acknowledged that no "names" of "new employees" were furnished to the Union, " just numbers." As of September 30, when the Union made its unconditional application to return on behalf of the strikers, there were some 38 employees still on strike; approximately 20 strikers had returned to work before strike's end. On October 5 the Employer unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union. On October 8 the Union "request[ed] the names of the employees who were hired on or after July 30, 1979, the date of hire and the job that they were hired for." On October 8 the employer hired new employee Lumley; on October 9 it hired new employees Mains and Farah; on October 15 it hired new employee Martin; and on or about October 22 it reinstated less senior employee Johnson. On October 16 the Employer—in response to the Union's request of October 8—refused to furnish the Union with the requested information because "the Company has no legal obligation to furnish you with any information . . . ." Later, following issuance of the administrative law judge's decision in the earlier proceeding, the Union, on November 3, 1980, again requested the Employer to provide, inter alia, "a list of all new employees hired since the last day of September 1979 . . . ." On November 10 the Employer again refused because "there is no obligation on the Company's part to recognize, deal with or furnish any information to your organization . . . ." The Board issued its Decision and Order in the initial case on April 6, 1981. The Employer again persisted in its refusal to "meet with" the Union or "comply with any of [its] requests . . . ." Following issuance of the Court's decision in the initial case, the Union, on October 8, 1982, again renewed its request. The Employer first furnished the requested data on November 15, 1982, and the instant charge was filed on January 26, 1983. (See Jt. Exhs. 4–7 and 9–11.)

As previously found (275 NLRB at 1038), Union Attorney Grossinger credibly testified that, during the investigation of Case 6-CA-12842, he never raised "with the investigator the issue of post-October 1, 1979 hires and reinstatements as a possible violation." Grossinger explained that he was "unaware of post-October 1, 1979 hiring by Garrett Railroad in the particular jobs in dispute." Grossinger, "up to and including the time that the hearing took place in April of 1980 in Case 6-CA-12842," "didn't know that any hirings had taken place." Union Representative Clarence Mannarino credibly testified that prior to the receipt of Joint Exhibit 11, dated November 15, 1982, he too had "no information from the Company" that Lumley or Mains or Farah or Martin had been hired or Johnson had been reinstated during October 1979; he had "no information from the Company whatsoever who was hired or when they hired them or whatever"; "Prior to the receipt of that letter [he had] no knowledge whatsoever." Mannarino explained that "during the investigation" of Case 6-CA-12842, he did not "raise with the NLRB any allegation that the Company violated the Act by hiring new employees after October 1, 1979, or reinstating employees after October 1, 1979." Local Union President Richard Luffey credibly testified that prior to mid-November 1982, he too had no knowledge that the Company had hired Lumley or Mains or Farah or Martin or had reinstated Johnson during October 1979. Luffey denied that, "in [his] capacity as president of the Local Union, during the investigation and processing of 6-CA-12842, [he] . . . had any discussions with any representative of the NLRB in which [he] contended that the Company violated the Act by hiring Lumley, Mains, Farah and Martin in October 1979." He also denied "raising any contention that the Company violated the Act by reinstating Johnson." Dennis Boots, head of the union grievance committee, similarly denied such "knowledge." Union Representative Mannarino also credibly noted that, after the 1979 strike commenced, "no Union dues [were] paid." Joint Exhibit 15 shows that some 20 strikers abandoned the strike before its end. And, local union officers were not included in the group of recalled remaining strikers.

[3] "S.Tr." references are to the supplemental transcript of hearing; "S.G.C. Exh." references are to supplemental General Counsel's Exhibits; and "S.R. Exh." references are to supplemental Respondent's Exhibits. "Tr.," "G.C. Exh," "R. Exh.," and "Jt. Exh." references are to the initial transcript, General Counsel's Exhibits, Respondent's Exhibits, and Joint Exhibits, respectively, in the instant proceeding.

Clarence Mannarino, who has since retired as a union representative, testified again in these supplemental proceedings. He again explained that, prior to receipt in November 1982 of the requested information concerning hires by the Employer since September 30, 1979, he had no independent knowledge that Lumley, Farah, Martin, or Mains had been hired from October 8 to October 15 and that Johnson had been reinstated shortly thereafter. Mannarino was asked whether he had attempted to get this "information from any other source." He explained that "there is no other source of information"; the Employer "did not recall any Union officers to work" following the strike; "the employees that were working in the plant . . . did not support the Union"; "no one was paying any Union dues"; and > the only thing we did was keeping our ears open to see if we could get any information or rumors, and there were none [concerning the hirings in question.]

He also explained that "there was no basis to file" an unfair labor practice charge before the November 1982 disclosure of the poststrike hires because

> We had no general information or specific information that such hirings took place. Consequently, the Union would not have been in a position with the evidence to be presented [to] support . . . that charge.

Further, he did not ask counsel for the General Counsel during the initial proceedings "to attempt to secure that information" because "such requests would have been fruitless." The Employer had made clear "that they were not going to comply" with the earlier outstanding administrative law judge's and Board's decisions.

On cross-examination, Mannarino acknowledged that, prior to the strike, he "knew a lot of the employees that worked there"; however, "There was a heck of a lot of people I know of by face, but not a name. Mannarino was present periodically at the picket line during the strike, which ended on September 28, 1979. Local Union President and senior employee Richard Luffey was present at the picket line "regularly." Union Officer Jennings Dean was also at the picket line. Further, Mannarino recalled, during the strike,

> We [the pickets and union officials] never seen the employees, the scabs that they hired, the replacements, because the Company transported those people by vans . . . enclosed, they were closed up, no windows . . . . You couldn't see who was going in, how many was going in . . . .

From the strike's end in September 1979 until the Employer furnished the requested information in November 1982, Mannarino admittedly did not go to the Employer's premises "to observe who was going in and out of the plant." Mannarino was questioned if he had asked the local union representatives "to find out the identities of the people that was back at work." He explained that he did ask and was informed "none of the boys would want to say anything. They were strictly—they were just anti-Union."

James Hill, general foreman for the Employer, testified that Johnson was a member of the Union prior to the strike; that Local Union Representatives Luffy and Dean knew Johnson "by sight"; that Johnson drove to work at the plant after the strike and parked on the lot; that Union Representative Luffy never asked Hill "how many people were working at Garrett after September 30, 1979" or "whether any individuals were hired after September 30, 1979"; that Union Representative Dean also did not ask him similar questions; and that he never saw Union Representatives Luffy, Dean, or Boots in the plant parking lot "observing who was coming or going from the plant." It is undisputed that Luffy was seventh on the plant "seniority list" and Johnson was 28th. (See Jt. Exh. 23.)

On cross-examination, Hill was asked "If Mr. Luffy or Mr. Dean had asked you about who had been hired after the strike ended, would you have told them?" Hill replied: "I wouldn't have answered them."[4]

Discussion

The Board has accepted the remand of the court of appeals. The law of the case was stated by the court, as follows:

> Congress has adopted a policy under the National Labor Relations Act "to bar litigation over past events after records have been destroyed, witnesses had gone elsewhere, and recollections of the events in question have become dim and confused . . . and of course to stabilize existing bargaining relationships." Local Lodge No. 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411, 419 (1960). Section 10(b) of the statute was enacted in response to the complaint that people were being required to respond to stale charges. Id. at 424. [Quotation of Sec. 10(b) of the Act omitted.]
> Clearly more than six months had elapsed before the Union filed the unfair labor charge in this proceeding, but federal statutes of limitations are subject to the equitable discovery doctrine. This tolling rule provides that a limitation period begins to run when the claimant discovers, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have discovered, the acts constituting the alleged violation. NLRB v. Don Burgess Constr. Co., 596 F. 2d 378 (9th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Allied Prod. Corp., 548 F.2d 644 (6th Cir. 1977).
> Holmberg v. Armbrecht, 327 U.S. 392, 397 (1946), articulated a refinement of the doctrine for cases of fraudulent concealment:
> > Where a plaintiff has been injured by fraud and remains in ignorance of it without any fault or want of diligence or care on his part, the bar of the statute does not begin to run until the fraud is discovered, though there be no special circumstances or efforts on the part of the party committing the fraud to conceal it from the knowledge of the other party.
> The court observed further, "[t]his equitable doctrine is read into every federal statute of limitations." Id.
> Subsequent case law confirms that due diligence is an essential constituent of the tolling rule. It is applied even where there has been fraudulent concealment. In those instances, the courts have stated that "merely intoning the word 'fraudulently' is not sufficient to avoid the statute . . . [T]he elements of this counterpoise . . . ." include the exercise of due diligence. Charlotte Telecasters, Inc. v. Jefferson-Pilot Corp., 546 F.2d 570, 574 (4th Cir. 1976). A party's mere ignorance of the circumstances "does not constitute due diligence to discover the operative facts of his claims." Shapiro v. Cook United, Inc., 762 F.2d 49, 51 (6th Cir. 1985); see also Demars v. General Dynamics Corp., 779 F.2d 95, 99 (1st Cir. 1985); Metz v. Tootsie Roll Indus., Inc., 715 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1983).

The equitable discovery doctrine, as shown in the court's opinion, has been considered on many occasions by the Board and courts. See also Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 463 F.2d 907, 921–923 (D.C. Cir. 1972) ("the company actively concealed from the union its decision to relocate . . . but also the circumstances surrounding the decision"); ACF Industries v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 422, 429–431 (8th Cir. 1979) ("fraudulent concealment of vital information" pertaining to subcontracting); Baskin v. Hawley, 807 F.2d 1120, 1130–1131 (2d Cir. 1986) ("active concealment" in an action arising out of loss of pension benefits). The court explained in Baskin v. Hawley, supra:

> There was evidence of active concealment. Concealing the actionability of a known injury is sufficient to toll the statute of limitations. . . . [See cases cited.]
> . . . .
> Nor was the proof of [claimant's] diligence inadequate to support this finding. It is settled that reasonable diligence does not require a person to commence a lawsuit in order to procure court-ordered discovery of concealed facts.

And in Glazier Steel Corp. v. Toyomenka, Inc., 392 F.Supp. 500 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1974), the court also observed:

> Defendants' resistance to discovery made it impossible for plaintiff to obtain information regarding its cause of action. It is true that "mere silence, where there is no duty to speak, does not toll the statute" . . . . However, the history of discovery in this case contains several instances in which judges and magistrates held that defendants were under a "duty to speak." In these circumstances, their failure to do so may well have constituted an active concealment.

For, courts have tolled statutes of limitations in cases where, inter alia, a party failed "to disclose information which he had a statutory duty to disclose and such nondisclosure prevented a plaintiff from realizing that he possessed an actionable claim." Cf. Knight v. Brown Transport Corp., 806 F.2d 479, 484 (3d Cir. 1986).

The credible evidence of record in the instant case shows that the Union did not know which employees the Employer may have hired or reinstated following the strike, when they may have been hired or reinstated and for what jobs they may have been hired or reinstated. The Union repeatedly requested such information from the Employer. The Employer, as part of its adamant refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union, refused to disclose this and related information. The Employer was under a statutory duty to disclose such information to the Union. Thus, as the Board found, the Employer, > by refusing from October 1979 until November 1982 to furnish the Union with the requested names of new hires and their dates of hire, unlawfully con-any, arise in the inferences and interpretations to be drawn from their supplemental testimony.

cealed from the Union the information necessary to put the Union on notice of the Laidlaw violations.

Union Representative Mannarino, in the initial and supplemental hearings, credibly testified that prior to receipt in November 1982 of the requested information concerning the hires and reinstatements since September 30, 1979, he had no independent knowledge that Lumley, Farah, Martin, or Mains had been hired from October 8 to October 15, 1979, or that Johnson had been reinstated shortly thereafter. He credibly explained that there was "no other source" for such "information"; the Employer "did not recall any Union officers to work" following the strike; the "employees that were working" (including the some 20 persons who had abandoned the strike and 50 striker replacements) "did not support the Union"; "no one was paying Union dues"; and there were no "rumors" concerning such hirings. He credibly recalled asking local union representatives "to find out the identities of the people that was back at work" and he was told that "none of the boys would want to say anything . . . [t]hey were just anti-union." Indeed, General Foreman Hill, a former employee and union official, candidly acknowledged that if local union representatives "had asked [him] about who had been hired after the strike ended," he "wouldn't have answered them." This record makes it clear that any additional requests for such information would have been an exercise in futility.

The Employer suggests in its brief that the Union should have gone to the plant entrance at strike's end and observed who was going to work. The Employer does not adequately explain how, by such observation of some 70 persons going to work including 50 striker replacements covertly transported to and from the plant during the strike, the Union would have been able to determine that new employees Lumley, Farah, Mains, and Martin had been hired after the strike, when they had been hired, and for what jobs they had been hired. The Employer also suggests that the Union, by standing at the plant entrance after the strike, would have ultimately spotted Johnson going to work; he was a more junior employee than senior unreinstated employees; and "thus the Union would have discovered a Laidlaw violation. However, the Employer does not adequately explain how, by such observation, the Union would have been able to determine exactly when Johnson was recalled or for what job he was recalled. Significantly, the Employer previously argued in this case that it had made a "commitment," prior to the strike's end, "to reinstate former striker Johnson." 275 NLRB at 1032 fn. 3.

In addition, Union Representative Mannarino credibly explained why no unfair labor practice charges were filed before the November 1982 disclosure of this information. The Union had "no basis to" file such charges; it had no "general information or specific information that such hirings took place"; and, consequently, it would not have been able to support such charges and would have thus risked a dismissal or withdrawal. Moreover, Mannarino credibly explained that he did not ask the General Counsel "to attempt to secure that information" during the earlier proceedings because, in view of the Employer's steadfast refusal to recognize and bargain, such a request would have been "fruitless."

In sum, I find and conclude that the Employer, in violation of its statutory duty, actively and unlawfully concealed from the Union the requested information pertaining to its poststrike hires and reinstatement; this requested information was necessary for the Union to file the instant unfair labor practice charge; the Union, in the exercise of reasonable due diligence, was unable to obtain this necessary information from any other source; and, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, the statute of limitations should be tolled during the pertinent 1979–1982 period. I would therefore recommend to the Board that it again adopt the findings, conclusions, and order as set forth in 275 NLRB 1032.[5]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On July 27, 1987, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a response brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to pay Gail Davis her Christmas bonus and by her subsequent discharge in January 1986. Davis was a long-term employee who had worked with Lieberman and Segal, the owners of the Respondent, for 5 years when she was discharged.[3] The judge found and we agree that during the organizational campaign Lieberman and Segal visited the stores in order to conduct one-on-one interviews with employees in which they repeatedly committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. It is clear that when the owners came to the store in which Davis worked in early December 1985 and she was informed by her store manager that the owners wished to discuss the Union with her in the store's backroom, she declined to participate. This action on Davis' part displayed a lack of receptivity to the Respondent's antiunion message, which message as noted above we have found violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This refusal provided the Respondent with reason to infer that Davis was sympathetic to the Union. It was this very refusal to participate in the antiunion discussion with the owners that her store manager referred to when Davis questioned him about why she was the only employee in her store not to receive a Christmas bonus some 3 weeks later. Davis' understandable reaction to this discriminatory refusal to award her Christmas bonus was to inform her store manager that she would be leaving work early that day. The store manager expressed no problem with Davis' decision to leave early and, thus for the reasons stated in the judge's decision, we agree with his conclusion that Davis had not resigned but rather was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

We also agree with the judge's finding that Ralph Atwell was denied a Christmas bonus and pay raise because of his union activities. The Respondent admitted that it reviewed all employees for pay raises in January 1986. Atwell, whom the judge credited over the Respondent's witnesses, testified that in January 1986 when he requested a pay raise, the only reason Segal gave for denying a raise was that Atwell had given them a difficult time about the Union. Segal had previously confronted Atwell with the allegation that he had heard that Atwell was the ringleader in the Union. Thus, the Respondent's motivation is clearly shown.

We affirm the judge's analysis and conclusion that the Respondent's unlawful conduct warrants a bargaining order under NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). However, in order to require the Respondent to bargain with the Union it is necessary to set aside the election. Irving Air Chute Co., 149 NLRB 627 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 176 (2d Cir. 1965). As noted in the judge's decision, a mail ballot election was conducted from December 19 through 30, 1985; the Union filed timely objections to the election which track the unfair labor practice allegations. The conduct found by the judge to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) is sufficient to warrant setting aside the election and we do so. Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782 (1962).

The judge in his remedy recommended that the Respondent be ordered "not to discontinue its operations, at any of its locations." We find that remedy inappropriate. There is no charge, allega-

[1] The Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The Respondent filed a motion to reopen the hearing to adduce additional evidence regarding the turnover of employees. The Respondent argues, as it has at the hearing and in its exceptions, that a bargaining order is not warranted because the turnover of the employees would dissipate any lingering effects of its alleged unfair labor practices and thus would not prevent the conducting of a second election.

The motion is denied. The Respondent's unfair labor practices were pervasive and serious and committed by the highest management officials. The misconduct was directed at virtually every employee in the bargaining unit. So extensive were the unlawful acts that it is foreseeable that the Respondent's record of coercion would become known to new employees and the impact of the Respondent's violations would be likely to persist despite any turnover, thus preventing the holding of a fair election.

[3] We think it is appropriate to term Davis a long-term employee in light of the Respondent's repeated arguments that turnover at the stores is significant.

tion, or finding that the Respondent discontinued any portion of its operation due to the union activities of its employees. Rather, the allegation is that the Respondent threatened to take such action. Having found that the Respondent violated the Act by threatening its employees with store closure, the judge provided the appropriate remedy, i.e., an appropriate order and the posting of a notice with the requisite language. The judge's proposed remedy goes further and attempts to remedy possible prospective action of the Respondent. In the event the Respondent does close any of its operation because of the activities of its employees on behalf of a union or any other protected activity, charges may be filed, an investigation initiated, and if necessary a complaint issued. At that time, if the allegation is proven, a proper remedy will be ordered. Accordingly, the remedy is modified.

The judge granted a visitatorial provision. Under the circumstances of this case we find it unnecessary to grant such provision. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Amazing Stores, Inc., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraph 1(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

2. Reletter current paragraph 2(e) as paragraph 2(f), delete current paragraph 2(f), and add the following as paragraph 2(e).

"(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way."

3. Add the following as paragraph 2(g).

"(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

4. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

It is further ordered that the election in Case 4-RC-16096 is set aside, and the petition is dismissed.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

We will not interrogate our employees concerning their union activities, nor give them the impression that their union activities are under our surveillance, nor threaten our employees with closure or sale of our stores, nor promise increased benefits to our employees or threaten to take away their benefits, because they have engaged in union activities.

We will not terminate any of our employees nor deprive them of bonuses or pay raises to which they are entitled because of their activities on behalf of the Union or any other labor organization.

We will not in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

We will, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time sales personnel, stock personnel, cashiers and truck drivers employed by the Employer at its 816 Chestnut Street, 1124 Chestnut Street, 1621 Chestnut Street, 7140 Frankford Avenue, 5645 N. 5th St., Academy Plaza, Academy and Red Lion Rds., and 139 W. Chelton Ave., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania locations and its Sharon Hill Plaza, Chester Pike, Sharon Hill, Pennsylvania, 734 Hamilton Street, Allentown, Pennsylvania locations, excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

We will offer Gail Davis immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and we will make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

We will notify her that we have removed from our files any reference to her discharge and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

We will make Ralph Atwell whole for any loss of wages incurred as the result of his being denied a raise by payment of the appropriate sums of money involved, with interest.

We will make Gail Davis and Ralph Atwell whole for any monetary losses they may have suffered by reason of our failure to pay them the 1985 Christmas bonus, with interest.

AMAZING STORES, INC.

Susan L. Stahl, Esq. and Henry R. Protas. Esq., for the General Counsel.

Laurance B. Baccini, Esq. and Dale P. Schomer, Esq. (Schnader, Harrison, Segal & Lewis), of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

DECISION AND REPORT ON OBJECTIONS

George F. McInerny, Administrative Law Judge. This case arises out of several matters filed by United Food and Commercial Workers Local No. 1357, AFL–CIO (the Union), with the Philadelphia Regional Office Region 4. The first matter was a petition filed by the Union on 15 November 1985,[1] in Case 4–RC–16096 seeking an election to be conducted by the Regional Office under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., and certification of the Union as bargaining representative for a unit of employees of Amazing Stores, Inc. (Respondent or the Company). After a stipulation by the Union and the Company, approved by the Regional Office, an election was held by mail ballot between 10 and 30 December among the company's employees. The Union lost the election and filed a series of objections to conduct by the Company that, it was said, affected the results of the election. On 16 July 1986, the Regional Office referred the matter to an administrative law judge for a report on the objections.

Meanwhile, the Union filed a charge against the Company on 10 February 1986, in Case 4–CA–15602, and on 20 March 1986, in Case 4–CA–15683, containing allegations that the Company had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. Then, on 31 July 1986, the Regional Office consolidated all of these cases and issued a complaint and notice of hearing on the consolidated matter. Respondent filed a timely answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Thereafter, on 17, 18, and 19 November 1986, a hearing was held before me at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, at which the Respondent and the General Counsel were represented by counsel, and had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present motions and to make objections, and to argue orally. After the close of the hearing, both the Respondent and the General Counsel submitted briefs, which have been carefully considered.

Based on the entire record, including my observations of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Respondent is a Pennsylvania corporation that maintains retail stores in the city of Philadelphia, and at Sharon Hill and Allentown, Pennsylvania. During the year immediately preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Stipulations

Amazing Stores, Inc. is a chain of nine retail stores selling housewares and giftwares, consisting mainly of closeouts or imports, in the city of Philadelphia and its vicinity. The Company is owned by four individuals, Joseph Lieberman, Jack Segal, Glenn Segal (Jack's son), and Sidney Burezin. It appears from the evidence here that Jack Segal and Joseph Lieberman, referred to respectively as Segal and Lieberman, handle the day-to-day management of the enterprise, assisted by sundry store managers and assistant managers.

It was stipulated by all parties that an appropriate unit for collective bargaining composed:

> All full-time and regular part-time sales personnel, stock personnel, cashiers and truck drivers employed by the Employer at its 816 Chestnut St., 1124 Chestnut St., 1621 Chestnut St., 7140 Frankford Ave., 5645 N. 5th St., Academy Plaza, Academy & Red Lion Rds., and 139 W. Chelten Ave., Phildelphia, PA locations, and its Sharon Hill Plaza,

[1] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise specified.

> Chester Pike, Sharon Hill, PA, 734 Hamilton St., Allentown, PA locations, excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

It was further stipulated that the following named employees were employed in the stipulated bargaining unit during the period from 1 October 1985 through 15 November 1985:

- Roger Parker
- Curtis Leroy Bond
- Lisa Huffnagle
- Chander Lewis
- Maurice Monroe
- Robert Young
- Margaret Smith
- John De Marco
- Nancy E. Powell
- Curtis Snyder Jr.
- Debbie Bruner
- Dan Dihert
- Arlene Tolliver
- Atoinette Walker
- Celia Abraham
- Geneva Henry
- Edward Manwiller
- Robert Snyder
- Ralph Atwell
- Jerome Thomas
- Francine Wilson
- Francys Cotto
- Joyce Florence
- Edward Hutton
- Marlo Jackson
- Richardson Jarman
- Bruce Kraskow
- Sandy Giordano
- Kenneth J. Phillips
- Robert Cressman
- Ellen Faragasso
- Sidney R. Parker
- Peggy Russo
- Steven Carl Calhoun
- Gail Davis

It was further stipulated that certain of these employees had signed cards authorizing the Union, Local 1357, to represent them for purposes of collective bargaining; that the signatures on certain authorization cards are authentic and the cards were signed about the dates appearing thereon; and that the authorization cards received in evidence here are authentic. The names of the individuals so stipulated and the dates appearing on their cards are listed below:

Chander Lewis	Oct. 29, 1985
Marlo Jackson	Nov. 5, 1985
Francys Cotto	Nov. 1, 1985
Kenneth J. Phillips	Oct. 4, 1985
Joyce Florence	Nov. 3, 1985
Curtis Leroy Bond	Nov. 3, 1985
Arlene Siers	Nov. 13, 1985
Curtis Snyder, Jr.	Nov. 25, 1985
Sidney R. Parker	Nov. 3, 1985
Richardson Jarman	Nov. 3, 1985
Steven Carl Calhoun	Oct 25, 1985
Jerome Thomas	Nov. 11, 1985
Francine Wilson	Oct. 25, 1985
Marie Barseghian	Nov. 4, 1985
Karen Andrews	Nov. 4, 1985
Ralph Atwell	Nov. 2, 1985
Lisa Huffnagle	Nov. 3, 1985
John De Marco	Nov. 7, 1985
Roger Parker	Nov. 3, 1985
Edward Hutton	Oct. 25, 1985
Robert Cressman	Nov. 13, 1985
Arlene Tolliver	Nov. 2, 1985
Nancy E. Powell	Nov. 8, 1985
Gail Davis	Oct. 29, 1985

The parties agreed not to agree on the status of three individuals, Marie Barseghian, Arlene Siers, and Karen Andrews. The General Counsel and the Union contend that these people were permanent full-time or regular part-time employees who should be included in the above-stipulated unit, the Company arguing that they were temporary employees who should be excluded from the said unit. Karen Andrews testified that she was hired as a full-time, permanent employee. However, Joseph Lieberman testified that Andrews was "seasonal." He said he did not "plan on her" being permanent, but admitted that at no point was Andrews told she was only temporary. Ellen Nancy Faragasso, the manager of the Company's Frankford Avenue Store, testified that Andrews was only temporary. I cannot find on this evidence that Andrews was a permanent full-time employee from October to December 1985.

Barseghian did not testify, but Faragasso and Lieberman testified that she was hired in September or October, and resigned, of her own accord, in June 1986. There is no indication that she could not have continued to work if she had not resigned. I find Barseghian to have been a full-time, permanent employee in October, November, and December 1985.

Arlene Siers did not testify and there was no evidence in this record on her status. I make no finding whether she was a full-time, permanent employee.

Based on these findings, I would add the name of Barseghian to the stipulated list of employees given above, making a total of 36 names. I would then delete the name of Arlene Siers from the list of cardsigners, leaving 23 names. Since a total of 18 persons would constitute a majority of the employees stipulated as being in the unit, I find, referring to the stipulated dates on the cards, that the Union had a majority, in effect stipulated to by the parties, on and after 7 November 1985.

B. Organization and Request for Recognition

John Myerson, an organizing representative for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, testified that he received a telephone call on 27 October from Steven Calhoun, an employee of the Company, indicating an interest in organizing a union at the Company. On 29 October, a meeting was held at a Roy Rogers restaurant in downtown Philadelphia between Myerson and four employees representing the Company's three Chestnut Street stores. Myerson explained what had to be done to organize the stores, and he distributed authorization cards to the employees who were there.

Additional meetings were held on 3 November at the home of employee Ralph Atwell, and on 24 November at the Union's offices. By the second week in November, as stated by Myerson, and as I have already found, the Union had valid authorization cards from a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit.

On Friday, 15 November, Myerson and another union representative went to the Company's office at 4530 Lacony Street and there spoke to Jack Segal. The union representatives presented Segal with a letter demanding recognition and, according to Myerson, told him that they represented a majority of the Company's employees, and requested that he recognize the Union as the bargaining representative for the Company's employees. Segal then asked if they knew how many people were employed at Amazing Stores. When the union representatives told him, Segal accused these people of being "ingrates" and pointed out that he had personally helped many of his employees during the course of their employment and, finally, said he was going to refer the matter to his attorney.

Segal's version of this meeting stated that the union representatives began by telling him that they had, not a majority, but over 30-percent signature cards. Segal asked if he could see the cards and was refused. He then denied that he had used the word "ingrates" to describe his employees, but did say that he told the union representatives that he could not understand why his employees had gone to the Union, emphasizing his generosity and fairness to the employees.

The testimony by Myerson that he requested recognition based on a union majority is much more logical than Segal's statement that the union representatives said only that they had over 30 percent of the people signed up. There would have been no point in Myerson's trip out to the Company's headquarters if all he was going to say was that the Union had over 30 percent of the cards signed. He could have notified the Company of that either directly, by letter, or by filing a petition with the Board's Regional Office. That office, in turn, would have notified the Company. Segal must have been referring in his testimony to something he had heard, somewhere, about an administrative requirement for 30-percent cards signed in order to process an election petition.[2] While I found Segal to be a truthful witness, I think that his testimony shows that he did not have a good memory in recalling individual conversations that occurred in connection with this case. In this instance, as in others, Segal just did not accurately recall the content of the conversation with Myerson and his associate.

C. The Company's Reaction

Whether Segal actually used the word "ingrates" in referring to his employees, there is no dispute that he was hurt and upset by the news that the employees had selected, or were going to select, a union to represent them. He had, according to his testimony, never had trouble negotiating with any of his employees. He felt that he had never been unfair to any employee. He did not recall ever turning down an employee for a raise, and did recall many instances where raises were given without even a request by the employee. He had never refused anybody anything within reason, he had helped people buy houses, helped them in times of stress, had lent money constantly at no interest, even though he had to pay interest when he borrowed.

Moreover, Segal testified, he personally felt that if the Company had a union, he just, at this stage in his life,[3] did not want strangers dictating to him. He therefore decided that if they had a union he just could not live with it.

A few days after the 15 November meeting, Lieberman and Glenn Segal returned to Philadelphia from out of town and the three of them sat down to discuss the union situation. Segal told his associates that if the Union came in he would like to take his share of the equity in the Company in stores rather than in dollars. He would then sell these stores for dollars. Two of the three other owners of the business, Glenn Segal and Sidney Burezin, did not testify at this hearing. Leiberman did testify, and stated that he, too, was going to sell the stores if the Union came in.

There is no indication, in this record, of any discussions among management people of any concerted plan of opposition to the Union. Segal and Lieberman both testified that during the union campaign, in November and December, they heard from their store managers that the union activity was upsetting employees and impairing efficiency in the stores. Segal and Lieberman therefore determined to visit the stores and talk to as many individual employees as would talk to them about the Union and its impact on the Company.[4] Segal tried to downplay the fact that he and Lieberman visited all the stores and made efforts to contact, personally, each and every employee with their message of opposition to the Union, but he did not deny that this is what he and Lieberman did.

The procedure followed was for Segal and Lieberman, or one or the other of them, to go to a store and have the manager ask the employees to come to a back room to talk with whichever manager was present.[5] It is the content of these meetings that is alleged by the General Counsel to contain violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

D. Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

The General Counsel brought in a number of witnesses who testified about matters contained in the complaint. The testimony of these witnesses consisted principally of reports of the meetings held by Segal and Leiberman, together or separately. All the General Counsel's witnesses agreed that they were asked to participate in these meetings either on request of the store managers or by encountering Segal or Lieberman in their stores. After listening to a number of these witnesses relate substantially identical versions of what occurred in these meetings, I declined to allow the General Counsel to adduce further testimony on the proposed sale of the stores or the promises of improved working conditions. Offers of proof made by the General Counsel did not induce me to change my mind. At the most, the additional evidence proposed to be adduced would have been redundant, merely adding additional testimony on the same type of allegations for which this decision will afford adequate relief.

---

[2] Lieberman testified that Segal told him that the Union men told him that they had a "majority of our employees signing cards that they wanted a Union."

[3] Segal is not a young man, but he appeared trim and vigorous—certainly not doddering nor incapable of the daily tasks in running a business.

[4] Segal and Lieberman were accustomed to visiting all the stores on a regular basis, but they did not as a rule stop and talk to employees during those visits other than to exchange greetings or pass the time of day.

[5] The evidence is undisputed that Segal did most of the talking, but Lieberman joined in from time to time. Several employees could not remember which of the managers said what at their meeting.

With a single exception,[6] I found the General Counsel's witnesses to be generally credible. Although no one, either the witnesses for the General Counsel or the Respondent, were very precise on dates or details, this is not a case that will turn on the exact day or hour a particular event occurred. The facts as related by the General Counsel's witnesses concerning the threats to close the stores, or to sell out to Korean purchasers were consistent, were mutually corroborated without appearing staged, and were frankly admitted by Segal and Lieberman. Similarly, other complaint allegations including promises of benefits, solicitation of grievances, withholding of bonuses from individuals and from all the employees, were consistently related by employee witnesses and not seriously controverted by the Respondent's witnesses. In other parts of the complaint, including the alleged discharge of Gail Davis and the layoff of Karen Andrews, there are some issues of credibility that I attempt, below, to resolve.

Turning to the specific testimony, Francys Cotto, an employee of the Company's store at 16th and Chestnut Streets, testified that about 2 weeks before the ballots were to be turned in to the Board's Regional Office, her manager, Trace Dribier, told her to go to the back of the store and talk to Segal and Lieberman. According to Cotto, both Segal and Lieberman talked to her. They said that things were going to get better if they did not have a union. They also said that they would sell the store if they had a union. Segal did not deny this last statement, adding, in his testimony concerning this meeting, that he did not want anyone putting a hand in his pocket, and that his plans were to sell some of the stores. Lieberman testified that Cotto told Segal and he that she was being harassed by other employees, but he had no memory of what Segal may have said to Cotto.

Marlo Jackson, an employee at the 11th and Chestnut Streets store at the time of the union campaign, testified that his manager, Joe Giordano, told him that Segal and Lieberman wanted to meet with him in the back room of the store. Jackson went to the back room and met with Segal and Lieberman. Segal did most of the talking, telling Jackson that if the Union got in they would sell the stores, but if not, the employees would get a raise. Jackson further said that the employees discussed their conversations with Segal and Lieberman and the selling of the stores. About 2 weeks after this conversation, Jackson said he saw Sid Burezin, one of the Company's owners, in the store showing an oriental man around the premises. Neither Segal nor Burezin testified about the matter.

Robert Cressman worked at the Frankford Avenue store at the time of the union campaign, and at the time he testified here, almost a year later, he had been promoted to manager at the 1124 Chestnut Street location. Cressman testified that Lieberman approached him in the back room of the Frankford Avenue store in mid-December and asked if he knew anything about the Union. At this time Cressman had signed a union authorization card, had given a card to another employee, Karen Andrews, and had attended at least one union meeting. However, he replied to Lieberman's question by saying no. Leiberman said that he thought Cressman would know about the Union because Ralph Atwell, the company's driver and deliverer, "was going around telling people" about the Union.

A bit later Lieberman again asked Cressman what he thought about the Union. Cressman answered that he did not care. He said that he needed his job, and asked Lieberman for medical coverage and a transfer out of that store. Lieberman responded to this by saying that he would get Cressman out of that store by March, and would see what he could do about medical coverage.

At another meeting, in about the same period, and on a Friday night, Lieberman, together with Jack and Glenn Segal, engaged Cressman in conversation. Cressman said they were all talking, again asking about the Union, and again he said he did not care about it. They told him that if the Union came in they would sell the stores individually to Koreans and that the employees would lose their jobs. After this Cressman stated that he saw Lieberman in the Frankford Avenue store accompanied by a Korean man.

At the time that the employees were preparing the mail ballots to send to the Board's Regional Office, Cressman testified that he overheard Lieberman telling employees Marie Barseghian and Sid Parker[7] that if they brought their ballots in to him he would stamp and mail them.

Lieberman had very little precise recollection about these conversations. He did state that Cressman had told him he did not care about the Union, but could not recall who initiated the discussion about the Union. Lieberman further verified that he told Cressman that "we would be moving him up," and that the Company would sell the stores if the Union came in. Lieberman testified that he told employees to be sure to vote and to get their ballots in. He did say that Barseghian had offered to show her ballot to him, but that he told her that she did not have to prove anything to him. Segal testified that he did not remember much about the interviews with Cressman.

Lisa Huffnagle was working as a cashier at the 11th and Chestnut Streets store in the fall of 1985. She was friendly with Robert Cressman and in November or December went to see him at the Frankford Avenue store. While there she ran into Segal who asked her what she thought of the Union. Huffnagle was afraid for her job and said nothing. Segal then asked what he could do for her, adding that he would give her a "little bit more" money if the Union did not get in. Emboldened by this, Huffnagle asked about medical benefits. Segal said no, but repeated that he would give her more money. Segal told her that he did not want the Union in because he would "have bosses over top of him." At this point in the conversation Lieberman came up to where Segal and [6] Employee Roger Parker seemed to me to be a preoccupied witness with only a limited sense of his relation to the subject matter of his testimony. I do not credit his statements regarding the issues herein.

[7] Erroneously referred to in the transcript as "Sue" Parker.

Huffnagle were talking. Segal then said that the stores Would close if the Union got in, that they would sell the stores one by one to Koreans. Huffnagle later saw a person she described as a Korean at the store with Segal, and later with Lieberman. She stated that she had never seen Koreans in that store before.

Huffnagle also testified that Jim Giordano, the manager of the 11th and Chestnut store in the fall of 1985, told her that if the Union got in the stores would close immediately.

Segal testified that he believed he had met with Lisa Huffnagle, but that "that one is a little vague to me." Lieberman did recall that Huffnagle mentioned problems at 11th Street but he was also very vague and general about what was said in his talk with Huffnagle. He did say that she had asked for more money but he and Segal told him they could not give anyone raises at that time.

Giordano, an admitted supervisor, did not testify at all.

Arlene Tolliver is a cashier at the 8th and Chestnut Street store. About a month before she was to mail in her ballot, she was working at the Chelton Avenue store and testified that Jack Segal approached her in the back room of that store. Segal began by asking Tolliver if she had "any gripes." This apparently was repeated, and finally Tolliver told Segal that she was not happy with the fact that she had not received a raise for a year and a half. Segal said he was sorry and that he would see what he could do after the union vote. Nothing could be done right then. He also said that he would close the stores down if the Union got in.

Segal not only did not deny these statements attributed to him, but added that at that meeting Tolliver asked for, and was granted, a day off on Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday, which happened to be the same day as her own birthday.

Francine Wilson is a cashier at 11th and Chestnut and was employed at 8th and Chestnut at the time of the union campaign late in 1985. She had attended union meetings and had assisted in the processing of employee authorization cards. In November 1985, Segal talked to her in the back room of the 816 Chestnut Street store. He said that he had heard Wilson was the secretary for the Union, adding that he would "hate to lose" her, but he would not hold that over her head. He also told Wilson that he had his own business for so long that he could not afford to "let somebody else come in" and he would be forced to sell the stores one by one. Wilson also testified that her manager had previously recommended her for a raise, and that Segal had approved it, but when he came to talk to her in the back room he said that he could not give it then, but would get it after the election was over. She did receive a raise in January 1986, after the election.[8]

In addition to this, there was some conversation about how good Segal had been to Wilson's mother and cousin, giving them jobs and protecting them in those jobs. In fact, as Segal pointed out in his testimony, Wilson changed in the course of that conversation, telling him that she no longer wanted the Union, and that she would inform the employees at the 11th and Chestnut store of this conversation.

John De Marco was employed at the Company's Sharon Hill store from September 1985 to October 1986. He testified that he had signed a card that was given him by Ralph Atwell. About 3 weeks before the election Lieberman called De Marco into the back room at the Sharon Hill store. De Marco's testimony came out a bit garbled in the transcript, but I think it is fair to say from what does appear there, and from my memory of De Marco's testimony, that Lieberman told him that things would get better if the Union lost, and that he was going to sell the store to Koreans if the Union won. Whatever Lieberman said about improvements in conditions at the store De Marco was foggy on the details, but concluded that whatever was said "was really nice, it was great." Lieberman was not asked about this conversation.

Two other employees, Ralph Atwell and Karen Andrews, were named in the complaint as having suffered discriminatory treatment, but they also testified concerning actions that come within the allegations in this section of the decision.

Atwell worked in the Company's warehouse at 4530 Tacony Street from May 1984 to February 1986. His duties involved driving the Company's van or truck making deliveries to the stores scattered around the Philadelphia area, and to Sharon Hill and Allentown. Atwell also acted as a courier for the Union during the campaign, passing out and picking up cards at the stores. He hosted a union meeting at his house, which was attended by "quite a few" employees. He testified that Segal approached him one day after he got involved with the Union, and said he had heard a rumor that Atwell was a "ringleader" in the Union. Segal asked Atwell why he had not come and told him. Atwell replied that Segal would not have believed him anyhow.[9]

Karen Andrews was hired by Amazing Stores on 16 October 1985, and worked through 31 December of that same year at the Frankford Avenue store. Robert Cressman gave her a union authorization card, which she signed and returned, and she attended at least one union meeting. At the beginning of December Lieberman called her into the back room of the store, and he asked her about the Union. She said that she had attended a meeting and Lieberman replied that he knew she was there, it did not matter who told him,[10] but he knew she was at a meeting. Lieberman told Andrews how good he had been to employees, granting raises and days off, and stated that if the Union got in they would probably sell the stores—if they had to pay benefits and higher wages prices would go up and they would lose business. If the Union did not get in they were going to revamp all the stores, and were going to get rid of the people who were not doing their jobs.

When asked about who Lieberman said he was going to sell the stores to, Andrews quoted him as saying he already had a Korean guy coming in, looking at the stores, and if the Korean people got in, they would eventually bring their families in and the current employees would all be let go.

[8] Wilson had been employed since 1983, and had received a raise every year. Segal agreed that she was clever, a good employee, and had received four raises up to 1986.

[9] Atwell's further dealings with the Company will be related in sec. III,E,1, below.

[10] From Lieberman's testimony it appears that Cressman told him that Andrews was at a union meeting.

Segal then joined them and asked Andrews what the Union had offered her. She said the Union just offered information, and she continued to describe Segal's comments, quoting him as saying that the stores were his livelihood, and if the Union got in it would not be worth it to him (to continue the business).

The testimony of Andrews on this meeting was not denied either by Segal or Lieberman.

I have already found that the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses was generally credible. In dealing with this section of the complaint, I found that the General Counsel's witnesses to be entirely credible. Moreover, this substantive testimony was either corroborated or undenied in all respects by the testimony of Lieberman and Segal. The latter two made it obvious that they were acting in concert, that they made every effort to carry their message to all of the employees, that their primary message was if the Union was to win the election the stores would be closed or sold to Koreans, that the Koreans would hire their family members to staff the stores, and that whether the stores have closed or sold, the employees would lose their jobs. Segal was candid in admitting that he went to a Korean broker and arranged for a Korean potential buyer to be escorted around to some of the stores.[11] I conclude, in view of these facts, that Segal and Lieberman talked to almost all the employees of all the Amazing Stores, causing widespread concern shared jointly by all the employees and expressed in considerable discussion among themselves. The testimony of Huffnagle, Wilson, Andrews, and Cressman shows that these employees were apprehensive about their jobs. These were not throw-away jobs for these people, but were the employees' means of survival. The employees' fears were exacerbated by the actions of Segal and Lieberman in walking through the stores with Koreans or other oriental persons, who could be taken to be prospective buyers. An additional allegation noted that admitted Supervisor James Giordano told employee Lisa Huffnagle that the stores would be closed if the Union won the election. I find that this occurred as related by Huffnagle. Giordano did not testify. I find these activities by Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969); Seal Trucking Limited, 237 NLRB 1091 (1978).

I find, further, that Respondent unlawfully gave the impression to its employees that their activities on behalf of the Union were under surveillance. This is alleged in the complaint with respect to Lieberman's remarks to Karen Andrews that he knew she had attended a union meeting, and that it did not matter who told him, but he knew it. This necessarily had a coercive effect on employee union activity, and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Edward A. Utlaut Memorial Hospital, 249 NLRB 1153 (1980); Brodart, Inc., 257 NLRB 380 (1981).[12]

Respondent violated the law through Lieberman's questions to Karen Andrews about her knowledge of the union campaign, and to Lisa Huffnagle on what she thought about the Union. In the circumstances of these interrogations, conducted by the company's highest officials in intimidating circumstances in back rooms with no other employees present the qualifications noted in Rossmore House[13] do not apply; Robins Federal Credit Union, 273 NLRB 1352 (1985).

With respect to allegations in the complaint concerning promises of benefits by the Respondent to employees if the Union did not win the election, I find that Jack Segal told Marlo Jackson that the employees would get raises if they rejected the Union; Lieberman and Segal promised Francys Cotto that "things would get better" if they did not have a union; and Lieberman's promise of "more money" and unspecified "approvements" to employees John De Marco. All of these incidents constitute violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Baker Mfg. Co., 218 NLRB 1295 (1975); Martin City Ready Mix, 264 NLRB 450 (1982).

The complaint also alleged that the Respondent, through the activities of Lieberman, or Segal, or both, had solicited grievances from an employee (Segal); threatened an employee with less favorable benefits and working conditions (Lieberman and Segal); and threatened to delay, and in fact did delay, the payment of employee Christmas bonuses (Lieberman and Segal). Arlene Tolliver testified that Segal repeatedly asked her if she had any grievances at their meeting in the stockroom of the Chelten Avenue store. When she complained that she could not take off on Martin Luther King's birthday, Segal replied that he did not see why she could not have the day off. He also indicated that he would see about a raise for her as soon as the "union thing" was settled. I find this solicitation of grievance to violate Section 8(a)(1). Rexair, Inc., 243 NLRB 876 (1979).

The allegation dealing with alleged threats to reduce benefits stems, according to the General Counsel's brief, from the conversation between Segal, Lieberman, and Karen Andrews in the stockroom of the Frankford Avenue store. Lieberman pointed out to Andrews in that meeting that the Company had accommodated Andrews' schedule and had given her raises. The implication is obvious. If she continued to support the Union, then those privileges would be withdrawn. I find this, too, to be a violation of Section 8(a)(1). Rosewood Mfg. Co., 269 NLRB 782 (1984).

There is no question here that the Company had, for at least 2 years prior to 1985, distributed a Christmas bonus to employees just before that holiday. In 1985, however, Lisa Huffnagle testified that Lieberman and Segal told her that the employees would not receive bonuses because that would appear to be a "bribe." Francine Wilson testified that she was told by her manager that the reason for the delay in giving bonuses was the employees' union activities. In fact bonuses were given, but were not distributed until New Year's Eve, 31 December 1985. The election was conducted by mail ballot between 10 and 30 December 1985, and the ballots were counted on 16 January 1986. It thus appears from the credible testimony of Huffnagle and Wilson, undenied by Respondent's witnesses, that the bonuses were delayed because of the employees' participation in the election process being conducted under the auspices of the Board. The threat to take this action and the action itself are separate violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; Franklin Parish Broadcasting, 222 NLRB 1133 (1976); National Micronetics, 277 NLRB 993 (1985).

[11] I cannot say that this was not legitimate insofar as the prospective buyer was concerned. I am not so sure about Segal's motivation in soliciting such potential purchases. Whatever the motive, I find that the appearance of the Korean in the stores served to emphasize and dramatize the threats to sell or close the stores. The fact that the matter was dropped after the elections shows that the whole idea of a sale was calculated to frighten and intimidate the employees.

[12] Segal made similar remarks to Francine Wilson and Ralph Atwell, but these incidents were not alleged as violations in the complaint.

[13] 269 NLRB 1176 (1984).

As I have noted above, I do not consider the testimony of Roger Parker to be reliable. I therefore cannot find that his testimony about Lieberman's alleged request to employees to bring their ballots in to him and he would mail them to the Board to be credible. Nor do I find that statements alleged by Parker to have been made by Supervisor Sarah Block are reliable enough to base a finding.

E. Alleged 8(a)(3) Violations

1. Ralph Atwell

As described above, Respondent became aware of Atwell's union activity early in the campaign. Segal had confronted him with the accusation that he was the ringleader of the union activity. Atwell was not the person who brought the Union into contact with the Company's employees. That person was Steve Calhoun. But Atwell was highly visible in his support for the Union and acted as a courier between union adherents in the scattered stores.

In December 1985 the Company, presumably through the decisions of Lieberman and Segal, determined that Atwell would not be given a Christmas bonus. This decision was made allegedly because of Atwell's poor work performance. Segal claimed in his testimony that he warned Atwell about his work performance late in December. Segal said he called three employees to witness his conversation with Atwell, but none of these "witnesses" were called on to testify in this case. Atwell denied that the incident took place, and I credit his testimony in this regard. The remaining testimony by Segal concerning Atwell reflects, in my opinion, that Segal resented the fact that Atwell's job took him around to the stores where he could and did talk about the Union to the employees. There is no substantial evidence that Atwell disrupted work in the store, or otherwise did not perform in a satisfactory manner.

In addition to its denial of a Christmas bonus to Atwell, the Company also denied him a pay increase when it reviewed its employees' wages in January 1986. The same reasons were advanced for this as for the denial of the Christmas bonus.

There being no legitimate or credible business justification for these actions, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) in denying Atwell a Christmas bonus in 1985, and a pay increase in 1986.

2. Gail Davis

Davis began working for Lieberman and Segal at another store owned by them, called Top Banana, in 1981. In 1983 she moved to the Amazing store at 1124 Chestnut Street. She remained at this last location throughout the union campaign.

In early December, her manager, Jim Giordano, told her that Segal was in the back room and wanted to talk to her. She asked if she had to. Giordano said no, so Davis said she did not want to go back there. According to Davis, everyone else in the store went to the back room to talk to Segal except Steve Calhoun and herself. Calhoun later did talk to Segal about the Union.

On New Year's Eve 1985, Lieberman and Segal came to the 1124 Chestnut Street store about 2:30 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Davis and Lisa Huffnagle were both working on separate cash registers, although both testified that it was not busy that afternoon.[14] All the employees who were in the store that day were called to the back room and received a bonus with the exception of Gail Davis. After Lieberman and Segal had left Davis called Manager Jim Giordano over and asked about her Christmas bonus. Giordano replied that she would not go back to see Lieberman and Segal when they wanted to talk to her, so she was to get no bonus. This last was corroborated by Lisa Huffnagle. Giordano did not testify. Segal and Lieberman averred that they did have a bonus for Davis, but the store was so busy that she could not be relieved at the time they were there. They stated that they went to another store further west on Chestnut, then returned later to find that Davis had already left.[15]

In the meantime, after Girodano told her that she would not be receiving a bonus, Davis told Giordano that she was leaving early. She was upset and, in response to Huffnagle's request that she give her a call, replied "what for?" and when Huffnagle asked her if she was coming back, again said "what for?" Davis was not so angry that she did not wish everyone a happy new year before she left. Notwithstanding the strained circumstances of her departure, Davis testified, credibly, that she told Giordano that she was leaving, she did not say that she was quitting, and that Giordano did not say anything to her, merely shrugging his shoulders. The next working day, 2 January 1986, according to Davis, she called Giordano and told him that she would not be in that day. This was the normal procedure for employees who were taking a day off. Giordano said "O.K." Later that day, however, Giordano called Davis on the telephone and said, "Gail, you are being replaced." She asked if she was being fired and Giordano replied, "No, you quit." Davis later went to the Company's office to pick up her check. While she was there she asked Lieberman why she was fired. He said she had quit, but she was given no opportunity to return to the 1124 Chestnut store, or to be reassigned somewhere else. Nor was she given the bonus check that Segal and Lieberman testified they had not been able to give her on 31 December at Chestnut Street.

[14] Bruce Kreskow testified that he was a relief cashier at the 1124 Chestnut Street Store, but that he was not called to fill in on that day.

[15] They did not attempt to explain why they did not make arrangements to pay the bonus to Davis, or even to send it to her if, as they maintained, she had quit.

On the bonus check, I think the record is clear that Segal and Lieberman had no intention of giving the check to Davis when they visited the 1124 Chestnut Store on 31 December. There is no question that the store was not busy. Huffnagle, the other cashier, was relieved to get her check. Kraskow, the relief cashier was not called to relieve Huffnagle. There is no testimony to corroborate the testimony of Segal and Lieberman that they returned to the store later that evening. In fact both Huffnagle and Kraskow testified that they did not return. Davis' testimony that Giordano told her that she did not get a bonus check because she had refused to talk to Segal and Lieberman earlier, during the union campaign, is both credible and undenied. I find, in these circumstances, that Davis was denied her bonus because of her refusal to meet with her employers, a clear violation of her right to engage in protected activity on behalf of the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The next question is whether Davis' leaving the store on the afternoon of 31 December constituted a resignation from her employment. I think not. Davis testified, again credibly, that she told Giordano that she was leaving. She had been publicly humiliated by not receiving a check, and Giordano's explanation of why she had not been paid the bonus had been overheard at least by Huffnagle. Giordano's reply was a noncommittal shrug. He did not say she could not or should not go. There is no indication in this record that punching out early was an offense against company rules or policies. At that point, despite what Davis may have said to Huffnagle, even in the presence of Giordano, Davis had not indicated to any responsible company official that she was not coming back. In any event, any ambiguity left in the atmosphere of New Year's Eve should have been clarified for the Company when Davis talked to Giordano on the morning of the next working day 2 January 1986. She told him that she would not be in that day and he agreed with that statement, saying "o.k."

We do not know what happened after that morning telephone call, but the next thing that Davis knew, Giordano called her at 4 or 4:30 on the afternoon of 2 January and told her she had been replaced. The only logical explanation for this is that a decision was made, I infer and find it was made by Lieberman and Segal, to use Davis' angry departure on New Year's Eve as an excuse to get rid of her. This, I find, follows logically from the refusal to pay this troublesome and uncooperative employee a bonus, and her natural irritation at being told that the reason for the refusal to pay the bonus was her exercise of her rights under Section 7 of the Act, to refrain from meeting with Segal and Lieberman. In these circumstances, I find that Davis was, in fact, discharged in further retaliation for her exercise of statutorily protected rights.

3. Karen Andrews

Andrews was hired on 6 October 1986 as a cashier in the Frankford Avenue store. She maintained that she was hired as a permanent, not a seasonal, employee. Robert Cressman testified that he had suggested to Lieberman in the fall that they needed another person at Frankford Avenue for holiday work. Andrews was hired after that, but there does not seem to be a connection between Cressman's recommendation and Andrew's hiring. In any event, she was hired by Store Manager Ellen Nancy Faragasso. Lieberman indicated at one point in his testimony that Andrews was a "seasonal" employee, and at another point he was not so clear about her status, fending off questions about her absenteeism and job performance, saying that at that time they needed all the hours she could give them.[16]

It is accurate to say that Andrews was not the most faithful of workers. She had a problem in that she had to drop her little boy off at school about the time she was scheduled to report for work making her, by her own admission, 10 minutes or so late every morning.[17] Beyond this chronic tardiness, Andrews was marked as being sick for at least 1 day in November, according to the two timecards in evidence. She was described by Faragasso as being sick at other times and not calling in. Andrews also obtained another job in December. This was a daytime waitress position at a local restaurant on Thursdays and Fridays. She testified that she had to begin as a day employee at the restaurant in order to work her way on to the night shift. She was moved to nights at the restaurant in January.

Meanwhile, after Christmas, Andrews noted that she was scheduled for only 1 day in the following week. She asked Lieberman about this and he replied that he was having a hard time finding hours for her. He did say that he would try to find some hours, and asked her if she would work at other stores. She said she would. However, on the next day, 31 December, Lieberman called Andrews and told her he could not find any hours for her and had to lay her off. When she protested he said there was nothing he could do for her when she was coming in late all the time and missing days.

Aside from Lieberman's answer to one question on the layoff of Andrews, the position of the Company is consistent, through the testimony of Faragasso and Cressman, who I found to be credible witnesses, that Andrews was hired as a seasonal employee. The season ended right after the holidays, and she was laid off. I do not believe that the General Counsel has established a prima face case that this layoff was motivated by any reasons other than the seasonal nature of Andrew's employment, and her admitted tardiness and poor attendance. Therefore, I do not find a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) in the Andrews' layoff.

[16] Faragasso also testified that Andrews was hired as a seasonal employee, and that she was warned constantly about lateness and absenteeism.

[17] Two timecards submitted in evidence by the Respondent show that this statement was substantially accurate, although the cards do not bear out Andrew's assertion that she worked 8 hours a day, 6 days a week; rather they show her working only 3 days in each of the 2 weeks covered.

F. The Alleged Refusal to Bargain

I have already found, based on the arithmetical figures represented by the names of employees agreed on by the parties, and by my findings regarding Andrews, Barseghian, and Siers in section III,A, above, the Union held authorization cards for a majority of the employees from 7 November through 15 November 1985.

On 15 November the Union made a valid demand for recognition based on this majority. The Company refused to recognize the Union, instead it began what I find to be a calculated plan of coercion and intimidation orchestrated and implemented by Joseph Lieberman and Jack Segal, through individual meetings with all but one of the Company's employees. The centerpiece of the campaign was the constantly repeated assertion by Lieberman or Segal or both in these meetings where they each applied pressure to the unaccompanied, sometimes frightened, individuals by means of threats that the stores were going to be closed or sold to Koreans who, in turn, would hire their own relatives and discharge the current employees. The threats uttered at the individual meetings were given additional substance by appearances of Lieberman and Segal accompanied by one or more oriental persons, a theatrical device I have found to have been staged by Segal in order to heighten the employees' anxieties.

The critical points that I discerned in all this were, of course, the coercive impact of the threats and the appearances of the Koreans; the other unfair labor practices I have found, the interrogations, promises of improved conditions, denial of bonuses, giving the impression of surveillance; but the fact that both Segal and Lieberman not only admitted that they had threatened employees that they would close or sell the stores, but the fact, from my observation of both Lieberman and Segal while they were testifying, that they meant exactly what they were saying, and that if the Union had won the election they would have sold off the stores, to Koreans, or anybody, and rid themselves of any obligation to bargain collectively with the Union chosen by their employees. Moreover, I discerned not one iota of regret or remorse that they had done these things. I have no doubt that if, as the result of my recommendations in this case, a second election were to be ordered, Lieberman and Segal would find the means to let their employees know that their joint will is unchanged and that the advent of the Union would mean the end of their connection with Amazing Stores.

It is for this last reason, more than the other unfair labor practices, even the mistreatment of Ralph Atwell and the discharge of Gail Davis, that I feel that the ordinary remedies of notice posting, cease and desist, and a new election would not properly protect the rights of the employees here so egregiously disregarded, and that a bargaining order, as requested by the General Counsel, would be the most appropriate remedy.[18] I therefore find that the Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith with the majority representative of its employees in the unit stipulated to by the parties in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969); Precision Graphics, 256 NLRB 381 (1981); Michigan Expediting Service, 282 NLRB 210 (1986).

G. The Objections

In view of my disposition of the unfair labor practice portion of this case, see section III,F, above, I recommend that the objections to the election be dismissed.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I will recommend that the Respondent offer to Gail Davis immediate reinstatement to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges that she had enjoyed, and that she be made whole for any loss of earnings suffered by her as a result of the discrimination against her by the payment of sums equal to those she would have earned, absent such discrimination, with backpay computed in accordance with the formula in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and with interest compounded in the manner described in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

I will recommend that the Respondent pay to Gail Davis and to Ralph Atwell sums equivalent to the bonuses that were unlawfully denied them in December 1985, and to Atwell a sum equal to any pay increase he would have been awarded in January 1986, to the time of his voluntary termination from employment with Respondent together with interest thereon.

I will recommend that the Respondent on request bargain in good faith with the Union as the representative of its employees in the unit heretofore found to be appropriate, concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment for the employees in said unit.

Because the unfair labor practices found here are egregious and widespread, going to the heart of the Act, and vitally affecting the livelihood of employees, I shall recommend that a broad order issue in this matter; Hickmott Foods, supra, and I shall grant the General Counsel's request for a remedial visitatorial provision.

Because there is a real possibility that Respondent will sell one or more of its retail stores in order to frustrate its employees' wishes, or this recommended order, I shall recommend that it be ordered not to discontinue its operations, at any of its locations.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Amazing Stores, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

---

[18] Indeed, I feel that the possibility of the closing or sale of stores is so real a risk that I am recommending a broad order here to put whatever emphasis I can on the danger of disregard and nullification of the effect of this decision by the Respondent; Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

2. United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1357, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 8(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time sales personnel, stock personnel, cashiers and truck drivers employed by the Employer at its 816 Chestnut St., 1124 Chestnut St., 1621 Chestnut St., 7130 Frankford Ave., 5645 N. 5th St., Academy Plaza, Academy & Red Lion Rds, and 139 W. Chelten Ave., Philadelphia, PA., locations, and its Sharon Hill Plaza, Chester Pike, Sharon Hill, PA., 734 Hamilton St., Allentown, PA., locations, excluding all their employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. By interrogating its employees, by giving them the impression their protected activities were under surveillance, by promising them benefits, coercing and threatening them in order to interfere with their right to choose a representative for collective bargaining, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By threatening to withhold employees' bonuses and by withholding those bonuses for a period of 1 week, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. By failing and refusing to pay bonuses and pay increases to Gail Davis and Ralph Atwell, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By discharging Gail Davis, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

8. By refusing to bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union, in the unit set out above, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

9. The unfair labor practices set forth above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[19]

ORDER

The Respondent, Amazing Stores, Inc., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating its employees; giving its employees the impression that their protected activities are under surveillance; threatening its employees with the closure or sale of its stores; promising increased benefits to its employees or coercing or threating them, in order to interfere with their rights to choose a collective-bargaining representative.

(b) Threatening to discontinue its operations or to sell its stores, or discontinuing its operations or selling its stores to retaliate against its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union.

(c) Terminating any of its employees because of their union activity.

(d) Refusing to pay bonuses or pay raises because of employees' union activity.

(e) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union over wages, bonuses, and conditions of employment for its employees.

(f) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and on request bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate bargaining unit described as follows:

> All full-time and regular part-time sales personnel, stock personnel, cashier, and truck drivers employed by the Employer at its 816 Chestnut St., 1124 Chestnut St., 1621 Chestnut St., 7130 Frankford Ave., Philadelphia, PA. locations, and its Sharon Hill Plaza, Chester Pike, Sharon Hill, PA., 734 Hamilton St., Allentown, PA. locations, excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Pay to Gail Davis and Ralph Atwell the bonuses unlawfully withheld from them in December 1985, together with interest thereon.

(c) Pay to Ralph Atwell the raise in pay unlawfully withheld from him in January 1986, together with interest thereon.

(d) Offer to Gail Davis immediate and full reinstatement to her former or substantially equivalent position, together with backpay to which she may be entitled, because of its discrimination against her, together with interest thereon.

(e) Post at its facility in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this Order, the Board, or any of its duly authorized representatives, may obtain discovery from the Respondent, its officers, agents, successors, or assigns, or any other person having knowledge concerning any compliance matter, in the manner provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Such discovery shall be conducted under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order and may be had upon any matter reasonably related to compliance with this order, as enforced by the court.

[19] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[20] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Air Cargo Transport, Inc. and District Lodge 751, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, Petitioner. Case 19-RC-11058

June 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Ronald J. Knox. Following the hearing, and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, this case was transferred to the National Labor Relations Board for decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the hearing officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are affirmed.

On the entire record in this case, the Board finds:

Air Cargo is engaged in the business of pickup and delivery of air freight at the Sea-Tac Airport in Seattle, Washington. In or about November 1983, Air Cargo entered into an extensive freight agreement with Flying Tigers Transport. Since that time Air Cargo has operated as Flying Tigers' exclusive agent in the Seattle area and it derives 99 percent of its revenues as a result of the agreement with Flying Tigers.

Air Cargo owns and operates seven vehicles to transport the freight and all but two are painted, at Flying Tigers' expense, with the Flying Tigers logo. Flying Tigers also provides uniforms to Air Cargo's drivers; sets the rates that Air Cargo charges for its services; and exercises substantial control over Air Cargo's daily operations, including hiring, firing, and employee discipline.

Air Cargo contends that the petition should be dismissed because jurisdiction is properly with the National Mediation Board under the Railway Labor Act and, therefore, the National Labor Relations Board should not exercise jurisdiction. The Petitioner asserts that jurisdiction is properly with the National Labor Relations Board.

Section 2(2) of the Act provides in pertinent part that the term "employer" as used in the National Labor Relations Act shall not include any person subject to the Railway Labor Act.

Accordingly, we requested the National Mediation Board to study the record in this case and to determine the applicability of the Railway Labor Act to Air Cargo. In reply, we were advised by the National Mediation Board that

> Based on the information provided, it appears that Air Cargo Transport's employees are subject to direct control by Flying Tiger. Moreover, Air Cargo Transport's employees engage in work which is performed by employees in the airline industry. See, e.g. Crew Transit, Inc., 10 NMB No. 21 (1982) and Allied Aviation Service Company of Texas, 11 NMB No. 87 (1984). The unique facts of this case viewed in light of Board precedent lead to the Board's opinion, therefore, that Air Cargo Transport, Inc. and its employees are covered by the Railway Labor Act.[1]

In view of the foregoing, we shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

It is ordered that the petition in Case 19-RC-11058 is dismissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 25, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs and the Respondent and the General Counsel filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. The judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by instituting posted invalid no-solicitation rules.[1] Specifically, the judge found that the rules were facially invalid because the Respondent failed to explain to employees their right to solicit on behalf of the Union during nonwork-time and in nonwork areas. The Respondent has excepted to this finding and for the reasons set forth below we dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

On September 21, 1981,[2] the Respondent opened a combined grocery and drugstore in Huntsville, Alabama. Approximately 150 nonunionized employees man the facility. Although there is a main employee breakroom in the rear of the store, the snack area of the delicatessen department is also designated as a breakroom for off-duty workers. As a requirement of employment, the employees attended orientation sessions at which the Respondent advised them to adhere to posted signs at the stores' two entrances and near the employee timeclock. The three signs were identical and entitled "NO SOLICITATIONS." They stated:

> Solicitation, distribution of literature or use of sound devices on company premises by anyone not employed by the Company is strictly prohibited.
> Unauthorized presence of any employee on the interior of the company premises for any purpose is strictly prohibited unless that employee is on duty, scheduled for work or actually engaged in the purchase of goods.
> Solicitation by anyone in the selling areas of the store is strictly prohibited.
> No employee may engage in solicitation of any kind during working time, or while the person (or persons) he or she is soliciting is on working time. Further, no employee may distribute literature during working time or in working areas.

The rules remained posted at the various locations until November 12. At that time, in response to the Board's decision in T.R.W. Bearings, 257 NLRB 442 (1981), the Respondent replaced the above no-solicitation rule with a new rule. The Respondent posted the new rule at the same locations as its predecessor. It contained the identical four paragraphs as the old rule with the addition of a final definitional paragraph regarding working time:

> Working time does not include authorized periods of off-duty times, e.g., mealtime, breaktime, etc.

After the posting of the rule there was no further clarification by the Respondent.

In his decision the judge addressed the two rules as a unitary policy. Apparently the judge relied on T.R.W. Bearings, and determined that the rules were invalid because the Respondent did not explain to employees their right to solicit in the delicatessen snack section when off duty.

Contrary to the judge, we find that the posted no-solicitation rules were facially valid. In Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), we expressly overruled T.R.W. Bearings and stated rules prohibiting solicitations during working times are presumptively valid. We further stated in Our Way that proscribed solicitations during worktime implies that solicitations are permitted during nonworktime, i.e., the employees' own time. Here, neither rule prohibits solicitations during nonwork periods. Rather, it is clear that the Respondent did not intend to restrict solicitations during nonworktimes as evident from the posted rules' explicit explanation that the no-solicitation policy did not include off-duty times, mealtimes, and breaktimes. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[3]

[1] We agree with the judge's finding that the no-solicitation/no-distribution rule set forth in the Company's personnel policy statement is both invalid and unlawful.

[2] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise indicated.

[3] The Respondent's no-solicitation rules are facially valid because they proscribe solicitation in working areas during working time. At the hearing, however, the Respondent's store director, Malmberg, testified that he understood the Respondent's no-solicitation rules to prohibit distribu-

2. The judge also found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging employees Bailes and Woodley for violating the posted no-solicitation rules. We agree with the Respondent's exception to this finding and for the reasons set forth below we dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

Employees Bailes and Woodley were employed in the cosmetic and drug departments, respectively. At all times during business hours the cosmetic, drug, and grocery departments are work and selling areas. Although the snack section of the delicatessen serves as a breakroom for off-duty workers, the remaining sections of this department are working and selling areas open to the public.

In mid-November the employees began an organizational campaign and Bailes and Woodley solicited union cards at the store. According to the credited testimony of three employees, Bailes and Woodley solicited for unionization during working time and in selling areas. On November 20, employee McBride was requested by Bailes to sign a union card while both employees were working in the cosmetic department. Later that day Bailes, while stocking shelves in the department, asked employee Deacon how she felt about unions and further advised that a union would alleviate employee mistreatment. A few days later employee Ford, while working in the delicatessen, was approached by Bailes and Woodley and requested to sign a union card. After the three employees reported the solicitations to the Respondent, Bailes and Woodley were discharged on November 23 for violation of the posted no-solicitation rule.[4]

In his decision, the judge found that because Bailes and Woodley were discharged pursuant to an invalid posted no-solicitation rule the discharges themselves were invalid. Although the judge noted that the employees had solicited during working time and in selling areas, he concluded that the Respondent had not rebutted the presumption of the invalidity of the rule by showing that the solicitation had impaired the employees' job performance.

As we disagree with the judge's finding that the Respondent instituted and posted invalid no-solicitation rules, we reject the related finding that the Respondent unlawfully discharged the employees under the rules. Here, the employees solicited union support during the working time and in selling areas of the store. These activities were in clear violation of the Respondent's no-solicitation policy and resulted in their lawful discharges. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[5]

3. On the day following their discharges, Bailes and Woodley appeared in the Respondent's delicatessen area that is open to the public. They were accompanied by Union Representatives Powers and Norwood. All four wore union jackets displaying a large union logo. They sat down at a table and consumed food and beverages. They did not attempt to solicit or speak to employees about the Union. The purpose of the visit was to demonstrate to the employees that the Union supported Bailes and Woodley. As set forth more fully by the judge, in response to this and subsequent visits to the delicatessen by these individuals to leave the premises and summoned the police when they refused. All four were arrested in connection with their refusals to leave.

The judge found that the threats of arrest and the arrests themselves did not violate Section 8(a)(1). The judge reasoned that Bailes' and Woodley's communication to other employees that the Union supported them following their discharges was unprotected under Section 7 of the Act because to find otherwise "would dilute the basic rights to organize and not to organize" and would reduce Section 7 activity to a "carnival atmosphere of logos, signs, and symbols." We disagree and find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1).

Contrary to the judge, there is no evidence that the conduct of Bailes and Woodley was likely to create a "carnival atmosphere." Instead, it is clear that their activity was undertaken in a manner fully consistent with the normal use of the delicatessen, i.e., the delicatessen was open to the public for food and beverage service, and Bailes, Woodley, and the union representatives sat down at a table and consumed food and beverages. Further, their visit was designed merely to demonstrate to the Respondent's employees that the Union supported Bailes and Woodley and, by inference, supported tions in its delicatessen and parking lot. Because the record indicates that a portion of the delicatessen was designated as an employee break area and a section of the parking lot had been set aside for employee use, such an understanding, if acted upon, would invalidate the Respondent's otherwise valid no-solicitation rules. See, e.g., Harolds Club, 267 NLRB 1167 (1983), enfd. 758 F.2d 1320 (9th Cir. 1985); Stoddard-Quirk Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 615 (1962). However, there is no record evidence that the Respondent communicated Malmberg's overboard interpretation to employees, or enforced its no-solicitation rules in the break area in the delicatessen or at any inappropriate time or place in the parking lot. Accordingly, we find that Malmberg's understanding of the Respondent's rules did not render them invalid.

[4] There is no contention that the discharges were effected pursuant to the personnel policy statement. (See fn. 1, supra.) There is similarly no logical linkage between these two discharges and Malmberg's subsequent testimony at the unfair labor practice hearing—testimony that, as we have explained above (fn. 3, supra), did not make unlawful a rule that was valid on its face and not shown to have been unlawfully maintained or enforced. Our order remedies any coercive effects and that statement, however, by requiring its rescissions and giving the customary cease-and-desist direction.

[5] We adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent did not apply its posted no-solicitation rule in a disparate manner because the alleged incidents noted by the judge occurred outside selling areas or were unknown to management or isolated and inconsequential in character.

the Respondent's current employees. Because their activities supported the normal use of the delicatessen and were nonobtrusive, it is immaterial that the conduct took place on the Respondent's property.[6]

Further, we conclude that the Respondent's attempt to eject four individuals and its summoning of the police for that purpose unlawfully interfered with the exercise of Section 7 rights, Montgomery Ward & Co., 263 NLRB 233 (1982). Bailes and Woodley were known to the Respondent as active union supporters, and Powers and Norwood identified themselves to the Respondent as union representatives. As previously noted, all four were wearing jackets with large union logos. The Respondent's employees had a legitimate interest in receiving this message of support. The Respondent admittedly sought to bar Bailes and Woodley from the delicatessen because they were "not welcome." Thus, it is evident that the Respondent singled out these individuals for special treatment, notwithstanding that their outward activities were fully consistent with the normal use of the delicatessen area from which they were ejected.

The Respondent contends that it lawfully barred Bailes and Woodley because they had engaged in disruptive conduct while soliciting employees during their period of employment and that Powers and Norwood lawfully were barred because they attempted to interfere with management's lawful authority to oust Bailes and Woodley. We find no merit in these contentions.

Although the Respondent lawfully discharged Bailes and Woodley for violating a valid no-solicitation rule, it does not follow that irrespective of the circumstances the Respondent permissibly could interfere with the Section 7 rights of its employees to receive a nondisruptive show of mutual support and solidarity. The Respondent's assertion that Bailes' and Woodley's return to its premises soon after their discharge clearly evidenced their intention to create a disruptive scene and that the Respondent therefore was justified in seeking to bar Bailes and Woodley to avoid such an occurrence, is not borne out by the evidence. There is nothing in the record that even remotely suggests that Bailes or Woodley gave the impression of engaging in, or of preparing to engage in, disruptive conduct. There is no evidence, for example, that they sought to solicit on-duty employees regarding the Union upon their visit to the delicatessen. Their breach of a valid no-solicitation rule while previously employed with the Respondent by itself does not establish that their mere physical presence alone likely would be disruptive to the normal activities of the delicatessen.[7]

Thus, the facts of this case, which show a nondisruptive silent communication of legitimate Section 7 interests between employees and union representatives, do not support the Respondent's contention that its conduct was justified by its legitimate business interest in ensuring decorum. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by effectively threatening and causing the arrest of Bailes, Woodley, Powers, and Norwood. See Brunswick Food & Drug, supra.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Albertsons, Inc.-Southco Division, Huntsville, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating its employees about their union sympathies or those of other employees.

(b) Threatening employees with discharge for engaging in protected activities on behalf of a union.

(c) Maintaining, giving effect to, or enforcing its company personnel policy no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rules which prohibit employees from engaging in union solicitations and distributions at all times in the store.

(d) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees by threatening the arrest of union supporters and representatives from its delicatessen and causing their arrest.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the company personnel policy no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rules now existing to the extent that such rules prohibit union solicitations and distributions by employees on company premises at all times.

[7] In this regard, we find no merit to the Respondent's assertion that it justifiably barred Bailes and Woodley because of their alleged repeated acts of intimidation and threats toward employees during their period of employment. We have found that the Respondent lawfully discharged Bailes and Woodley on the basis of their solicitation of union support during working time and in selling areas of the store contrary to the Respondent's legitimate no-solicitation rule. In doing so, however, we do not disturb the judge's finding that "in the last analysis" the Respondent failed to establish that it was reacting not just to a breach of the no-solicitation rule, but also reported alleged threats on the part of Bailes and Woodley.

An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you about your union sympathies or desires.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with discharge for engaging in protected activities in behalf of a union.

WE WILL NOT maintain, give effect to, or enforce a company personnel policy no-solicitation/-no-distribution/no-access rules which prohibit you from engaging in union solicitations and distributions at all times from our delicatessen and causing their arrest.

WE WILL NOT interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees by threatening the arrest of union supporters and representatives from our delicatessen and causing their arrest.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL rescind the company personnel policy no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rules now existing to the extent that such rules prohibit union solicitations and distributions by employees on company premises at all times.

ALBERTSONS, INC.-SOUTHCO DIVISION

Sharon Howard, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Lawrence D. Levien, Esq. and Richard N. Appel, Esq. (Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld), of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

George E. Barrett, Esq. and Michael J. Passino, Esq. (Barrett & Ray), of Nashville, Tennessee, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on October 27 and 28 and December 1 and 2, 1982, in Huntsville and Decatur, Alabama, based on a charge filed by Retail Clerks Local Union 1557 (the Union) on January 6, 1982, and a complaint issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board on February 25, 1982.[1] The complaint alleged that Albertsons, Inc. Southco Division (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by coercively interrogating, threatening, and discharging employees because they engaged in organizational activities in behalf of the Union. Additionally, Respondent maintained an invalid no-solicitation rule. Respondent's timely answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were submitted by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Union. All briefs were considered.

On the entire record[2] in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, on substantive, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Albertsons, Inc.-Southco Division is a Delaware corporation engaged in the retail sales of drugs, groceries, and sundry items in Huntsville, Alabama. Jurisdiction is not in issue. Albertsons, Inc.-Southco Division, in the past calendar year, in the course and conduct of its business operations in Huntsville, grossed in excess of $500,000 and received at its Huntsville facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Alabama. I conclude and find that Albertsons is an employer in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise specified.

[2] Jt. Exh. 1, a summary of the 141 polygraph examinations, is received into the record by stipulation.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ISSUES

A. Coercive interrogation of employees by supervisors or agents of Respondent.

B. Threats of discharge for union activity by supervisors.

C. Threats to have employees arrested and having both employees and union representatives arrested.

D. Promulgation and maintenance of invalid written no-solicitation rules.

E. Discriminatory discharges of employees Debra Bailes and Candace Woodley.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

George Malmberg testified that he has been employed by Albertsons for 10-1/2 years. For 1 year he was the store director in Huntsville with complete authority. (At present he is grocery manager in an Albertsons' Pensacola store.) Huntsville is a new store which opened September 23. Some hirings of employees for the new store occurred before Malmberg arrived on August 27. The store is designed by departments with each department a selling area of the store. Cash registers line the front portion of the store as an addition to the selling areas in the store. With the exception of the warehouse, stock areas, offices, and breakroom, the entire store, including the delicatessen, is open to the public. Malmberg considers the parking lot a nonselling work area of the store. Employees utilize the breakroom and the delicatessen for nonwork breaktimes. The offices, breakroom, warehouse, and stock areas are nonselling areas of the store. During the hiring procedures, all employees, except the courtesy clerks, are required to take a polygraph test. When hired each employee receives a written list of "company personnel policies" that they are expected to read and sign for acknowledgement. Each employee serves a 30-day trial period before becoming a permanent employee. Employees are disciplined by verbal or written warning depending on the offense; however, several stated offenses are cause for immediate dismissal. In addition to the stated causes, Malmberg testified that within his discretion he can terminate an employee for their conduct. In December 1981 or January 1982 he terminated an employee who pulled advertising signs from the shelves as she left the store after work.

Pat Layne was terminated for insubordination and failure to comply with expressly stated management theories. In late November Malmberg received information from employee Hale that Layne was soliciting employee signatures on union cards. Malmberg called Layne and her immediate supervisor—Bentley—to his office. Malmberg told Layne that as part of management she must back management's wishes and theories or desires as far as the running of the operation, and that she could not actively support the Union. Layne responded that she understood and that there would be no problems. Malmberg decided to explain to Layne rather than discipline her and to have Bentley present also because he had no knowledge that any supervisors understood what their position was to be during a union organizational drive. Following this Malmberg on December 1 received information from employee Barbara Watson that Layne solicited Watson to attend an upcoming union meeting. When Watson resisted with the excuse, "I've got to work tommorrow," Layne suggested that Watson called in sick so she could attend the meeting. Layne ended the conversation by lamenting her lack of authority to hire employees even though she could fire employees, because with both authorities she could stock the front end with union supporting employees. The following day, Malmberg summoned Layne to his office and confronted her with his information. Layne admitted to it and Malmberg terminated her.

Two weeks prior to opening of the store, Malmberg received from his management a no-solicitation poster (G.C. Exh. 4) which he posted in three locations in the store. Later around November 11, via the company produce truck from Orlando, he received a revised poster to replace the original. Malmberg removed the first poster and posted the revised poster in the same three locations. He then returned the acknowledgement of the switch in posters to Orlando.

On only one occasion did Malmberg allow a solicitation by an outside organization on company premises. The American Heart and Lung Association was permitted to park a car on the sidewalk outside the store and sell raffle tickets to the general public. They were not allowed to solicit customers or employees inside the store.

Malmberg did not work Saturday, November 21, or Sunday, November 22; however, several supervisors and employees reported to him on events occurring both days involving Bailes and Woodley soliciting signatures from employees in the store. Supervisors Stevens and Usery reported that Bailes and Woodley were soliciting employees to sign union authorization cards in the store and telling some employees to meet them in the parking lot to sign cards. Several employees reported to Stevens and Usery that they were threatened by Bailes, Woodley, and Supervisor Pat Layne for not signing union cards. Malmberg received the report that Bailes and Woodley told employee Deacon, "If you don't sign one and we form a picket line then anybody that crosses the picket line could get beat up by hit men that we have." A second report he received stated that employee Ford was approached by Bailes and Woodley in the restroom on Saturday, November 21, to sign a union card and again on Sunday, November 22, at her delicatessen workstation while she was working. A third report of employee Ayers stated that Supervisor Layne solicited her signature on a union card in the breakroom and later in the store parking lot. Layne told Ayers that she should sign the card or lose her job.

On Monday morning, November 23, Malmberg was approached individually in his office by employees Deacon, McBride, and Ford. Deacon told Malmberg that Bailes and Woodley did tell her in the store's parking lot that she would be beat up if she tried to cross a picket line and work. Bailes and Woodley also told Deacon that suppliers and truckdrivers would not cross the picket lines. McBride told Malmberg that Bailes had solicited her signature on a union card Friday, November 20, while both employees were working in the cosmetic department. The next day Bailes stopped McBride in the parking lot and told her if she did not sign a union card she would be fired when the union came in. Ford told Malmberg that during worktime on Saturday, November 21, Bailes and Woodley solicited her signature in the bathroom and the following day while she and a coworker were working in the delicatessen Bailes and Woodley solicited the signature of the coworker then asked Ford if she had thought anymore about "it."

Malmberg reported the events to his management in Orlando who affirmed that the employees could be discharged. Approximately 1:30 p.m. Malmberg decided to discharge Bailes and Woodley for no-solicitation violations and intimidation of employees. Malmberg did not confront Bailes or Woodley with his information before deciding to terminate them. That afternoon Malmberg called Woodley to his office. He told her because she had chosen to break the no-solicitation, no-access, no-distribution rule and had intimidated employees while on and off the clock, she was being terminated and was not to return to the store. Malmberg told Woodley to sign her timecards, leave the store, and not return. Malmberg then called Bailes to his office and told her the same thing.

The next day, about noon, Bailes and Woodley came into the store wearing union jackets. Malmberg told them they were not welcome in the store. One of two men who identified themselves to Malmberg as Powers and Norwood, union representatives, said the girls did not have to leave because the store was public and they were going to the delicatessen. The four went to the delicatessen, ordered drinks, and sat at a table. Malmberg called the police. When the police arrived, Malmberg told the officer who came into the store that two terminated female employees in the delicatessen were not welcome in the store. Malmberg and the officer went to the delicatessen. The officer told Malmberg to tell the four that they were not welcome and ask them to leave. Powers spoke up and said, "Why don't you ask him why he wants us to leave." The officer said it did not make any difference, "if the proprietor doesn't want you in the store you have to leave. If you don't leave, I'll have to place you under arrest." Powers then said to the officer, "You, on your own," whereupon the officer arrested Powers and escorted the four outside the store.

That same afternoon at 3:30, the four individuals returned to the store. Malmberg again told them to leave. They said they would not leave and were going to the delicatessen. Malmberg called the police. Malmberg told the policeman of the prior arrest. The policeman told Malmberg to repeat the warning to the four and if they did not leave he would remove them. Malmberg then told the group they were not welcome and would have to leave. The policeman told the group, "this man's the proprietor; Ya'll are all going to have to leave, otherwise you will be guilty of trespassing after warning." They refused to leave, so the policeman arrested all four.

Later that same day, around 6 p.m., Powers and Norwood came into the store. George Hart, the grocery manager, saw them and told them to leave the store. Powers said, "Get the hell out of my way" and headed for the delicatessen. Malmberg went to the delicatessen and told both men that they had been previously arrested for not leaving the store and they should now leave the store. Both men said they would not leave, so Malmberg told them he was going to call the police. The police arrived and told Malmberg that he would have to go downtown and sign a complaint to get the men removed. Malmberg did so and both men were arrested in the store. Malmberg stated that he effected the arrests because Powers and Norwood interfered with his duty as proprietor of the store on the first occasion and he did not want the situation repeated.

At some point during the day a letter to employees expressing Albertsons' opposition to the Union was mailed to all Huntsville employees from division headquarters in Orlando, Florida.

Patricia Layne testified that she was employed by Albertsons from September until December as assistant front-end manager. Her duties included directing the functions of the cashiers and courtesy clerks with the responsibility for discipline of the courtesy clerks. Layne had terminated the employment of the one employee.

During her employment, Layne was not aware of any company policy that prohibited employees from talking about noncompany matters while working. In fact, everyday employees talked about noncompany matters with impunity while working. Layne also was not aware of any company policy against solicitations in the store. She stated it was possible that the Company had posted no-solicitation rules in the store, but she had never seen them. Albeit, Layne attended the new employee orientation, she did not recall any reference to no-solicitation rules. Layne recalled that in October a lady came into the store and told her she was seeking food donations for the church. Layne referred the lady to Malmberg. Later the lady came to Layne's checkout stand with $40 to $50 worth of groceries. Layne asked Supervisor Usery how to handle it, and he said to ring it up and give him the receipt. This same month another lady was seeking a Polaroid film donation and asked Layne about it. Layne sent her to Malmberg. Layne did not hear anymore about it. At the end of October a lady approached Layne looking for donations of halloween decorations for a school festival. Layne referred her to Malmberg. Layne was later instructed to simply bag the decorations for the lady and let her go. The following month Layne and several employees were in the breakroom waiting for their shift time. Sherry Phillips, a cashier, came in, put her purse in her locker, and clocked in. As she left the breakroom, she placed Home Interior folders on the table then went to work. She said to give the brochures back to her and asked the employees if they wanted to buy something after they had looked them over. After Layne clocked out that day and was on her way out of the store, she slipped the brochure in Sherry's pocket as she passed her cash register.

Layne first became aware of the union organizing in late November. The third week in November, Bailes and Woodley solicited Layne's help getting employees to sign union cards. Layne was in the breakroom at the time. Layne told them she would not help. The following Sunday when Layne arrived at work and parked her car she saw Bailes and Woodley sitting in their parked car. Bailes and Woodley shouted to Layne, "We got them." Layne walked to their car and asked, "What do you have." They asked Layne to get in the car and they would discuss it off the property. After getting off the property, Bailes and Woodley showed Layne the union cards and asked if she would sign one. After a short discussion Layne did sign one. Layne was asked again to help get employees to sign cards and she agreed to do so. Bailes and Woodley told Layne not to solicit on company time but she could solicit on the property as long as she was on break or off the clock. She participated in the campaign on behalf of the Union by soliciting employees to sign union cards and asking employees how they felt about the Union and if they had any interest in union activities. Early in the campaign, Malmberg questioned Layne about union solicitations in the store. Layne responded that it had taken place off the property. Malmberg asked Layne about her departure from the store on Sunday, November 22, in Candy Woodley's car with emphasis on the number of people in the car. Before Layne could answer, Malmberg stated that there were two others in the car. Later Malmberg spoke with Layne in his office, in the presence of Kayla Bentley, the front-end manager. Malmberg told Layne that as a supervisor, she was considered part of management and, therefore, could not participate in any union organizing or soliciting. In late November an employee, Susan Ayers, was in Layne's car in the parking lot. Layne had union cards and Ayers signed one in the car. Layne did not recall any conversation with Ayers about damage to employees' cars during this solicitation but she did tell Ayers nor to discuss the Union on company property. On December 4 Layne was fired for violating the no-solicitation rule and insubordination in that Layne, in spite of Malmberg's warning, did thereafter engage in solicitations of employees to sign union cards.

David Eng testified that he has been employed at Albertsons as a stocker for 14 months. He was hired when the store opened but did not get a polygraph until 2 months ago. Eng did receive and sign the Albertsons policy sheet which contained the store policy on no-solicitation. Eng also saw the no-solicitation posters in several locations in the store ever since he was employed. Since his employment, he has had several conversations with supervisors about the Union. In November while stocking the frozen food cooler in the backroom, Assistant Manager Stringfellow approached him and asked, "Do you think this place needs a Union." Eng replied that he had never thought about it then told Stringfellow that he was fired from Raglands Bros. for union activity. Eng told Stringfellow that he had helped the union organize Raglands. Nothing else was said. Three or four days later on the sales floor in the frozen food aisle, while Eng was working, Stringfellow walked up. Eng mentioned the Company letter about unions. Stringfellow then asked him if he was involved with the Union. Eng replied, "No," and Stringfellow walked off. Within 5 or 10 minutes Stringfellow returned and said, "I think you've got a promising future here. I hope you don't get involved with the Union; I'd hate to see you go."

Eng stated that probably everyday employees conversed about noncompany matters while working and were not disciplined for it. Eng was not aware of any policy prohibiting conversations about noncompany matters while working. Eng also saw solicitations in the store. The PepsiCola deliveryman sold raffle tickets for a softball team to Eng and other stockers while Eng was stocking the cola shelves. At this time ther were not any supervisors in the vicinity. On another occasion he was at the timeclock in the breakroom, clocking out, and a group of girls were collecting money for Pam Campbell, an employee who was getting married. Recently, Beverly Nash, the delicatessen manager,[3] was working and a group of stockmen were purchasing breakfast. Nash asked the stockmen to contribute to flowers for Susan Ayers who was in the hospital. Eng did no know that Ayers was in the hospital and gladly contributed to the flower fund.

Barbara Watson testified[4] that she has been employed by Albertsons as a cashier since the store opened. Her supervisor was Pat Layne. Watson attended the orientation session for new employees, which included discussions of what employees should do on the job; what employees should not do on the job; the no-solicitation policy, the insurance policies, the dress code, and employee benefits. A training period of 2 weeks followed with additional explanations of the company policies. Printed posters of the store's no-solicitation rules were posted on the front windows the day the store opened for business. An additional poster was framed and hung in the employees breakroom.

Watson on November 20 was off work but was in the store to do some shopping. While passing the cosmetics counter, Bailes, who was stocking shelves, called her over. Bailes asked Watson if she knew the store was fixing to go union. Watson said she had not heard anything. Bailes said that was the rumor and asked Watson how she felt about unions. Watson replied she did not know because she had never worked with a union. Bailes said she thought the Union would be a good idea because the employees were being mistreated. The conversation lasted about 3 minutes then Watson continued her shopping.

A few days later Bailes and Woodley were in the parking lot asking employees to come over to them and talk about the Union. Bailes and Woodley had several employees with them discussing the Union. Watson was leaving for lunch and Bailes called her over. Bailes and Woodley were not in uniforms. Bailes asked Watson if she would join the Union and sign a card. Bailes said, "the Union's not in and it's going to take a lot to get it in. There's a chance that you can be fired if you join and if the management finds out." Watson was in a hurry to get her lunch so she left.

[3] The parties stipulated that Nash became a supervisor in August 1982.

[4] Watson testified directly for the General Counsel and Respondent in response to two subpoenas during a single stint on the stand.

On December 1, Watson was working on her register and Layne came to her and said she would like to speak to her about the Union. Watson told Layne she would talk with her. Later Watson had a 10-minute break and met Layne in the delicatessen. Layne asked her how she felt about unions and stated that she (Layne) thought it would be a good idea for the employees. Layne said she had the authority to fire employees and wished she had the authority to hire them also so she could fill the front with union supporters. Layne then asked Watson to sign a union card and encouraged Watson to do so. Watson did not say much, she was just listening. The conversation ended and Watson returned to her register. That evening Watson took her 10-minute break. Layne came over and told Watson that an important union meeting was scheduled for the following morning at a local motel. Watson told Layne that she was scheduled to work and could not attend. Layne told Watson to call in sick or make some excuse so she could attend. The breaktime ended and Watson returned to her register. The next afternoon Layne came into work and gave Watson a hard look as she passed. Watson later went over and apologized to Layne for not attending the meeting. Several times after that while Watson was working on her register, Layne would come over and point to a customer saying, "You need to talk to him; he's a union representative; or it might be a good idea to speak with him," Watson developed a feeling that Layne was pressuring her, so she went to Malmberg and reported the conversations that took place on the job between she and Bailes and she and Layne.

Debra Bailes testified that she was employed by Albertsons before the store opened and attended the store's orientation program on benefits. She was hired to work in the cosmetics department. On September 7, 8, or 9, Bailes was one of several employees to receive a polygraph examination administered by an employee of Albertsons. The examination took about 20 minutes. During the examination, the operator asked Bailes if she was ever affiliated with a union. She responded that she had signed a union card at Food World where she was employed for 3 months and that her husband worked at Kroger and was a member of the Retail Clerks Union. The operator also asked questions about theft, illegal drugs, and about her financial condition. Bailes did not recount the union question during the exam until she was conversing with the union attorneys after the state trespass proceeding.[8]

Bailes stated that the union campaign began on November 21, about noon, when she went to Kroger and spoke to T. C. Smith, an official of the Kroger union. Bailes stated she was unhappy that her hours of work had been reduced. Smith gave her a stack of membership cards for her use in soliciting Albertsons' employees and she signed one and returned it to Smith. Bailes left about 1:15 p.m. and went to Woodley's house. Bailes solicited Woodley and both returned to Kroger where Woodley signed a membership card. Smith told them that soliciting Albertsons' employees could not be done on companytime but any time that was their time, like breaks, was okay. Bailes went to work at 3 p.m. that day and was busy preparing for Sunday's specials. She took her break just before the stockers were due to start work at 10 p.m. Bailes went to the breakroom and the stockers were there. She asked them if they were interested in joining the Union. They replied that they were, so they and Bailes agreed to meet the next morning, Sunday, November 22, at Krystals restaurant at 7 a.m. Bailes and Woodley met the stockers the following morning and secured several signed membership cards. A courtesy clerk who came in Krystals also signed a membership card. Bailes and Woodley left Krystals and went to Albertsons' parking lot about 9 a.m. that day and remained until after dark. As employees came into the store or left the store, Bailes and Woodley solicited their signatures on union cards. Those who agreed to sign would get in Bailes' car and when the car was off company property, the employee would sign. Bailes would then bring the employee back to Albertsons' parking lot. On several occasions Bailes used the store restroom and delicatessen and solicited employees in the breakroom. Bailes recalled signing Pat Layne and Barbara Watson in the parking lot and while in the store's delicatessen asked Linda Deacon to come outside and talk about the Union. Bailes denied any conversation with Watson about the Union prior to Sunday and any solicitations of Carol Ford, Sally McBride, or Pam Campbell. That night Layne called Bailes and said she had two employees wanting to sign cards. Bailes met Layne behind Albertsons with the two employees and the cards were signed. The next day, Monday, November 23, Layne met Bailes at Hardee's restaurant about 10 a.m. with an employee willing to sign a card. The employee signed a card.

Later this same day Malmberg in Usery's presence called Bailes to his office. Malmberg told Bailes that she had violated the no-solicitation rule and was terminated. Malmberg also told Bailes that she was not to come back into the store. Bailes stated that she was not given any other reason for her discharge.

The day following her discharge, Bailes returned to the store accompanied by Woodley and Union Representatives Powers and Norwood (all four wore union jackets) to show the employees that they were supported by the Union. Malmberg met them in the lobby and told Norwood that the girls were not welcome in the store. Norwood asked Malmberg if the store was public, and Malmberg replied, "Yes." The four then walked to the delicatessen and sat down. Norwood and Powers ordered drinks for the group. Malmberg came to the table and asked the four to leave. Norwood asked if he was asking them to leave because the girls were represented by he and Powers. Malmberg said that has nothing to do with it and walked off. Malmberg came over again and asked the four to leave. Powers said "No," and asked if Malmberg was asking them to leave because he and Norwood were union organizers. Malmberg said, "No." A policeman then came to the table and asked the four to leave. Powers told the policeman that he would leave if the policeman was asking him to, but not because Malmberg was asking him to. The policeman placed Powers under arrest and all four left the store. As they were leaving, Norwood told Bailes and Woodley to shout "Go Union" and Woodley began hollering "Go Union" and the policeman told her not to be so loud. Bailes and Woodley then began saying "Go Union" in a speaking voice. Bailes could not recall what else was said during this encounter. Norwood and Powers told Bailes and Woodley to go back to the store and 3 hours later the group returned to the store. Hart, the grocery manager, followed them to the delicatessen and then summoned Malmberg. Within minutes Malmberg and a policeman came up. The policeman asked them to leave. Powers told the policeman they would leave if he ordered them to leave but would not because Malmberg told them to leave. The policeman said they had 60 seconds to leave or he would arrest them. He counted down the seconds and put all four under arrest. As they got to the police car, Woodley told the policeman to search her, but Powers told her to just get in the car. Norwood and Powers made a third entry into the store but specifically told Bailes and Woodley not to accompany them.

[8] Bailes gave affidavits. The first on December 16, 1981, the second on January 19, 1982. The polygraph examination and the union question were only mentioned in the second affidavit. The parties stipulated that the trespass proceeding occurred on December 28, 1981.

Bailes' only awareness of a company policy prohibiting solicitation was the printed company personnel policy sheet that she read and signed when hired. Bailes never saw a no-solicitation poster in the store or on the front windows. Everyday employees talked about noncompany matters while working and were never disciplined for it. Bailes recalled one solicitation in the store during working hours. Pam Campbell, supervisor of cosmetics, told Bailes that Nancy Heard had gotten married and she would like to take up money for a flower fund for her. This statement occurred while both employees were on the floor working.

Candace Woodley testified that she was hired as a drugclerk by Albertsons in August. Woodley attended an orientation session in which the employee benefits and working conditions were discussed. The session did not include any discussion of the store's no-solicitation policy. However, Malmberg and Valle, her drug manager, did on several occasions tell Woodley that her breaktime was her own time and she could do what she wanted during break. Four or five weeks after she began working, Woodley was summoned to the manager's office to take a polygraph test. During the test the operator asked Woodley if she or any member of her family was a member of a union. Woodley told the operator that her ex-husband was a Kroger employee and a member of the Kroger union in response to a question of where her husband worked.

Woodley participated in the union campaign by helping Bailes solicit employee signatures on union cards. Smith, a union official at Kroger, had told Bailes and Woodley not to solicit while working and not to do it on company property. Smith gave them both a stack of union cards. Woodley accompanied Bailes to Krystals, Hardee's, and employees' homes to get cards signed. Woodley also spent all day Sunday talking to employees as they left work or came in to work. Woodley specifically recalled soliciting Linda Deacon and giving her two union cards but denied talking union with Susan Ayers, Sally McBride, and Carol Ford. Monday morning, while working, Woodley had a question about ordering merchandise and went to Malmberg's office. He was on the phone and had a union card in his hand. Malmberg motioned for Woodley not to come into the office. Woodley waited until Malmberg finished his phone call and then went in the office. They resolved the order problem, and Woodley went back to work. During morning breaktime in the breakroom, Woodley talked with Pam Campbell about signing union cards. Campbell had asked if a union campaign was in progress, and they discussed the Union. After Woodley returned to work following lunch, she was summoned to Malmberg's office. Kayla Bentley, front-end manager, was present. Malmberg told Woodley she was terminated for solicitation. Woodley asked, "For solicitation of what." Malmberg said solicitation is solicitation. Woodley asked, "What was I soliciting." Malmberg said, "You know what you were soliciting." Malmberg then said, "You are terminated, your check will be mailed to you and under no circumstances are you to enter this store again." Malmberg said if she returned to the store again, he would have her arrested. He told her not to talk to any employees, punch the clock, figure the timecard, and sign out. Woodley was not given any reason for her termination other than solicitation.

Woodley stated that the only rule about solicitation that she was aware of was contained in the Employer's personnel policy sheet she read and signed when first hired. She never saw any rules posted on the front windows of the store or upstairs near the store office. Employees always talked about noncompany matters while working, and she recalled several instances where employees were solicited while working. In October a cashier, Lisa Crane, was working at her station and Woodley was in the front of the store. Crane told Woodley that she was selling for Home Interiors and asked Woodley is she was interested. Crane gave a catalog to Woodley so she could look over the merchandise. At another time, Pam Campbell, head of cosmetics, asked Woodley if she would contribute to flowers for Nancy Heard's upcoming wedding. Woodley said she would on payday. Both Campbell and Woodley were looking at the time. Also, shortly after the grand opening, a charitable organization raffled off a new car in front of the store. The car was on the sidewalk adjacent to the drug entrance to the store. All passersby were solicited on the sidewalk.

Woodley was part of a group of four that were arrested in the store the day following her discharge. Woodley recalled that when Malmberg first requested that the four leave the premises, both Powers and Norwood told him that Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act gave Bailes and Woodley the right to be there. At the time all four in the group were wearing union jackets bearing a large insignia of the Union. Woodley recalled that she and Bailes shouted, "Go Union" as the policeman escorted them from the store. On returning to the store some 2-1/2 hours later, all four were arrested at the behest of Store Director Malmberg under basically the same circumstances. Woodley and the group returned to the store after the discharge so the employees would know of the union backing and on advice by the union attorneys.

John Materni, director of employee relations for Albertsons-Southco Division, testified that all stores are architecturally the same in terms of layout, i.e., the offices and employee breakroom are always on a mezzanine floor. Also all new stores are opened on Wednesday following employee orientations on Monday of the same week. All orientation sessions follow the same format and are given in three sessions by departments: a company history, a visual aid showing store locations throughout the country, a discussion of wage policies followed by an explanation of the local wage structure, identification and explanation of the employee insurance policies that are available, personnel policies including dress code, Federal wage and hour restrictions such as working off the clock, store security, safety on the job, employee grooming standards, and company no-solicitation policies. Materni always uses the framed no-solicitation rule as a visual aid when discussing the no-solicitation rule. If employees have questions about the rule's language, he explains it. If no questions are raised, the language of the rule is not explained. He could not recall what occurred at the Huntsville orientation when the no-solicitation rule was covered. In all stores the attendance of all employees, except courtesy clerks (bag boys and girls), is mandatory. All orientation takes place in the employee breakroom.

The no-solicitation rules are identical corporatewide and are posted in all stores. In November, due to a change in NLRB case law, Respondent changed the legend on its no-solicitation poster. Each store was sent the new posters to replace the old posters. The new posters had an added paragraph explaining "working time" but there was no accompanying oral explanation for employees of the new rule. Materni did not instruct store directors to advise employees of the change. Each set of posters for each store was mailed with a cover letter dated November 10. The store directors were requested to return the cover letter acknowledging that the posters had been exchanged. Materni stated that he received acknowledgements from all the store directors in the Southco Division and filed the letters. At some later date during housecleaning of his files they were discarded. Materni did visit the Huntsville store on several occasions between its opening date and December. However, he was unable to state that he visited Huntsville in November after his office requested that the no-solicitation posters be exchanged.

Albeit Materni has the responsibility to inform new employees, on store openings, of the company policies, he does not become involved in employee disciplines. Albertsons does not have a progressive discipline policy, but rather employee discipline is left to each individual store director. The only written procedures for discipline of employees is contained in the company personnel policies that each employee signs upon hiring.

Carol Ford testified that she worked for Albertsons from September 1981 to April 1982. She worked in the delicatessen for 6 months then worked in the bakery until her separation. Ford had the responsibility for the meat and cheese section of the delicatessen. Usually she worked with another employee who served the table customers and served hot food or sandwich orders. Ford and her coworkers frequently engaged in personal and noncompany conversations while working. As far as Ford knew there was no rule against talking while working. Ford did have two union conversations with two employees while she was working. The first occurred on Saturday, November 12, with Bailes in uniform. Ford was on her way to the restroom and as she passed the breakroom, Bailes called to her from the breakroom. Bailes asked if Ford had thought about joining the Union. Bailes said her husband was in the Kroger union and had good benefits. Bailes said if the employees can get the Union in then the good benefits would be for Albertsons' employees also. Ford turned and went to the restroom which ended the previous 5-minute conversation. The next day while Ford and coworker Melody were working in the delicatessen, Bailes and Woodley, who were not working, came into the delicatessen. Ford was waiting on a customer and Melody was at the cash register. Bailes and Woodley went to the register and started talking to Melody. When Ford finished with the customer, she walked to the group at the register. Melody said to Bailes and Woodley that she was in favor of the Union and would come outside and sign a union card with them. Woodley turned to Ford and asked if she had thought anymore about what Debra had talked to her about the night before. Ford said she had but was not interested in the Union. Woodley said, "Well, we want you to sign a card. If you feel like you can, it will be outside in the car." Woodley stated to Ford that she only needed a few more signatures in order to have enough to get a vote. Ford left the group to wait on a customer. When she finished with the customer, she rejoined the group at the register and told Melody that they had to get back to work. Bailes and Woodley announced an upcoming union meeting at a local hosterly and left. That afternoon Assistant Store Director Usery came in and Ford spoke to him about the union conversations in the store involving Bailes and Woodley. Usery told Ford if she was concerned to speak to Malmberg. Later Malmberg came in the store and Ford told him she wanted to talk to him about union conversations. Malmberg said they could talk the next day in his office. On Monday morning Ford recounted the events for Malmberg, and he asked her to reduce the events to writing and sign it. Ford did so and gave it to Malmberg. Later Malmberg presented a typed version of Ford's statement to her before a notary, which she did.

Linda Deacon testified that she was hired as a drug-clerk at Albertsons the day the store opened. Deacon attended an orientation session chaired by Materni which included an explanation of the no-solicitation rule. Materni told the new employees that solicitations could not occur while employees were working on the clock except on breaks and lunch. Deacon also saw the store no-solicitation rule posted at each front door and by the office. She worked with Bailes and Woodley handling and stocking the drug wall. (In June 1982 Deacon was promoted to cosmetician in the same department.)

Several months after the store opened, Deacon had two conversations with Bailes and Woodley about the Union. The first occurred either November 19 or 20 at the drug wall while she and Bailes were working. Deacon was stocking and Bailes was walking by the wall on her way to cosmetics. Bailes stopped and told Deacon that she wanted to talk to her about getting the Union in. Deacon said "Okay" and Bailes walked off. The following Sunday, Deacon was in the store to shop around noon, and as she got a shopping cart Bailes and Woodley walked up. One of them said they were trying to get as many employees to sign cards as they could by Monday, the next day. They suggested going to the delicatessen, getting a Coke, and talking about the Union. When purchasing the Cokes from Melody in the delicatessen, either Bailes or Woodley told Melody they wanted to talk to her about signing a union card, outside. Melody told them she would see them on her lunch hour. The three left the delicatessen and went to Bailes' car in the parking lot. Bailes gave Deacon two cards telling her about better pay, better hours, and better working conditions with a union. Deacon said her husband did not agree with unions, and Bailes told her to talk to him. Bailes added that there would be picket lines, joined by Kroger employees, and any Albertsons employee that did not sign would not be allowed to cross the line. The picketing employees would have hit men after the nonsigning employees and there would be a lot of ill feelings. Also the suppliers would not be allowed to cross the picket lines either. Deacon excused herself saying she would talk to her girlfriend, Connie White, about signing a card. Bailes and Woodley told Deacon if she signed the card, they would pick it up at her house because they needed them in by Monday. Deacon went to White's house and talked to her. Deacon told White what Bailes and Woodley had said about the Union and the picket line. Deacon stayed at White's house about an hour. She did not tell White that she was frightened by Bailes' remark about employees who did not sign cards. White did not want to sign a card. Deacon then returned to the store about 2 hours after getting the cards and reported the two conversations with Bailes and Woodley to the drug manager, Stevens, telling Stevens she was scared by the conversation and he said he would handle it. Deacon gave the two union cards to Stevens. The following morning, Deacon talked to Malmberg about the union conversations with Bailes and Woodley. Malmberg asked Deacon to write what happened and sign it. Deacon did as Malmberg requested, and he told her, "It will be okay."

Deacon had been solicited for Tupperware and a baby shower by employees in the breakroom during lunch or employees' breaktimes. She had not been solicited during work hours before or since the Bailes and Woodley union conversations.

Susan Ayers testified that she was hired as a cashier in October after the store had first opened. Her immediate supervisor was Pat Layne, assistant front-end manager. On Sunday, November 22, at midnight after Ayers had been relieved, she went to the breakroom to clock out. Layne was in the breakroom figuring timecards before clocking out. When Ayers entered the room, a courtesy clerk, Brian Taylor, and another cashier, Sandra, were also present. Taylor was signing a union card. Layne asked Ayers to sign a union card. Ayers testified, "She told me that I'd better sign a union card because once the Union came in if I didn't sign one I'd lose my job." After waiting a minute, Ayers asked Layne if she could wait until the next day so Ayers could discuss the card with her parents. Layne said, "No, you are either with me tonight or not at all." At this point Layne and Taylor left the room and walked toward the parking lot. Sandra told Ayers, "you'd better sign the union card because if you don't, you'll lose your job once they come in," as the two walked down the stairs from the breakroom. Sandra called to Layne to stop because Ayers was going with them to the parking lot. Ayers did sign a card in Layne's car. At that time Bailes drove up and Layne gave the cards to Bailes. Over the weekend Ayers talked with her parents and decided she should not have signed the card. Ayer's next scheduled day to work was Tuesday when she arrived at work, to the office to talk to Kayla Bentley. She told Bentley what transpired Sunday night and Bentley told Ayers she would have to talk to Manager Richard Stevens. Bentley called Stevens to the office. Both Stevens and Usery came to the office. Ayers repeated the events of Sunday night to Stevens. Ayers then asked Stevens if she could get her card back. Stevens told her she had such a right. The next day Ayers asked Layne to return the union card, and Layne told her, "Don't worry, you've already signed a union card; you'll be protected." Ayers told Layne she was not worried about protection, she wanted her card back. Layne said, "Well, they've been sent to Nashville and I can't get it back." In January, Ayers was asked by Respondent to reduce her recollection of the events of Sunday, November 22, to writing. She did so, and on January 26, 1982, she signed a notarized statement of the events.

Joseph Brown testified that he has been employed by Respondent for 4 years as a polygraph examiner. He administers approximately 40 examinations per week. In addition to other individuals, he administered the employment examination to Bailes and Woodley. Brown denied that he asked any questions of Bailes and Woodley relating to their past union activity or the union activity of either of their spouses.

Brown stated that pursuant to Alabama stated that pursuant to Alabama law, he pretested individuals by asking questions in several general areas found on the worksheet itself, noted their responses, and, depending on the areas of response, he asks specific questions during the actual test. If he perceives deception during the test, he gives a person the chance to explain the apparent deception. If the explanation is reasonable, he will retest the individual, to verify the previous apparent deception. All information supplied by the individual during the pretest is written down. From this supplied information, Brown chooses which questions to ask during the actual test from the "preemployment questions" section of the test form. The machine's responses to these questions are analyzed to determine whether the individual was deceptive. The individual's responses during the actual test are not recorded.

The question propounded during pretesting that occasionally got an affirmative response of union membership was: "Have you ever belonged to any hobby groups, social clubs, school groups, business or community club?" When individuals responded that they belonged to a union, Brown would not pursue the union inquiry; however, whatever was volunteered was recorded. Brown stated that a union affiliation indicated by an individual would not affect his ultimate hiring recommendation. Failure to recommend individuals is based on theft of money and/or merchandise from previous employers, medical problems that are current and may affect their function on the job applied for, including Respondent's liability for the necessary insurance, use of illegal drugs currently or at anytime on the job, and discrepancies between job applications and information elicited during the polygraph.[6]

Pamela Campbell Gothart testified that she was employed at Albertsons for 10 months as cosmetics manager. She was hired before the store opened and later voluntarily quit. In November she solicited flower money from the other employees in cosmetics for Nancy Head, cosmetics supervisor in Orlando. Gothart testified that she solicited the funds on the selling floor while the department employees were working. When the solicitation was completed, she ordered the flowers by phone from the store pharmacy and had the card read, "From the cosmetics department at 4348." Gothart was later thanked for the flowers and card. At Christmastime, the cosmetics and drug wall employees collected money from each other to buy a Christmas gift for Stevens, the drug manager. When the money was collected, someone went outside the store to purchase the gift, and the following day it was presented to Stevens while he worked at the store safe. Stevens was surprised when the gift was presented to him. When Stevens was presented his gift, he suggested that a gift should be bought for Malmberg. One of the employees collected the money, including a contribution from Stevens, and during lunch hour purchased the gift and later presented it to him in his office. A card was purchased in the store and taken to the back where employees signed the card that was also presented to Malmberg.

Richard Lee Stevens testified that he was drug manager at Huntsville from November 1981 through February 1982. On December 23 or 24 as he walked through the drug department, he was stopped by a group of female employees and presented a Christmas gift card. His gift was a desk plaque and within minutes he took it upstairs to his desk. While he was at his desk, the same group of employees were presenting a gift to Malmberg in his office. Stevens was not aware how the money was collected for either gift and did not contribute to Malmberg's gift or sign the Christmas card. The employees who gave the gifts were cosmetics and drug wall employees.

Analysis and Conclusions

The conduct complained of in this case covers a 2-month period from the prehire polygraph examinations in September to the arrests for trespass in November. Although the General Counsel's complaint alleges an unlawful promulgation of a no-solicitation rule, no evidence was proffered to support either the motivation for publication of the rule or the timing of the promulgation. There remains, however, several issues of facial validity of three separate rules and the lawfulness of their maintenance to be determined in conjunction with other complaint allegations.

A. Interrogation and Threats

Bailes and Woodley both testified that Brown, the polygraph examiner, asked questions about their union involvement and that of their spouses. They also testified that they made responses indicating union affiliations for themselves or their husbands. Brown admittedly received some employees, during the examinations, a past union affiliation of the examinee or a member of the family. Of the 141 polygraph reports, 11 contained notations of union affiliation. The reports on Bailes and Woodley did not contain any such notations. Brown stated that he always noted any oral responses made by the examinees during the pretest interview and that the pretest was the only portion of the test in which such responses are noted. During the actual testing, only the examinees' physiological responses are noted and those are printed by the machine itself. Brown's testimony was straightforward and did not appear guarded. He was neither evasive nor listless in his responses but attempted to answer all questions put to him. I credit Brown's denial that he asked union affiliation questions of Bailes and Woodley during the examination. I also discredit Bailes and Woodley in relation to such questions being asked. In addition to the unexplained hiatus in the recall of both witnesses, I found both witnesses much too curt during their testified recall of the events. Additionally, the plausibility of their testimony is contrary to the objective evidence in the record. The General Counsel further contends that the presence of union affiliation notations on the 11 reports in the record in conjunction with the failure to recommend 6 of the employees for hire are probative of coercive interrogation during the examination. Brown's testimony of the question propounded which received the union response was not only plausible and credible but fit logically within the framework of the printed test forms and the various notations shown on the exhibits. As Brown stated, some people volunteer nothing, some a little, and some a lot. I conclude and find that the examinees, including Bailes and Woodley, were not coercively interrogated during the polygraphs. I further conclude and find that the volunteered responses by several employee prospects during the polygraph examinations did not influence Brown's recommendation for hire. Thus, the admitted presence of the union affiliation notations were not used in a manner inconsistent with all other information acquired during examinations. Therefore, I shall recommend dismissal of the allegation relating to the polygraph examinations.

[6] Respondent, subsequent to the trial, moved to withdraw the originals of R. Exhs. 9 and 10 and submit copies. Because the originals were part of the record I considered, I shall grant Respondent's request of exhibit withdrawal but only after final disposition of the case, including any exceptions and/or appeals.

David Eng credibly testified that he was queried by Supervisor Stringfellow while working. Although, of the three separate conversations, Eng initiated one by mentioning the company letter, Supervisor Stringfellow went beyond any permissible colloquy on the letter by asking Eng if he was involved with the Union. More particularly, since in the first conversation Eng had told Stringfellow of his prior union activity and resulting discharge. As if to cap off the conversations, Stringfellow then uttered an implied threat of discharge to Eng if he became so involved again. Both the questions and the threat were very clear. In addition to Eng's credibility, his testimony is uncontroverted. I, therefore, conclude and find that Respondent, through Supervisor Stringfellow, coercively interrogated and threatened employee Eng in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and shall order the violations remedied.

The General Counsel alleged unlawful interrogation of employees by Supervisor Pat Layne. The record shows that the interrogations occurred while Layne was soliciting for the Union. She would first inquire of employees how they felt about the Union, then would solicit signatures on union cards. In total, Layne solicited about six employees for the Union. The record evidence clearly shows that Layne solicited several employees in the store while the employees were working although when her supervisor, Malmberg, questioned her union activities, she claimed all the union activity occurred off the property. Layne also expressed ignorance of the company no-solicitation rule and apparently any involvement by a supervisor on behalf of the Union. She did tell Malmberg that it would not happen again, but she lied. No sooner was she out of Malmberg's sight than she began again soliciting for the Union. Layne was a recalcitrant supervisor who was intent on helping the Union contrary to her Employer's wishes. The coercion of employees, who may have wished to remain neutral, by a prounion supervisor was not fully on the record. A prounion supervisor, acting contrary to the employer's interest, can hardly coerce prounion employees during a union solicitation. Moreover, Layne's alleged commission of an unfair labor practice was not beneficial to Respondent whereby Layne's agency status in order to bind Respondent would be supported. In fact, the opposite exists. Layne knowingly went beyond the scope of her agency as a supervisor and intentionally solicited employees against the interest of her Employer. Although Layne feigned ignorance of her accepted role as a supervisor when Malmberg confronted her with her actions, I find that Layne was well aware of her expected procompany stance during the campaign. She simply disregarded what was expected of her to do that which in her mind was paramount; solicit for the Union. I find Layne's remark to cashier Watson instructive of Layne's main purpose while employed as a supervisor for Respondent, "fill the front end [cash register] with union supporters." Layne's support of the Union, itself, bordered on the unlawful and any coercion demonstrated by Layne was beneficial to the Union and those employees soliciting for the Union. Therefore, in view of all the circumstances, I conclude and find that Layne's solicitations of employees did not include coercive interrogation chargeable to Respondent. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the complaint allegation of interrogation by Layne as an agent and supervisor of Respondent.

Woodley's testimony that Malmberg threatened her with arrest if she came back to the store after her discharge I do not credit. Woodley's testimony of the events in November, while not completely untrustworthy, was dotted with suppositions and speculation if not outright fabrications. Woodley appeared to avoid several affirmative responses that she considered injurious to her cause. Thus, she stated she never saw the no-solicitation posters nor heard discussions of the no-solicitation rule when the record evidence establishes convincingly that the rule was discussed during orientation and the rule was posted in three conspicuous places in the store. Woodley stated that she was told on several occasions by Malmberg and her drug manager, Valle, that breaktime was her own and she could do what she wanted, but she avoided any correlation with the no-solicitation rule of Respondent. She chose instead to associate any knowledge she had of a no-solicitation rule to the Kroger employee, Smith, and his admonitions expressed when he gave Woodley and Bailes the union cards. In my view Woodley's recall of the termination conversation as it relates to an arrest was prompted more by the events which subsequently transpired rather than any anticipatory exchange by Malmberg. Bailes, who was terminated at the same time for the same reason, gave no such arrest testimony and indeed both Woodley and Bailes testified that the subsequent incursion back into the store was prompted by the union representatives and the union attorneys. I, therefore, conclude and find that no threat of an arrest was made to Woodley and shall dismiss that allegation of the complaint in regard to employee Woodley.

B. No-Solicitation/No-Distribution/No-Access Rule

The record evidence clearly shows that Respondent, on hiring employees, has them read and sign "Company Personnel Policies." In addition, prior to the store opening for business, a no-solicitation poster was posted in three conspicuous places in the store, two upfront on the entrance doors and one framed on the wall upstairs by the timeclock. Due to the Board's change in case law (TRW Inc., 257 NLRB 442 (1981)) a replacement poster originated in November and was distributed to the stores for posting November 10. Malmberg effected the exchange of posters on November 12. Although the latest poster incorporated additional language, there was no specificity communicated to employees on its posting.

Respondent's three no-solicitation rules contain different language. The Company's personnel policy sheet prohibits solicitations during worktime and on store premises at anytime. It also refers the reader to the rule posted in the store. The posted rule extant from the store opening to approximately November 12 prohibited solicitation in the selling areas of the store and distribution of literature during working time or in working areas. The present rule carries the same language as its predecessor with an addition of a clarifying paragraph for working time.

The record evidence shows that the stores delicatessen area is a combination of public area, selling area, and nonselling area. Indeed, the cafeteria area of the delicatessen is expressly designated as a break area for employees off the clock. Thus, employees on break in the delicatessen are free to solicit and be solicited whereas the employees on duty in the delicatessen would not have such freedom. Whether nonemployees have a right to solicit off-duty employees in the delicatessen is not reached because that issue, although parenthetically referred to by the General Counsel and the Charging Party, is not in this case. Additionally, Malmberg referenced the parking lot as a work area. The record does sustain the parking lot as a work area at times for the courtesy clerks (bag boys or girls) but otherwise the parking lot is a nonwork area.

The Board law is clear. No-solicitation rules susceptible to an interpretation that solicitations are prohibited during all business hours, including employees' nonworking mealtimes and breaktimes, are unlawful. An ambiguous rule, however, may be made lawful in the Board's view. An employer that does not intend for its employees to misinterpret the rule against solicitation need only communicate to employees that the restriction of the rule does not apply during break periods and mealtimes or other specified periods during the workday when employees are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks. A successful communication to employees lies in completeness of the clarification. There should be no ambiguity left. Here, Respondent promulgated two rules (company personnel policies and first posted rule) with little or no clarification for employees. Indeed, as Materni testified, any explanation of either rule's language was determined solely by inquiries from employees that may or may not be forthcoming. In addition, any such inquiries could be limited to less than all the employees since the orientation sessions wherein the inquiries would originate were divided into three sessions among the approximately 150 employees. That method or approach to explanation of clarification falls far short of what the Board requires to validate a presumptively invalid rule. With regard to the present rule and its self-contained clarification of working time, there still exist unexplained ambiguities. The employees have two main break areas; the employee breakroom and the public portion of the delicatessen. The employees also have a designated parking area in the store's public parking lot. Malmberg's interpretation (the delicatessen is a selling department like all other departments in the store) and resultant enforcement of the no-solicitation rule prohibits employees to solicit one another in the public snack section of the delicatessen. Albeit, Malmberg may never have enforced the rule against employees on break in the delicatessen, employees are restrained in exercising their organizational rights by the printed rule prohibiting solicitations in selling areas.

Absent a specific explanation to employees that off-duty employees can solicit in the delicatessen snack section, both posted rules are invalid. The invalidity of the referenced posted rule likewise fails to validate the "Company Personnel Policies" rule, which is facially invalid. In my view any referenced clarification of a rule must itself be wholly valid to be effective. Malmberg's assessment that the parking lot is a work area is subject to several attacks. As a work area, employees could be confused about their rights in the parking lot when working or when in nonwork status, particularly in the absence of an explanation to employees, other than courtesy clerks, from Malmberg. The identical confusion would exist for any off-duty employee wishing to distribute literature relative to organizational rights to employees to exercise these rights. Any proscription in the parking lot is invalid as an infringement of employees' Section 7 rights.

In summary, the article in "Company Personnel Policies" relating to solicitations is invalid; the two posted no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rules are invalid; the snack section of the delicatessen is a nonselling, nonwork area for off-duty employees and the parking lot is a nonwork area except in those instances when courtesy clerks are performing their work function of collecting shopping carts or cleaning up the area.

I conclude and find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintenance of three separate no-solicitation rules and shall order a remedy. The no-distribution portions of the two posted rules are likewise facially invalid and shall be remedied.

The several acts offered as solicitations by employees contrary to Respondent's no-solicitation rule are, in my view, not probative of disparate treatment by Respondent. The charity raffle which Malmberg authorized was outside the store and only involved the Respondent's sidewalk. There was no solicitation allowed in the store of either employees or customers. The incidents, wherein employees directed persons seeking charitable donations to Malmberg, are not solicitations coming within the purview of work rules for employees. The "Home Interiors" instance was not substantiated as a solicitation in the selling area of the store, but rather occurred in the breakroom during nonwork time of the participants. The Pepsi Cola deliveryman did in fact solicit an employee on the selling floor, but no evidence was proffered to evince management's knowledge of the solicitation or any resultant condonation. The collection of money for a wedding present was restricted to a very few employees and without knowledge of supervision and certainly at a time when the recipient was not a supervisor. The collection by employees to buy flowers for a hospitalized employee, although not entirely clear, appeared to occur in the proximity of the backroom, a nonwork area of the store. The Christmas presents for Malmberg and Stevens were presented during worktime and, at least, partially solicited during worktime in selling areas of the store; however, no supervisor was involved in the solicitations nor does the credible evidence show that any supervisor had knowledge that the solicitations had taken place. Deacon's testimony of the solicitation for a baby gift was insubstantial to constitute "a solicitation" and further her testimony showed that her knowledge of the fact was based on supposition and guess work rendering the testimony nonprobative of the fact.

An employer's tolerance of a beneficient solicitation, in itself, does not constitute evidence of disparate treatment between union solicitations and other solicitations. Likewise, isolated incidents of digression from a no-solicitation rule, when known to management, do not reflect the type of widespread worktime solicitation indicative of disparate application of the rule. The Board does not use a per se approach to proven solicitations but rather evaluates the quantum of incidents involved to determine whether unlawful discrimination has occurred. Here, the quantum of proven acts of solicitations, known to management, do not evidence disparity in application of Respondent's rule.

C. Discharges

Bailes and Woodley were admittedly discharged for violating Respondent's no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rule that was posted in three conspicuous places in the store. The credible record evidence shows clearly that both Bailes and Woodley, contrary to their protestations, did solicit working employees in the selling areas of the store. Albeit Malmberg testified that his decision to discharge was based partially on reports from employees accusing Bailes and Woodley of prounion intimidation during their union solicitations, he also testified that he considered the alleged intimidations as the manner in which Bailes and Woodley engage in solicitations. That is to say that Malmberg did not view the alleged intimidations as separate and distinct from the contemporaneous solicitations. As I view the circumstances, it would make no difference whether Malmberg separated or combined the acts of solicitation and the manner in which they were conducted. The undisputed fact is simple, Bailes and Woodley did not engage in union activities within the limits of Respondent's published rule and were discharged for it.

It is well established that if an employee is disciplined pursuant to an invalid no-solicitation rule, then the discipline imposed under the rule is presumptively invalid, notwithstanding that the employee solicited while working. Flav-O-Rich Inc., 234 NLRB 1011 (1978). The presumptive invalidity of the discipline vitiates all actions against the employee including discharge. Respondent can, however, rebut the presumption by demonstrating convincingly that the solicitation impaired the employees' job performance or the performance of other employees, and this impairment was the reason for the discharge.

The General Counsel has sustained her burden of presenting a prima facie case of discrimination in the discharges of Bailes and Woodley.[7] Respondent's burden of going forward with the evidence to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie cases has not been sustained. To put it another way, Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged Bailes and Woodley absent their union activity. At first glance it appears that Respondent, in discharging Bailes and Woodley, was reacting to the reported threats against several employees and thereby sustaining its rebuttal of a discharge under an invalid rule and/or rebutting the General Counsel's prima facie case. In the last analysis, however, that is not the case for Respondent failed to fully investigate the incidents as reported by several rank-and-file employees. Moreover, the threat reported by Deacon is not so curiously subject to a question of credibility. Malmberg acted on reported facts from one side of the conduct only, failing to make Bailes and Woodley aware of the allegations against them and further failed to allow Bailes and Woodley an opportunity to explain or deny the alleged misconduct. Further, Malmberg had considered, at approximately the same time, identical transgressions by a supervisor but, rather than issue discipline, simply explained Respondent's demand that supervisors not engage in prounion activities. I find Malmberg's disparate treatment of identical actions instructive of his intent (no matter how illogical, because in my view a prounion supervisor actively engaged in union solicitations would appear more adversarial than prounion employees engaged in exercising their rights) to rid himself of prounion employees. Malmberg knew from his reports that Bailes and Woodley were the leaders and chose to squelch the organizational drive among employees by eliminating the rank-and-file leaders rather than offering instruction on company policies as he did with Layne. The record is not clear with regard to the locus of the solicitations considered to be outside the work rules; however, it is clear that only Layne's solicitations in the parking lot were considered by Malmberg as infractions of Respondent's rules in relation to the parking lot. Although Malmberg was exercising his delegated discretion as a store director in deciding the necessary discipline, his decision to discharge was not within the Respondent's stated causes for immediate dismissal. Albeit Respondent's animus can be inferred from the record evidence when considered in toto, the timing of the discharges aid in sustaining the General Counsel's case. Thus, the General Counsel's sought after inference of unlawful motivation rises to a certainty in light of the disparity exercised under Respondent's published disciplinary rules. Moreover, such facts (as shown above) have a tendency to establish that Respondent's real reason for the discharge was the nature of the protected activity, and not the violation of a "work rule" or in the alternative that soliciting for the Union was the most serious of "work rule" violations.

[7] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

Accordingly, I conclude and find that Respondent's discharges of Bailes and Woodley violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and I shall order that each be remedied.

D. Threats of Arrests and Arrests

The General Counsel's complaint alleges that employees Bailes and Woodley and Union Representatives Powers and Norwood were threatened with arrest and were arrested because of their presence in a public area of the store and because of their membership in, and activities on behalf of, the Union.

Although neither Powers nor Norwood testified, there is little dispute, if any, of the facts surrounding the arrests. Several facts are patently clear. Bailes, Woodley, Powers, and Norwood did not enter the store to engage in any organizational activity; no attempts was made by any of them to solicit any of Respondent's employees; Bailes' and Woodley's stated purpose was to display union support for their two individual causes and was instigated by either the union attorneys or Powers and Norwood; Malmberg's "not welcome in the store" admonition was directed to Bailes and Woodley, whereupon Powers and Norwood interjected themselves proclaiming that Bailes and Woodley had a right to enter a public store; neither the right to access of employees nor nonemployees was raised by the group; Malmberg felt his authority as store director was challenged and the group refused to leave the store; Malmberg did not invoke the no-solicitation rule, either for the employees or the nonemployees; Malmberg called the police who gave the four an opportunity to leave the premises or be arrested; Powers not only refused to leave but challenged the policeman's individual ability and was arrested; all four were escorted from the store; while exiting, Bailes and Woodley, at the instigation of Norwood, began loudly chanting, "Go Union" and continued until the policeman quieted them down; the two additional entries on Respondent's premises that same day were substantially the same and resulted in all four being arrested the second time and Powers and Norwood being arrested the third time.

Further, the General Counsel has not argued access rights to the delicatessen for organizational purposes, nor has the General Counsel sought an affirmative order to give the Union, or its supporters, organizational access to the delicatessen. The General Counsel does contend that the arrests are probative of Respondent's animus toward the union and prounion employees and seeks attorney fees and cost expended in defending the arrests in state court. The General Counsel apparently bases her theory of the arrests as violative of Section 8(a)(1) on the supposition that the group was using the delicatessen in a manner consistent with its purpose and was asked to leave because of their known union support. (Besides Powers and Norwood introducing themselves to Malmberg as union representatives just prior to the first arrest, all four individuals wore union jackets displaying a large union logo.)

The Charging Party argues, "clearly the fact that they did not intend to solicit openly for union membership applications does not change the fundamental objective of the visit." The object of the visit being to display the Union's support for Bailes and Woodley. The Charging Party also contends that the Act was violated because Powers and Norwood were arrested because they were union representatives.

Albeit several cases were cited by each party, I find little aid for my determination other than an inapposite comparison of the case law and the factual foundations therefor. The thrusts of the cases are twofold: the preemption of Section 7 rights over state property law where access is denied and the Board's remedial prerogatives under the statute. As regards preemption, the "trespassers" versus "invitees" circumstance is not presented in this case. For the Federal labor law to preempt state property law, there must be an issue involving communication of information on the right to organize. Any such communication is expressly absent in this record. I do not consider Bailes and Woodley's desire to show the other employees in the store that the Union is supporting them (Bailes and Woodley) as a right protected by Section 7 of the Act. To hold otherwise would dilute the basic rights to organize and lower the correlative right to access to a carnival atmosphere of logos, sign, symbols. In my view, such an atmosphere would constitute prostitution of important and fundamental rights of employee communication. More particularly, I find Bailes' and Woodley's use of the event (notwithstanding the initiative was not their own) to chant "Go Union," instructive of an atmosphere that should be denied in public selling or nonselling areas.

In each of the cited cases the Board was faced with remedying an unfair labor practice involving an affirmative denial of Section 7 rights and the resultant 8(a)(1) violation. Here the General Counsel's theory assumes coverage under the statutory umbrella due to the presence of employees and union representatives in a public store and because of their membership in, and activities on behalf of, the Union. The mere presence in a public place, without more, does not constitute conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. Thus, the Employer had the right to invoke the state property law and deny access without regard to the manner and means employed. Here, it is clearly, evident that no arrest would have resulted had Powers or Norwood not challenged the police authority and state law. Just as clearly, the second and third entries were made simply to confront the Employer and the state property law again. It is a fact that all four of the group were members of a labor organization, but there is no evidence that such membership was the cause of the arrest. But for, the aforementioned need to test the policeman's authority and individual capability, no arrest would have been made. Union membership was never in issue. Further, there is no evidence of any union activity or the exercise of any organizational rights protected by Section 7 of the Act. Without such activity or exercise, there can be no conduct cognizable by the statute. Federal labor laws does not grant employees or nonemployees an unrestricted right of access even to communicate information on the rights of employees to organize. Obviously, where, as here, the communication desired is not founded on organizational rights of employees, but rather on individual emotions the Federal labor law is unavailing. An employer's legitimate interest in controlling access to its property can only be outweighed by employees' organizational rights as defined in Section 7 of the Act. I, therefore, conclude and find that Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by initiating the arrests of Bailes, Woodley, Powers, or Norwood on any of the three occasions under scrutiny here. Further, if any threat of arrest was uttered, it was made by the uniformed policeman of Huntsville, Alabama, and, therefore, is not chargeable to Respondent or its agent, Malmberg.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent has, through its supervisor, Jack Stringfellow, interrogated and threatened its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By maintaining a no-solicitation/no-distribution/no-access rule in three separate printed forms, each of which fails to clarify for employees their right to solicit in behalf of the Union during nonwork times and in nonwork areas and which prohibits distributions during worktime in work areas without explanation, Respondent has interfered with, coerced, and restrained its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. Respondent's terminations of Debra Bailes and Candace Woodley on November 23 were discriminatory and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order the Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having discriminatorily discharged employees Debra Bailes and Candace Woodley, I find it necessary to order it to offer them full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, with backpay computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[8] from November 23, 1981, the date of discharge, to the date of proper offers of reinstatement.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On January 27, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, City Dodge Center, Inc., Minneapolis, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

289 NLRB No. 25

Everett Rotenberry, Esq., for the General Counsel.
David R. Hols, Esq., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was litigated before me at Minneapolis, Minnesota, on 8 and 9 September 1987 pursuant to charges filed and served on 5 September 1986[1] and complaint issued on 27 July 1987. The complaint alleges that City Dodge Center, Inc. (Respondent) discharged employees Robert Cozatt, Peter Rowland, Michael Ketchmark, Jerome Rosa, Michael Manning, and Mark Elliott because they engaged in protected concerted activities. Respondent denies the commission of unfair labor practices, and affirmatively asserts the employees were not engaged in protected activities and were not discharged.

After considering all the evidence, the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified before me, and the able posttrial briefs of the parties, I am persuaded that Respondent, for the reasons set forth in section III of this decision, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Minnesota corporation with an office and place of business in Minneapolis, Minnesota, where it is engaged in the retail sale of automobiles. During the calendar year ending 31 December 1986, Respondent, in the course and conduct of these business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and purchased and received at its Minneapolis, Minnesota facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Minnesota. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. SUPERVISORS AND AGENTS

At all times material, the following named persons have occupied the positions set forth opposite their respective names, and are now, and have been at all times material, supervisors of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and agents of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act:

William Hatfield	President
Ruben Przybilla	Controller
Carl Torres	Service Coordinator

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In August 1986, Respondent's mechanics discussed their concerns regarding pay scales, shop supplies, and what they considered to be improper treatment by Ruben Przybilla. These discussions culminated in a group decision[2] about 26 August that Robert Cozatt, as the group's spokesman, request Respondent's president, William Hatfield, to meet with all of them to discuss their grievances. They decided not to approach Hatfield until 29 August because Chrysler representatives were visiting the facility and the employees did not want to interrupt Hatfield while the Chrysler people were present.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We agree with the judge that the facts here do not support a finding that the employees herein participated in either a sitdown or an intermittent strike. Thus, on August 29, 1986, when the employees were directed to leave the facility after stopping work in an attempt to secure a meeting with President Hatfield, they did not remain in the plant en masse. All but a few of the employees left the premises. The remaining employees stayed in the plant for about 2 more hours. They left peacefully after President Hatfield read a prepared statement telling them they could go to work, leave the premises, or remain on the premises and be terminated. The action of these few employees simply does not rise to the level of the disregard of property rights and defiance of law associated with an unprotected sitdown strike as defined in NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240 (1939), cited by the Respondent.

Nor does the action of the employees over the period of August 29 to September 3, 1986, amount to an intermittent strike. When the Respondent determined that the employees had chosen the option of leaving rather than returning to work, the Respondent instructed them to return on the next working day, September 2, 1986. The employees did as they were instructed and returned to work despite the uncertainty created by the help-wanted advertisement placed by the Respondent on August 29, 1986. According to the credited testimony, the employees decided to await an approach from management regarding their request for a meeting. None was forthcoming and consequently the employees did not punch in as scheduled the following day, but instead met and agreed to again request a meeting with President Hatfield. These actions cannot reasonably be construed as a plan to strike, return to work, and strike again. To the contrary, they appear to be a series of reactions to steps taken by the Respondent.

The mechanics were scheduled to begin work at 8 a.m. on 29 August, but they did not do so. Instead they gathered in the break area and agreed that they would not work until Hatfield agreed to meet with them and discuss their grievances. Accordingly, when their supervisor, Service Coordinator Torres, asked why they were not working, Cozatt, as their spokesman, told Torres they were not going to work until they had a meeting scheduled with Hatfield for the purpose of discussing shop problems. Torres suggested they put their grievances in writing for him to take to Hatfield. The mechanics declined to so do on the ground this had previously been tried and failed to bring results. Torres left and reported to Przybilla that the men were refusing to work until they met with Hatfield. Przybilla consulted with Hatfield via the telephone. Hatfield instructed that the employees be told to go to work or go home. Przybilla and Torres then met with the mechanics in the breakroom about 9 a.m. There is some confusion regarding who said what, but I am persuaded that it was Przybilla, not Torres, who told the employees to go to work or go home. Employee testimony that Torres or Przybilla told them the shop or service area had been closed is denied by Torres and Przybilla. Noting that Michael Ketchmark, parts counterman, credibly testified that he was independently told by Torres, at 9:30 or 10 a.m., that the shop was being closed and Ketchmark should report to work on 2 September. I credit the mechanics that Torres and/or Przybilla told them their workplace was closed and they should return on 2 September. I find it most probable and conclude that this was said after the mechanics clearly indicated they could not take the return to work option, and that it was said for the purpose of persuading the mechanics to leave the premises inasmuch as they were clearly not going to work. All but a few of the mechanics left the premises. About noon, Hatfield read a prepared statement to those mechanics remaining. His message was short and simple. They had the options of going to work, leaving the premises, or remaining on the premises and being terminated. Hatfield refused to respond to Cozatt's inquiry about whether Hatfield would schedule a meeting with the employees. The remaining mechanics then left the premises. That afternoon Respondent placed a help-wanted ad in the local newspaper offering a $500 reward to mechanics.

The following workday, 2 September, all the mechanics and Ketchmark returned to work at the scheduled hour and completed the workday without incident. The mechanics had decided, during a brief meeting before starting, to work and await an approach from management regarding their request for a meeting. None came. This was not, however, the end of the matter. The following day, 3 September, the mechanics did not punch in as scheduled. Their immediate supervisor, McCartney, had been discharged the day before. Cozatt met with Roland, Manning, Rosa, Elliott, and Ellefson outside Respondent's facility shortly before 8 a.m. Cozatt told them of McCartney's discharge, which caused the employees some concern because they had regarded McCartney as a sympathetic intermediary between them and higher management. By this time they had also seen Respondent's newspaper advertisements, which they considered an indication that Respondent was going to replace them with new hires. Shortly after this gathering outside the building, these six employees repaired to a nearby restaurant where they agreed they would again request a meeting for the purpose of discussing (1) the newspaper ad that they feared meant they were going to be replaced, (2) who might be terminated, (3) the pay scale, (4) shop supplies, and (5) Przybilla's attitude. They had no plan to take any action to protest McCartney's discharge. The six of them returned to Respondent's service department between 9:30 and 10 a.m. According to Cozatt, Elliott, and Manning,[3] they were met by Torres who abruptly told them they were terminated, but gave them permission to take their personal tools from the facility. Torres denies saying the employees were terminated, and asserts the conversation was confined to a statement by the employees of intent to or a request for permission to remove their tools, in which he acquiesced. The employees' version is credited. In addition to the inability of Torres to recall whether the employees made a request or statement of intent, I find his version extremely improbable because it is clear the employees entered the shop to repeat their request for a meeting. There is no evidence from which to infer their purpose was to pick up their tools, which required considerable time and the use of pickup trucks, and which they would have to return to the shop in order to work if their request was met. Moreover, Torres' comments as related by the three mechanics in a believable manner were consistent with the contemporaneous conduct of Przybilla who, according to the credible testimony of Ketchmark and Dennis Brown, Ketchmark's supervisor and on 3 September is no longer employed by Respondent, came into the parts department a few minutes after 8:05 a.m. (before Torres told the mechanics they were terminated) and asked if Ketchmark was working. When Ketchmark responded that he was not yet working because he was waiting to talk to Brown, who was on the phone at the time, Przybilla ordered him to leave. Przybilla's question and reaction to the answer show he was trying to find out if, and concluded that, Ketchmark was in concert with the mechanics. That Ketchmark was considered to be a striker because he was not working was reluctantly acknowledged by Torres, and is apparent from Respondent's contention he was "replaced." Brown further testified that, about 9 or 10 a.m, on 3 September, Przybilla pulled a number of timecards from the rack,[4] and said either that those employees to whom the cards pertained were terminated, fired, or replaced. Brown does not recall for certain which word Przybilla used, but credibly testified, "Basically he told me that they were done." Whichever word Przybilla used, and I do not believe the word used was "replaced" because none of the alleged replacements had even been interviewed when Przybilla removed the timecards, I agree with Brown that the message was clear, "they were done." Przybilla says he picked up the mechanics' timecards late in the day on 3 September, and did so because they had picked up their tools and he figured they left. He does not claim he picked them up because they had been replaced. I credit Przybilla that he picked up the mechanics' timecards on 3 September, but I do not credit his testimony that he did this in late afternoon, or that he did not talk to Ketchmark on that date, or was not in the parts area during the morning of that day. Brown, who has not been shown to be prejudiced against Respondent and who gave every indication of being an honest witness careful to say no more than what he knew, is credited where his testimony conflicts with that of Ketchmark or Przybilla. Accordingly, I conclude that Przybilla did order Ketchmark to leave within a few minutes of 8:05 a.m., and did communicate to Brown that the employees whose timecards he picked up an hour or so later were no longer employees of Respondent. Torres' statement to Brown later that day to the effect that a replacement for Ketchmark would start work on Monday confirms that Ketchmark was indeed "done" so far as Respondent was concerned, and Respondent no longer considered him an employee.

[2] Present were mechanics Cozatt, Rowland, Elliott, Manning, Hostetler, and Ellefson.

[3] Rowland, Rosa, and Ellefson did not testify. Elliot's written statement of 5 September 1986 is consistent with his testimony before me.

On the afternoon of 3 September, Torres, and apparently Hatfield in the case of Harold Pederson, interviewed applicants who had responded to the newspaper ad. Torres testified that he hired Allen Potter, William Potter, William Jaskulke, Robert Morris, and Michael Rehling by 6 p.m. on 3 September, and Harold Pederson had been hired as a partsman the same day. Torres testified that Rehling started work on 5 September, and the others started on 4 or 5 September. Jaskulke's application shows him available to start work on 8 August 1986. I conclude this should read 8 September 1986 because the date of the application has been corrected to 2 September 1986. Allen Potter's application shows him available to start work on 8 September. An agreement signed by Hatfield and Harold Pederson on 3 September sets his starting date as 11 September. It is therefore doubtful that Jaskulke, Allen Potter, or Pederson started work on 4 or 5 September. Jaskulke's own records make it improbable that they did. I therefore conclude that Respondent has not proved these three were working on 4 September. Add Rehling to their ranks, and only William Potter and Robert Morris have been shown by any unrebutted evidence, however slight, to have started work before 4 September. According to Torres, William Potter replaced Cozatt, Rehling replaced Elliott, Morris replaced Manning, Allen Potter replaced Rowland, and Rosa and Ketchmark had been replaced. Pederson was the replacement for Ketchmark. Assuming arguendo the correctness of this reckoning, no one was working in place of Elliott, Rowland, or Ketchmark on 4 September. Certainly no one had replaced any of the alleged discriminatees when they were terminated by Torres and Przybilla on 3 September.

On 4 September, Ellefson was permitted to return to work on the ground he had not been replaced. Schultz had returned to work as directed and therefore continued as an employee. Ketchmark and Rosa were denied a return to work on 4 September on the ground they had been replaced.

Respondent directed letters to Peter Rowland, Mark Elliott, Robert Cozatt, and Jerome Rosa in 1986, on 17, 20, 23, and 27 October, respectively, signed by Torres and reading as follows:

> City Dodge presently has a job opening in a position for which you are qualified. You are hereby offered reinstatement to the Service Department of City Dodge. Please report for work within five days of this letter. If you do not report and do not otherwise call in response to this letter, we will assume you are not interested and proceed with other hiring.

Discussion

The employees' 29 August refusal to work unless and until Hatfield agreed to meet with them and discuss their concerns on matters clearly related to wages and working conditions was a protected concerted activity. Respondent, citing Fansteel[5] and Peck, Inc.,[6] argues that the activity was not protected because the employees occupied the property while refusing to work. I do not agree. Here the employees did not, as in Fansteel, seize and hold Respondent's facility for several days, nor did they battle with police officers seeking their eviction, nor did they violate a court order to surrender the premises, nor did they, as did the employees in Peck, occupy and refuse to leave a plant area until evicted by police. The 29 August situation before me is more reminiscent of the happenings in American Mfg. Co.,[7] which the Second Circuit recited as follows:

> [T]he T.W.O.C. shop committee . . . met to consider the situation at the plant and decided that it had became essential to endeavor to induce the Company to resume negotiations with T.W.O.C. In order to accomplish this, the shop committee determined to have the weavers in the Nu-Art Department temporarily stop work the next morning while it called upon the Company officials concerning the resumption of Union negotiations. Pursuant to this plan, at ten O clock in the morning of June 29, without the use of any force and without any disorder, all the weavers stopped their looms; immediately thereafter > the shop committee told Anderson and Fardy, who were in the weaving rooms, that the stoppage had taken place in order to get a promise from the company that it would meet and bargain collectively with the T.W.O.C. representatives. Anderson, who in the absence of Filley and Brown was in charge of the plant, refused to talk to the committee and told the employees to go back to work. A little later, Anderson approached the meeting of the employees with the shop committee which was being held in a back room of the plant and ordered the men either to return to work or to leave the premises. Some of the men returned to work and others stood around in groups talking. At noon most of the weavers went out to lunch and on returning with the intention of going back to work were stopped at one of the entrances and fourteen were discharged. Two others who had not left the building were discharged during the noon hour. The other weavers were admitted.

[4] Elliott confirms that he saw Przybilla "tearing" the timecards from their slots that morning while the mechanics were removing their tools from the shop.

The Second Circuit said (106 F.2d at 68), regarding the above-described employee conduct:

> We do not regard the action of . . . employees in standing around the premises for a period of not more than two hours, while an attempt was being made to persuade the Company to fix a date for collective bargaining with T.W.O.C., as in the nature of a sit-down strike which would permit the termination of the employee relationship.

The Board, in Golay,[8] expressly adopted the Court's language last quoted, and further noted it had long before held in Cudahy Packing Co.[9] that where employees engaged in a brief work stoppage, but remained in their parking area, conversing in scattered groups or stood peaceably at or near their work station, there was no sit-down strike or "outlaw enterprise" because the stoppages "did not involve seizure or destruction of, or damage to the Respondent's property with resultant financial loss to the Respondent," and there was therefore no warrant for holding the stoppages were not protected. These precedents and the facts in the instant case persuade me that the employees here involved did not engage in an unprotected sit-down strike or plant seizure, whichever term is used, on 29 October. To the contrary, on that date they engaged in a protected concerted work stoppage in pursuit of an adjustment of pay and work-related grievances.

Respondent also contends the employees engaged in an unprotected intermittent strike. There is no showing the employees had any plan on 29 August to engage in a series of intermittent strikes, nor did the events of that day or the tranquil 2 September day provide Respondent any reason to believe such a plan existed. I am persuaded the employees on 29 August in fact had no idea what they might do if their request was refused. This conclusion is supported by their rather aimless conduct when it was refused. They simply had not thought it through and, when Hatfield gave them the three options, they opted to save their jobs, go home, and return to work the next workday as Torres certainly and Przybilla probably had invited them to do before Hatfield issued his ukase.

The employees did not occupy the shop on 3 September, and I do not believe their remaining in the shop on 29 August was a reason for their discharge. They had selected one of Hatfield's options on 29 August and were solicited to return to work on 2 September, which they did with no disciplinary repercussions or threat of discipline for their 29 August conduct. The mechanics did not go to work on 3 September because they had no preconceived plan of action and were uncertain what course of action to take in the light of Respondent's failure to contact them on 2 September and the help-wanted advertisement. Their failure to punch in was a protected concerted activity because they were gathered together in order to determine what, if anything, they were going to do about their grievances, Respondent's failure to affirmatively respond to their request for a meeting on these grievances, and their apprehension that the advertisement meant they were going to be replaced by new hires. They decided to again request a meeting to discuss their concerns. They also agreed that Cozatt, as their spokesman, would tell Respondent they would not work until they met with management. It was then that they entered the shop for the first time that day. So far as Respondent knew, they may have decided to return to work, but, with no preamble, Torres bluntly told the mechanics they were terminated. There is no evidence Torres had any idea what the mechanics were going to say or do, and I conclude they were discharged because Respondent considered them to be strikers that morning, which in effect they were by withholding their labor. The decision to discharge "strikers" was made earlier that morning as reflected by Przybilla's discharge of Ketchmark shortly after 8 a.m. because Ketchmark was not working, and therefore was considered a striker in concert with the mechanics. That Ketchmark was so considered is further shown by the advice given him by Torres on 4 September that he had been replaced. The fact that Ketchmark was discharged for this reason supports my conclusion that the concerted work stoppage of 3 September was the sole reason for the mechanics' discharge because Ketchmark was not one of the group that originally stopped working on 29 August, and only left work that day because Torres told him the shop was closed and he should return to work on 2 September.[10]

Respondent's contention that the mechanics and Ketchmark were lawfully replaced is without merit. It is true that an employer is free to permanently replace economic strikers who do not return to work, but here the affected employees were unlawfully discharged on the morning of 3 September before any job applicants were even interviewed, much less hired. Unlawfully discharged employees remain employees entitled to reinstatement to their former jobs, or substantially equivalent jobs, and may not be permanently replaced by new hires. Accordingly, the defense of replacement, if it in fact took place, is not applicable to this case and I see no need to decide its merit had the employees not been discharged the morning of 3 September.

[9] 29 NLRB 837 (1941), petition for review denied 123 F.2d 63 (8th Cir. 1941).

[10] The refusal of the mechanics to work obviously seriously curtailed or effectively eliminated automobile repair work on 29 August, and therefore the services of Ketchmark, a parts counterman, were probably not needed that day.

Whether the offers of employment issued after the discharges were valid offers of reinstatement is referred to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Robert Cozatt, Pete Rowland, Michael Ketchmark, Jerome Rose, Michael Manning, and Mark Elliott because they engaged in protected concerted activity, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

In addition to the usual cease-and-desist order and the posting of appropriate notices, my recommended Order will require Respondent to offer the six employees discharged on 3 September 1986 unconditional reinstatement to their former jobs, or substantially equivalent positions if their former jobs no longer exist, and make them whole for all wages lost as a result of their unlawful discharge, the backpay to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[11] I shall also order Respondent to remove from its files any reference to the 3 September 1986 discharges of these employees, and to notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. The visitatorial clause requested by the General Counsel is unnecessary in the circumstances of this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, City Dodge Center, Inc., Minneapolis, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging its employees, or otherwise discriminating in any manner with respect to their tenure of employment or any term or condition of their employment because they engage in protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions to Robert Cozatt, Peter Rowland, Michael Ketchmark, Jerome Rosa, Michael Manning, and Mark Elliott, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any references to the discharges of Robert Cozatt, Peter Rowland, Michael Ketchmark, Jerome Mesa, Michael Manning, and Mark Elliott, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at the Respondent's place of business in Minneapolis, Minnesota, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

ORDER REMANDING PROCEEDING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On January 6, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued a decision in this proceeding. The Respondent filed exceptions, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

On February 20, 1987, the Board issued John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375. The Board has decided to remand this case to the administrative law judge for further consideration in light of Deklewa,[1] including, if necessary, reopening the record to obtain more evidence on the collective-bargaining representative status of the Unions.

Accordingly, it is ordered that this proceeding is remanded to the administrative law judge for further action as noted above.

It is further ordered that the administrative law judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision containing such resolutions, findings, conclusions, and recommendations as found necessary consistent with the remand. Following service of the supplemental decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not remand this case to the administrative law judge. The fact that the Board in John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), provided for retroactive application of that decision does not justify the Board raising an issue no party has argued in this case.

Even though the Board may have the legal authority to act in the absence of exceptions, the general practice, as codified in the Board's Rules, is to limit the scope of review to the issues raised by the parties. See Anniston Yarn Mills, 103 NLRB 1495 (1953) ("well-established Board practice" is to adopt a judge's findings to which no exceptions are filed); Section 102.46(b)(2) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. ("Any exception . . . not specifically urged shall be deemed to have been waived.") Consistent with the logic of the Rules, the Board has rejected exceptions that fail to comply with the requirement that an excepting party must set forth with specificity the portions of a judge's decision to which it excepts and the basis for the exceptions. See Bonanza Sirloin Pit, 275 NLRB 310 (1985), and cases cited therein. A fortiori when no party has raised an issue, the Board should decline to do so on behalf of any party. See Springfield Transit Management, 281 NLRB 72 (1986), in which the Board declined to pass on a jurisdictional issue, despite the recent issuance of Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), because no party raised the matter in its exceptions.

The judge's decision in this case issued in January 1987. The Respondent filed exceptions, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief. Neither party raised the 8(f) issue. Deklewa issued immediately after the parties filed their position papers. Throughout the entire proceeding herein and in its exceptions, the Respondent's sole defenses to the complaint allegations that the Unions enjoyed 9(a) status were that the Unions had not been certified and that the bargaining units were inappropriate as they were one-person units. Neither of these defenses would appear to be affected in any way by the issuance of Deklewa.[1] No party sought to bring Deklewa's applicability to the Board's attention. Now, more than 15 months after Deklewa issued, even though the parties still have not raised the 8(f) issue, the majority does so sua sponte. Under these circumstances, I believe the majority's action is an unjustified departure from the above-cited precedent and an abuse of discretion. I therefore dissent.

[1] Deklewa was decided approximately 2 weeks after the Respondent's exceptions were filed with the Board in this proceeding. While it is true that the Respondent's exceptions do not precisely anticipate the theory, available under Deklewa, by which the Respondent would not have a bargaining obligation with the Charging Parties, Exception 2 in part argues that: "At no time did the Respondent formally recognize Local 894 as bargaining agent and in October, 1985 requested certification by the Board. Clearly the Respondent was not willing to recognize Local 894 unless it was certified." This assertion, coupled with Deklewa's declaration that its rules shall apply "to all pending cases," supra at 1389, is sufficient to authorize a remand here. We find it unnecessary to comment on what inferences can be drawn on the present record as to the existence or nonexistence of a 9(a) relationship. The parties will be given an opportunity to argue the applicability of Deklewa to the present record and the need, if any, to proffer additional evidence. Member Babson agrees that a remand is warranted under the circumstances of this case.

[1] The majority admits the Respondent's exceptions do not relate directly to the issues decided in Deklewa. Nevertheless they contend the language of the Respondent's Exception 2, coupled with Deklewa's statement that its revision of 8(f) law will be applied retroactively, justifies a remand in this case. However, as noted above, the Respondent's exceptions to the bargaining order were based on specific allegations about the Unions' 9(a) status, i.e., that the Unions were not certified and that they represented one-person units. The Respondent's Exception 2, quoted by the majority, that the Unions could never be 9(a) representatives without Board certification, had no merit when filed, does not address the area of law restructured by Deklewa, and still has no merit. Accordingly, I do not find the Respondent's exceptions broad enough to encompass a specific Deklewa issue and put that Deklewa issue before the Board.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 18, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, as modified.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing and refusing to meet at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness, by impermissibly withdrawing recognition,[2] and by failing to furnish relevant information requested on July 12, 1982.[3] The judge found, however, that the Respondent's bargaining obligation ceased on or after July 28, 1982, following a merger between the certified union, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, AFL-CIO, CLC (the Brotherhood), and another union, the Glass Bottle Blowers Association of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO (the Glass Bottle Blowers). The merged union became known as Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (the Union). Relying principally on the Board's decision in Amoco Production Co., 262 NLRB 1240 (1982),[4] the judge found that the merger was improper as it pertained to the employees in the certified units because these employees were not afforded an opportunity to select delegates to a special convention approving the merger. Accordingly, the judge found that no bargaining violations continued after the date of the merger and that no affirmative remedial order on behalf of the Union was warranted. We disagree. As explained below, the legal proposition underlying the judge's ruling has since been rejected by the Supreme Court, and there is insufficient evidence that the merger of the Brotherhood and the Glass Bottle Blowers produced a dramatic change in the representative entity that would warrant finding lack of continuity in representation.

On June 15, 1979, the Brotherhood was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's service, maintenance, and technical employees (Unit A) and of its registered nurses (Unit B). As of the date of the July 28, 1982 merger, the parties had not reached agreement on an initial collective-bargaining agreement covering employees in the certified units. The Brotherhood's

[1] The Respondent argues that the judge erred in failing to find that the allegations added in the second amended complaint and at the hearing are barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act. The Respondent argues that because these allegations occurred after the charge was filed and more than 6 months before they were first introduced into the complaint that they are time barred. We agree with the judge, for the reasons he stated, that these allegations are not time barred. Contrary to the Respondent, as the judge did, we find that NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301 (1959), is controlling here. We also find that subsequent to the Supreme Court's decision in Fant Milling the reasoning in NLRB v. Newton Bros. Lumber Co., 214 F.2d 472 (5th Cir. 1954), on which the Respondent relies, is no longer apt. Contrary to the Respondent's argument, it is clear that the situations in Fant Milling and here are parallel in that each involves incidents that occurred after the original charge was filed and more than 6 months before they were first introduced into the complaint. (See the Board's decision at 117 NLRB 1277, 1288 (1957), and the court of appeals' decision at 258 F.2d 851, 854 (5th Cir. 1958) in Fant Milling, which verify the dates of the allegation and the issuance of the complaint there.) Yet, in Fant Milling, for the reasons the judge here has set out, the Supreme Court found the allegations were not time barred. For those same reasons, as the judge elaborates, the allegations here are not time barred. Further, regarding the Respondent's reliance on Newton Bros. Lumber, we note that another respondent, in Proctor & Gamble Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 658 F.2d 968 (4th Cir. 1981), made the same argument based on Newton and another case as the Respondent does here. The Proctor & Gamble court rejected that contention with words equally applicable here, i.e., "these cases were decided before Fant Milling and did not apply its test for determining the inclusion of subsequent events; to this extent, they are unpersuasive." 658 F.2d at 985 fn. 19. Accordingly, we reject the Respondent's 10(b) defense.

[2] In finding the withdrawal of recognition unlawful, the judge stated that the Board, in Lammert Industries, 229 NLRB 895 fn. 2 (1977), stated its "longstanding disavowal of the dictum in Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), that the filing of a decertification petition suspends an Employer's bargaining obligation." We note that the statement was made by a plurality of the Board in Lammert and that it did not represent the view of the dissenters nor, necessarily, that of the concurring Board member. Indeed, in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 at 1089 (1982), the Board treated this statement as the principle of Telautograph that it was overruling. We also note that, regardless of the split of the Board on the characterization of the suspension of bargaining issue in Telautograph, all five Board members in Lammert found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by refusing to bargain.

[3] We find no merit to the Respondent's contention that the information requested on July 12, 1982—names, dates of hire, wage rates, job title and description, and changes in fringe benefits regarding all bargaining unit employees—was not necessary or relevant for the purposes of collective bargaining. On the contrary, the record shows that the certified union requested such information for purposes of collective bargaining on March 17, 1980, and, as detailed by the judge, was unlawfully denied the requested information. Thereafter, the union again sought such information on December 28, 1981, which it received. On July 12, 1982, it sought an update of the matters previously sought for the purposes of collective bargaining. In these circumstances, where the information sought concerned subjects that had long been the subject of collective bargaining, the union's admitted attempt to pursue an unfair labor practice claim that concerned some of those subjects does not establish that the information was sought solely in support of an unfair labor practice claim to the exclusion of the collective-bargaining process.

[4] Amoco concerned the propriety of a "members only" union affiliation vote, which excluded nonmembers from the voting process. The Board held that, under Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1), unit employees, whether union members or not, must be permitted to participate and vote in an affiliation election. This principle was later applied to a merger of local unions in F. W. Woolworth Co., 268 NLRB 805 (1984) (F. W. Woolworth I).

internal rules provided that employees of a newly organized employer, such as the Respondent, are not enrolled as union members, do not pay dues, and do not have a local union chartered unless and until agreement on an initial collective-bargaining agreement is reached. Because no bargaining agreements had been reached covering the employees of the certified units at the time of the merger, no local union had yet been chartered and no unit employees had yet become union members. When the Brotherhood selected delegates to the special convention to consider the merger, only members of chartered local unions were permitted to send delegates. Accordingly, inasmuch as the employees in the certified units were not as yet members of a chartered local union, they were unrepresented at the special convention and did not otherwise express a preference regarding the merger.[5]

In F. W. Woolworth Co., 285 NLRB 854 (1987),[6] the Board held that, with the issuance of Seattle-First National Bank,[7] the failure to permit nonunion employees to vote on the proposed merger of local unions can no longer be grounds for finding the merger to be invalid. In the instant case, the conduct of the merged unions alleged to be impermissible involved only the exclusion of employees because of their nonmembership in the Brotherhood at the time of the merger. Under Seattle-First National Bank and F. W. Woolworth II, nonmembership of the employees of the Respondent and their lack of participation in the merger decision is not a basis for limiting or denying a bargaining order in this case.[8]

Respondent contends, however, that the merger resulted in substantial changes in the structure of the new union so that the merged union was not a continuation or successor of the certified union, i.e., that there is no continuity of representative.[9] Contrary to the Respondent, we find that the changes in representation produced by the merger of the Brotherhood and the Glass Bottle Blowers were not sufficiently dramatic in their impact on the unit employees to warrant a finding of lack of continuity in representation.

As the judge found, the record shows that the Union assumed all assets and liabilities of both the Brotherhood and the Glass Bottle Blowers. Each of the 85 affiliated local unions of the Brotherhood and the 241 local unions of the Glass Bottle Blowers continued operating in the same manner with the same local officers as before the merger. No Brotherhood local was merged into any local of the Glass Bottle Blowers as a consequence of the merger. Although it appears that there have been some changes in the identity of International union representatives servicing various local unions, Joseph Galvin Jr., former vice president of the Brotherhood and the individual who has negotiated with the Respondent on behalf of the Respondent's unit employees, testified that he remains the official representative of these employees.

Following the merger, the president of the Glass Bottle Blowers became president of the Union. The president of the Brotherhood became assistant to the president of the Union. The secretary-treasurer of the Glass Bottle Blowers became the secretary-treasurer of the Union. The secretary-treasurer of the Brotherhood became the International auditor of the Union. The Union now has four vice presidents, three of whom formerly occupied that position with the Glass Bottle Blowers, and one of whom is a former official of the Brotherhood. The Union's executive board includes 11 former members of the Glass Bottle Blowers' executive board and 3 former officials of the Brotherhood. At the time of the merger, the Brotherhood consisted of about 10,700 dues-paying members and had headquarters in East Liverpool, Ohio, where the Respondent is also located. The Glass Bottle Blowers consisted of about 67,000 dues-paying members and had headquarters in Media, Pennsylvania. The Union now has headquarters in the former headquarters of the Glass Bottle Blowers. Under the provisions of the merger agreement, the Brotherhood agreed to abide by the terms of the constitution of the Glass Bottle Blowers, with certain exceptions pertaining to the term of the office of local union officers, the election of negotiating committee members, dues structure, and the selection of delegates to the 1983 AFL-CIO convention.

The Respondent contends that continuity of representative is absent in this case because unit employees must deal with a union no longer based in their hometown, because the Brotherhood discarded its constitution and agreed to abide by the terms of the Glass Bottle Blowers' constitution, and because the Union did not have unspecified "local individuals" holding key offices. Contrary to the Respondent, we find that there is continuity of representation between the certified union, i.e., the Brotherhood, and the merged union.

[5] The Brotherhood informed the unit employees of the upcoming merger convention but did not ascertain their desires.

[6] F. W. Woolworth II.

[7] NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees Local 1182 (Seattle-First National Bank), 475 U.S. 192 (1986), in which the United States Supreme Court held that the Board exceeded its authority by establishing a rule requiring that nonunion employees be permitted to vote in an affiliation election before the Board would order an employer to bargain with the affiliated union.

[8] The record shows that members of the Brotherhood were notified of the impending merger well in advance of the special merger convention. Delegates to the convention were selected by each local union in representative numbers proportionate to the size of the local union membership. The delegates approved the merger by a vote of 159 to 17. Apart from the absence of participation by the Respondent's employees, there is no contention before us that the merger process was improper.

[9] The judge found it unnecessary to consider or make findings regarding these contentions.

First, it is undisputed that the Union assumed all the assets and liabilities of the Brotherhood and that all local unions formerly affiliated with either the Brotherhood or the Glass Bottle Blowers continued to operate in the same manner with the same local officers as before the merger. Of course, because no local union had yet been chartered on behalf of the Respondent's unit employees and no collective-bargaining agreement yet reached, there were no officers or agreements to continue as before under the terms of the merger. The Brotherhood's former representative, Galvin Jr., testified, however, that he remained the official representative of the Respondent's unit employees, a role he occupied before the merger.

Second, although they occupy new positions, the former principal officers of the Brotherhood continue in a representative capacity with the Union following the merger. The greater number of former officials of the Glass Bottle Blowers in the new hierarchy of the Union is consistent with the ratio of dues-paying members in the merged union and is not so substantial on its face as to constitute a dramatic diminution in the Brotherhood's representative role in the merged union.

Third, we find the factors relied on by the Respondent insufficient to show that the Union is not a continuation of the Brotherhood. The location of the Union's headquarters in a nearby State rather than in the same city where the headquarters of the Brotherhood formerly stood is of little consequence in relation to the fact that the Union has assumed all assets and liabilities of the Brotherhood. Local contacts with the Union undoubtedly will increase and participation of local union officers will arise, if and when a contract is reached and a local union is eventually chartered on behalf of the Respondent's unit employees.

Although the Brotherhood agreed to abide by the constitution of the Glass Bottle Blowers under the terms of the merger agreement, provision was made in that agreement for retention of significant local practices of the Brotherhood, including dues structure, term of office for local union officers, and practices and procedures for the election of contract negotiating committee members. Further, the constitution of the Glass Bottle Blowers contains no provisions limiting the authority of a constituent local union to negotiate, execute, and administer collective-bargaining agreements to any degree significantly different from those contained in the constitution of the Brotherhood. Neither constitution requires International union approval of local agreements and both constitutions require International union approval of local strike action. Thus, the evidence does not show that the degree of local union control will be fundamentally different because of the merger.[10] In these circumstances, we find that the agreement of the merged unions to abide by, in most respects, the constitution of the Glass Bottle Blowers is insufficient to outweigh those factors tending to show that the Union is a continuation of the certified union.

Because we find that the Union is the lawful successor to the Brotherhood, we find that the Respondent was obligated to continue recognition and bargaining on and after July 28, 1982, and that its refusal to do so violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices that violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order that the Respondent recognize and, on request, bargain with Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, through its designated agents, as the successor to the certified union, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, CLC, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the units found to be appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if agreements are reached, embody such understandings in writing.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Potters' Medical Center, Inc., East Liverpool, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain, on request, in good faith with Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of the employees in the following appropriate units, by failing or refusing to meet with the Union at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness for purposes of collective bargaining, by withdrawing recognition from the Union without lawful cause, and by failing to comply with requests from the Union for information to which it is entitled. The appropriate bargaining units are:

[10] For these reasons, the instant case is factually distinguishable from Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB 214 (1988), in which the Board found that the affiliation of the certified union with another labor organization produced such a dramatic diminution in the autonomy of the certified union that there was a lack of continuity in representation of the unit employees and, accordingly, no obligation on the part of the employer to bargain with the organization that emerged from the affiliation.

Member Johansen dissented in Western Commercial and he continues to adhere to that dissent. However, in the circumstances of this case, he fully agrees with his colleagues that the Union is a continuation of the certified union and agrees, therefore, that the Respondent was obligated to continue to recognize and bargain with the Union.

UNIT A

All service, maintenance and technical employees employed by the Respondent at its East Liverpool, Ohio medical center including all licensed practical nurses, nurses' aides, other aides, dietary and kitchen employees, maintenance employees, housekeeping employees, X-ray and operating room technicians, ward secretaries, medical records' clerks and bookkeepers, but excluding all business office clerical employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

UNIT B

All registered nurses employed by the Respondent at its East Liverpool, Ohio medical center excluding all other professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate bargaining units with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if agreements are reached, embody such understandings in writing.

(b) On request, furnish the Union information that is relevant and necessary to its role as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate bargaining units.

(c) Post at its premises in East Liverpool, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that except insofar as violations have been found above, the complaint is dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain, on request, in good faith with Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL–CIO CLC, as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of the employees in the following appropriate units, and WE WILL NOT withdraw recognition without lawful cause or fail and refuse to meet with the Union at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness for purposes of collective bargaining. The appropriate bargaining units are:

UNIT A

All service, maintenance and technical employees employed by us at our East Liverpool, Ohio medical center including all licensed practical nurses, nurses' aides, other aides, dietary and kitchen employees, maintenance employees, housekeeping employees, X-ray and operating room technicians, ward secretaries, medical records' clerks and bookkeepers, but excluding all business office clerical employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

UNIT B

All registered nurses employed by us at our East Liverpool, Ohio medical center excluding all other professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried at Steubenville, Ohio, on February 22 and 23, 1983, pursuant to a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Brotherhood), on May 24, 1982, and a second amended complaint issued February 3, 1983, and again amended at hearing.

The complaint alleges that Potters' Medical Center, Inc. (Respondent) has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by (a) refusing to furnish the Brotherhood and its successor, Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union), with information necessary to their performance as collective-bargaining agents; (b) failing and refusing to meet at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness for purposes of collective bargaining; and (c) withdrawing recognition from the Union as representative of certain of Respondent's employees.

Respondent admits some complaint allegations but denies the commission of the unfair labor practices alleged. In its answer to the second amended complaint Respondent asserts as affirmative defenses that (1) certain allegations are time-barred, (2) neither Potters nor the Union represented a majority of the employees in one of the two bargaining units involved in this case, (3) there is a bona fide question of representation in the other unit, and (4) the Brotherhood ceased to exist by virtue of its merger into another labor organization that does not represent a majority of Respondent's employees in either unit.

On the entire record,[1] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified before me, and after considering the oral argument and able posttrial briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings establish that Respondent is a corporation providing medical services, meets both statutory and Board jurisdictional requirements, and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Respondent concedes and I find that the Brotherhood was a labor organization within the meaning of the Act until it merged into the Union on July 28, 1982. I further find that the Union has existed since July 28, 1982, as a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. BARGAINING STATUS AND PREVIOUS LITIGATION

The Brotherhood was certified on June 15, 1979, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the following appropriate bargaining units:

> All service, maintenance and technical employees employed by the Respondent at its East Liverpool, Ohio medical center including all licensed practical nurses, nurses' aides, other aides, dietary and kitchen employees, maintenance employees, housekeeping employees, X-ray and operating room technicians, ward secretaries, medical records' clerks and bookkeepers, but excluding all business office clerical employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.
> All registered nurses employed by the Respondent at its East Liverpool, Ohio medical center excluding all other professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees.

Thereafter, the parties commenced bargaining. After several negotiation sessions between August 1979 and May 1980 the Brotherhood filed charges[2] in August 1980 that resulted in a complaint and trial before Administrative Law Judge Ries on allegations that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Judge Ries issued his decision on December 10, 1981,[3] finding Respondent had violated those sections of the Act by failing to furnish relevant information to the Brotherhood, and by unilaterally altering wage rates and modifying its pay classification system. His order required Respondent to cease and desist from this conduct and bargain in good faith with the Brotherhood as the representative of both units. No exceptions were filed to Judge Ries' decision and it was, on January 19, 1982, adopted by the Board. On January 31, 1983, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit issued its order[4] enforcing the Board's Order.

The events on which the allegations before me are premised took place after the issuance of Judge Ries' decision and before the court order, and it is to those events we now turn.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

On December 28, 1981, Joseph Galvin Jr., a vice president of the Brotherhood, wrote to Respondent's attorney, Robert Weaver, advising that in accordance with "the NLRB's decision"[5] he was requesting the name, address, and current hourly wage of each employee in units A and B, together with a sick leave, funeral leave, meals, "etc.," and a list of employees being paid "merit increase, on-call pay, etc." Galvin advised he would be prepared to bargain on receipt of the requested information, would appreciate Weaver giving his dates of availability for bargaining, and would try to make himself available on dates convenient to Weaver.

Weaver replied, by letter of January 4, 1982, that the requested information was being compiled and Respondent would refrain from unilateral changes in wages and other terms and conditions of employment, but Respondent adhered to its position that bargaining would be futile so long as the Brotherhood insisted on a union-security clause.

Judge Ries found, and the parties agree, that they were at impasse over the issue of union security. The parties agree, and I find, that the impasse over the Brotherhood's insistence on a union-security clause continued until it was broken by Galvin's March 22, 1982 letter, which will be discussed in due course.

On January 14, 1982, Weaver wrote to Galvin, "Enclosed is the information which has been compiled in response to your request. Please contact me if you have any questions." Galvin received this letter on January 18, 1982, but he and Weaver dispute the contents of the enclosures accompanying the letter.

Weaver testified that the letter he dispatched was accompanied by (1) a seven-page list of unit employees with their home addresses, rates of pay, and information on call pay and salary increases, and (2) a nine-page extract from Respondent's personnel manual setting forth the fringe benefits, including those specifically requested by Galvin, afforded Respondent's employees.

Galvin asserts that, although he received the cover letter and item (1), he did not receive item (2). Galvin never told Respondent that he had not received information satisfying his December 18, 1981 request.

In his next communication with Respondent, a letter to Weaver dated March 22, 1982, Galvin withdrew the Brotherhood's request for a union-security clause, and asked for several dates when Weaver would be availab for bargaining sessions, but made no reference to the information he had requested or received.

The following day, March 23, 1982, Galvin sent letter to Respondent's employees setting forth a brie chronological resume of his version of the history o Respondent/Brotherhood relationships. After relatin the substance of Judge Ries' decision, he continued a follows:

> The Center had the right to appeal the tria judge's decision, but they did not. Again, I requested certain information they had been instructed to provide and at the same time, I requested meeting dates to begin negotiations. They did send me the information I requested.[6]

On March 26, 1982, Weaver wrote acknowledging receipt of Galvin's March 22 letter and stated that he would confer with Woody Miller, Respondent's administrator, regarding negotiation dates, but his (Weaver's) schedule made it unlikely that any meetings in April would be possible. Weaver credibly testified that he had made a prior commitment to deliver a sailboat from Nassau to Fort Myers, Florida, during the first week of April, and had planned his vacation for the third week of April.

According to Galvin, Weaver called him on April 19 and asked if he was available to meet on May 10 regarding unit A. Galvin said he was. Weaver said the May 10 date was not definite because he had to clear it with Miller, but asked Galvin to send the Brotherhood's proposals prior to May 10. Galvin said he would.

Weaver testified that he was in Hilton Head, South Carolina, on April 19 and did not call Galvin on that date, but did have a telephone conversation with Galvin before April 19. He avers that the conversation concerned a convenient date to meet in May, in connection with which he stated a preference not to meet prior to May 10, a week after he would return from Hilton Head. Weaver testified that his reason for this preference was his expectation that there would be work for him stacked up during his absence on vacation that he would like to attend to. There is no evidence he communicated this reason to Galvin. In any case, I am persuaded that he and Galvin were testifying about the same conversation. From the more detailed and credible testimony of Galvin on the matter of the date, I conclude that although Weaver inquired about his availability on May 10, it was not a definite agreed-on date. Galvin could not reasonably have believed it was in view of Weaver's statement that he would have to clear it with Miller, whom Judge Ries found to have authority superior to that of Weaver with respect to negotiations. I am inclined to the belief that Galvin's testimony with respect to Weaver's request for proposals refers to a conversation of May 3 rather than the one in April.

Galvin and Weaver spoke on the phone on May 3, 1982.[7] Galvin asked Weaver if they were going to meet on May 10. Weaver told him that meeting was off because Miller had conflicts. Weaver also requested Galvin send him the Brotherhood's proposal to study before a specific meeting date be agreed on.

[5] Galvin was obviously referring to Judge Ries' decision.

[7] The recitation of the relevant portions of this conversation is a composite of the credible testimony of the two participants.

With a letter to Weaver of May 12, 1982, Galvin enclosed contract proposals "per our telephone conversation of May 3, 1982," again requested Weaver to advise when negotiations could begin, and complained that bargaining had been delayed too long. The text of this letter also states "a slight question has arisen regarding the new tuition reimbursement Woody sent me."[8] The information Galvin contends he did not receive with Weaver's January 14 letter contains an entire page devoted to tuition reimbursement.

Weaver replied to Galvin's letter on May 18, 1982. After acknowledging receipt of the Brotherhood's proposals, Weaver stated:

> Because of matters unrelated to the relationship between your union and Potters Medical Center, Inc., it is impossible at this time to propose any firm dates for negotiations. We will be in touch with you when these other matters have been resolved.

Weaver explains that the "matters unrelated" in his letter refers to Miller's advice that he might shortly be leaving Respondent's employment and did not want to schedule negotiation meetings until it was resolved whether he would be representing Respondent in negotiations.

The reasons for Miller's expressed position are explained by the testimony of Dr. Samuelson, president of Respondent, that Respondent contacted a firm specializing in administration, Good Samaritan, in early 1982 to take over the administrative duties of the hospital. Woody Miller resigned as a result of this change, and his duties were taken over the beginning of June 1982 by Keith Minton, an employee of Good Samaritan. Minton left in August 1982. Dr. Samuelson now serves as the chief executive officer to whom department heads report.

Nadena Martinovich, an employee in Unit A, filed a decertification petition with the Board's Regional Office in Case 8-RD-1093 on May 24, 1982. The Brotherhood filed the charge in the instant case on the same day.

Weaver notified Galvin on June 1, 1982, that Minton had assumed Miller's duties, and was reviewing wages, fringe benefits, and personnel policies, after which Respondent would be able to meet. Weaver continued that negotiations would be meaningless until Minton's familiarization with existing conditions was completed in 2 or 3 weeks.

Weaver followed this with another letter to Galvin on June 4 informing that the review would be completed the following week, and requesting that Galvin call to schedule a meeting subsequent to June 13 on the nurses unit, Unit B. Weaver added that Respondent was prohibited by law from negotiating on Unit A[9] while a question concerning representation existed.

On June 8, Betty Woodward, Respondent's associate administrator, found a document on her desk reading as follows:

> We, the undersigned do not want NOW or in the furure [sic], the Local IBAPW to represent us in any form of collective bargaining with the Management of Potters Medical Center.

This statement[10] was signed by 12 of the 13 registered nurses then employed by Respondent. Woodward forwarded it to Weaver immediately. Weaver dispatched a letter to Galvin the same day, stating Respondent could no longer recognize the Brotherhood as the collective-bargaining representative of Unit B[11] because it no longer represented a majority of unit employees. This letter was received by Galvin's office on June 9.

On June 9, Galvin, who had not seen Weaver's June 8 letter, called Weaver in response to his June 4 letter, and told him he was available on June 15 and thereafter to bargain for the nurses. Weaver told him of the nurses' "petition," advised he had sent a letter on it, and said he believed it would be illegal to meet and he would not meet. Galvin has had no further conversations with any of Respondent's representatives, nor have there been any negotiation meetings.

On July 12, 1982, Galvin sent a letter to Weaver requesting an up-to-date list of employee names, addresses, dates of hire, wages, and job titles, plus any changes in fringe benefits "since the last information sent to me." Weaver replied by letter of July 15 that the information would be shortly supplied. Galvin has received no further response to his July 12 letter.

On the day of Weaver's reply, the Board's Regional Director dismissed the decertification petition in Case 8-RD-1093.

On January 19, 1983, Galvin again wrote requesting dates for bargaining sessions in both units.

Weaver responded by letter of January 29 declining to propose any dates for bargaining because of the existing litigation on the question of the existing bargaining obligation.

If the foregoing were all the relevant facts, the resolution of the matters before me would be relatively simple. There is, however, more. On July 28, 1982, the Brotherhood and the Glass Bottle Blowers Association of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO merged to form the Union. This merger was approved by the AFL-CIO on August 5, 1982. Members of the Brotherhood were informed of the impending merger via notice to all of its affiliated local unions and publication in the Potters Herald, a union newspaper published and dispatched to each of its members by the Brotherhood, in March 1982. The notice was republished in the June 1982 issue of the Potters Herald. The delegates to the special convention called to vote on the merger were selected by each local union in numbers proportionate to the size of their membership. The method of their selection, whether by ballot or appointment, is not in the record. At the Brotherhood's convention the delegates voted 159 to 17 in favor of merger, whereupon a memorandum of agreement was signed by officers of both merging unions.

[9] The parties agree that "Unit B" in the letter is a typographical error, and should be "Unit A."

[10] The General Counsel argues that this document was only admitted into evidence as something sent by Woodward to Weaver, and not for the truth of its contents. It is true that the General Counsel only stipulated the document was sent, and refused to stipulate the authenticity of the signatures. It is also true that when I received it I gave Respondent permission to introduce further evidence in support of it. Respondent did so. The signatures were authenticated by Woodward, based on her familiarity with the signatures that she acquired through observation thereof commencing long before the litigation at hand. See Fed.R.Evid. 901(b)(2).

[11] The parties agree that "Unit A" in the letter is a typographical error and should be "Unit B."

At the time of the merger there were about 10,700 dues-paying members of the Brotherhood and about 67,000 dues-paying members of the Glass Bottle Blowers. The 85 Brotherhood local unions and 241 Glass Bottle Blowers locals, although now locals of the Union, continued operating in the same manner as separate locals with the same officers they had before the merger. The Union assumed all assets and liabilities of the merged unions. The Glass Bottle Blowers International president, secretary-treasurer, 3 vice presidents, and 11 executive board members continued in the same positions in the newly formed union. The remainder of the Union's officials were an International vice president, an assistant to the president, an international auditor, and three executive board members, all of whom were previously officials of the Brotherhood. The new union, Glass, Pottery, Plastics and Allied Workers International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC, is registered with the United States Department of Labor and negotiates collective-bargaining agreements, handles grievances, and otherwise represents employees. None of the employers with whom the Brotherhood has contracts have objected to the merger.

Galvin advised the Board and Respondent of the merger by letter of October 18, 1982.

According to Galvin, employees do not become members or part of a local union until a contract with their employer is reached and, therefore, Respondent's employees did not receive the Potters Herald and were not permitted to select delegates to the merger convention because they were not members of a Brotherhood local. Galvin told Respondent's employees of the upcoming merger convention at a May 3, 1982 meeting, but these employees were never polled regarding their desires with respect to a merger, nor has Galvin met with the employees or notified them of the merger since May 3, 1982. There is no evidence these employees have designated the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

B. Conclusions

1. The limitations issue

The charge filed in this case on May 24, 1982, alleges violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act in the following words:

> Potters Medical Center, Inc. continues to refuse to bargain and has not complied with the Administrative Law Judges decision of December 10, 1981, ordering the center to meet and bargain.

The initial complaint issued August 27, 1982, alleging Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing, since on or about January 19, 1982, to furnish the Brotherhood with information on fringe benefits, and by failing and refusing to meet at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness for purposes of collective bargaining.

An amended complaint issued December 22, 1982, repeating the allegations of the previous complaint, but adding allegations that the Brotherhood and Glass Bottle Blowers had merged with the result that the Union was now the successor of the Brotherhood and the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in Units A & B.

The second amended complaint issued February 3, 1983, repeating the allegations of the amended complaint and adding allegations that Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in Unit B on or about June 4, 1982, and in Unit A on or about June 8, 1982.[12] The General Counsel further amended the complaint at trial to add an allegation that Respondent since on or about July 15, 1982, failed and refused to furnish information requested by the Brotherhood and its successor on or about July 12, 1982, with respect to unit employees' names, addresses, dates of hire, wages, job titles and description, and any changes in fringe benefits.

Respondent contends the allegations in the second amended complaint of unlawful withdrawal of recognition and the allegation added at hearing are time-barred because "An amended violation occurring after the original charge is filed and more than six (6) months prior to the time it is first introduced into the case by way of amendment to the Complaint is barred under Section 10(b).[13] NLRB v. Newton, 214 F.2d 472 (5th Cir. 1954)."

NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301 (1959), is dispositive of the issue. In Fant, the Union filed a charge on May 20, 1954, alleging the respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to bargain collectively with the union. After first refusing to issue a complaint, the General Counsel reconsidered and issued an 8(a)(5) complaint on January 29, 1955, alleging, inter alia, that respondent had unilaterally increased wages "on or about October 7, 1954." The Court held that the allegation was proper even though it concerned an event after the charge was filed, reasoning the unilateral wage increase was of the same class of violations set up in the charge, and specifically adhering to its views expressed in National Licorice Co. v. NLRB, 309 U.S. 350 (1940), as follows:

> [W]e can find no warrant in the language or purposes of the Act for saying that it precludes the Board from dealing adequately with unfair labor practices which are related to those alleged in the charge and which grow out of them while the proceeding is pending before the Board . . . . The

[12] The reversal of dates in the complaint reflects the typographical errors in Weaver's letters and is immaterial.

[13] Sec. 10(b) of the Act provides, inter alia, that "no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge . . . .

> Board's jurisdiction having been involved to deal with the first steps, it had authority to deal with those which followed as a consequence of those already taken.

For Board authority to the same effect see Sequoyah Spinning Mills, 194 NLRB 1175, 1193 (1972); and Firch Baking Co., 199 NLRB 414 (1972).

Both the withdrawal of recognition and the July 12, 1982 refusal-to-furnish information allegations are species of the genus refusal to bargain, are clearly related to the charge, and are therefore properly alleged in the complaint and not time-barred.

2. The failure to furnish information

The evidence requires a finding that Respondent did send Galvin the information he requested on December 28, 1981, and Galvin received it. Galvin made no protest to Respondent that he had not received what he had asked for, and the statement in his letter to employees of March 23, 1982, that he had received the information he requested plainly relates to events after Judge Ries' decision issued, not to material received in 1980 as he claims. Moreover, his letter to Weaver of May 12 regarding a question on the tuition reimbursement he had been sent, and his letter of July 12 requesting an update on unit personnel and change in fringe benefits "since the last information sent to me" refers, I find, to information he received in response to his December 28 request. Accordingly, the complaint allegation that Respondent failed and refused to furnish the information requested on December 28 is without merit and must be dismissed.

The later failure of Respondent to furnish the information requested by Galvin on July 12, 1982, is an unfair labor practice. The information is relevant and necessary to a labor organization's function as collective-bargaining representative,[14] and a failure to honor a request therefor violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Respondent was not privileged to withhold it. Even assuming arguendo that the decertification petition filed in Unit A raised a question concerning representation that question dissolved with the withdrawal of the petition on July 15, 1982, and the question of a merger defense never arose, at the earliest, until July 28 when the merger was agreed on. Respondent had ample time to furnish the information on Unit A before July 28 even if the nurses' petition in Unit B provided good cause to suspend bargaining in Unit B.

3. The failure to meet and bargain and the withdrawal of recognition

After the impasse was broken by the Brotherhood's March 22, 1982 withdrawal of its union-security proposals, Respondent was obligated to meet and bargain as the Brotherhood requested. The complaint alleges that since March 22, 1982, Respondent failed and refused to meet and bargain at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness with the Brotherhood and its successor, and further alleges that Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition of the Union as collective-bargaining representative on June 4, 1982. The General Counsel takes the position that Respondent was unreasonably tardy in meeting its obligation and has no acceptable excuse. Respondent argues that any delays in scheduling meetings were reasonable and not designated to frustrate the Union's bargaining efforts.

Respondent also points to the fact that the Brotherhood delayed negotiations from December 4, 1979, to March 17, 1980, because one of its employee members of the bargaining committee was ill. It is true that the earlier negotiations commenced 2 months after the Board's certification and meetings thereafter were at intervals of 28 days, 21 days, 55 days, 103 days (the period during which the employee was hospitalized), 28 days, and 35 days. This past history does not, however, provide a precedent on which Respondent may rely for justification of its failure to provide any date or range of dates for bargaining after March 22, 1982, in the face of repeated requests by the Brotherhood for such dates. One important difference between the two periods is that there were meetings in 1979 and 1980, presumably on dates agreed on by the parties, where here Galvin kept requesting, and Respondent kept avoiding giving, a specific date or a range of dates. Nor was any meeting in fact scheduled pursuant to Galvin's requests. That Galvin never proposed a specific date to Weaver is of no moment. Respondent plainly knew the Brotherhood was eager to meet and requesting to meet and bargain as soon as possible.

Respondent's failure to furnish a date or range of dates in response to Galvin's repeated requests on and after March 22, 1982, effectively halted any negotiations. Galvin made reasonable efforts to expedite negotiations. That Galvin did not continuously protest the delay, and elected instead to persevere in trying to extract some meeting dates provides no excuse for Respondent's conduct.[15] Similarly, the prearranged schedule of Weaver in April and the conflicts and uncertain position of Miller in May do not excuse the failure to provide possible meeting dates. The Respondent was the party to negotiations with the Brotherhood. Weaver and Miller were but its agents. Respondent, not its agents, had the obligation to bargain and an obligation to furnish bargaining representatives who would devote their time to prompt and continuous negotiations.[16] It is settled that a busy schedule provides no excuse for failing to meet and confer at reasonable intervals.[17] Weaver testified that he made arrangements with another lawyer in his firm to meet with the Brotherhood if Respondent received an explicit demand to meet in April. There is no showing that he advised Galvin of the other lawyer's availability. The very fact that Weaver could readily secure another to meet in his stead erodes any argument that his presence was essential or that his prearranged schedule prevented April meetings. With respect to Miller, he was not the party to negotiations, merely its agent. To conclude that

Miller's quandary, not communicated to the Brotherhood, required a delay in meeting would require a preliminary premise that once Respondent selected Miller as agent his personal dilemmas controlled when meetings could be held. Weaver was every bit as familiar with the negotiations as Miller was, and might well have carried on negotiations without Miller. Necessary consultations with his principal by Weaver could easily have been arranged by telephone or between negotiation meetings. Moreover, if Respondent elected not to permit Weaver to meet alone it could have exercised its prerogative to replace Miller with another agent. Respondent certainly must have known of Miller's indecision on whether he would remain, and could have met its obligation by appointing someone else to supplant him during the meetings as an advisor to Weaver or Weaver's stand-in.[18]

The General Counsel has established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent has, since March 22, 1982, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to meet at reasonable times and reasonable promptness with the Brotherhood[19] for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Respondent contends that its refusal to meet with regard to Unit A on June 4, 1982, was lawful because a decertification petition had been filed. Respondent relies on Telautograph[20] and argues that even though the principle relied on was subsequently overruled in Dresser Industries[21] on September 30, 1982, the Board in Dresser declined to find a violation of the Act where the employer's conduct was in accord with the existing precedent expounded in Telautograph, and the same result should accrue here.

The Board in Telautograph held that the timely filing of a decertification petition raises a real question concerning representation preventing an employer from bargaining with an incumbent union, but further held that this rule did not apply "in situations where, because of contract bar, certification year, inadequate showing of interest, or any other established reason,[22] the decertification petition does not raise a real representation question." The Board adopted the Trial Examiner's decision that noted that Telautograph was distinguishable from Massey-Ferguson[23] in which the Board held any loss of majority by the Union would have been attributable to the employer's prior unilateral, and unlawful, wage increases. The Respondent herein has been previously found by Judge Ries, the Board, and the Court to have failed to furnish the Brotherhood with relevant information and unilaterally altered wages and modified its pay classification system, all in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. As a result, Respondent was ordered to cease and desist from such conduct and bargain in good faith with the Brotherhood. Respondent has not bargained with the Brotherhood as the Board Order requires. Additionally, I have found that Respondent has unlawfully failed to meet and bargain with the Brotherhood prior to the filing of the petition.

I am persuaded that the Board's comments in Telautograph did not purport to overrule longstanding precedent that the mere filing of a decertification petition does not suffice to warrant a refusal to bargain where there are prior unremedied unfair labor practices, and I am further convinced that the Board's reference to "any other established reasons" in Telautograph was intended to encompass the situation where unremedied unfair labor practices do exist. This reference and the adopted trial examiner's decision, should have put Respondent on notice that its legal position was probably untenable. Moreover, the Board in Lammert Industries,[24] issued 5 years before Respondent declined to bargain in Unit A, explicitly stated its "longstanding disavowal of the dictum in Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), that the filing of a decertification petition suspends an Employer's bargaining obligation." Lammert had committed numerous other unremedied unfair practices. Respondent thus had additional notice via Lammert that its legal position would not likely stand close scrutiny, and it certainly was well aware that Telautograph involved no unfair labor practices, remedied or unremedied. It was also well aware that the Brotherhood had filed new charges alleging Respondent was continuing to refuse to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

On the foregoing, I conclude and find that Respondent's refusal to bargain with the Brotherhood, which amounted to a withdrawal of recognition, with respect to Unit A violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Respondent's refusal to meet and bargain collectively with the Brotherhood, commencing on March 22, 1982, either standing alone or viewed as a continuation of the earlier unfair labor practices found by the Board, is sufficiently serious to taint the nurses' petition of June 8, 1982, which would have permitted the Respondent to suspend bargaining in Unit B absent the unremedied unfair labor practices, and Respondent is therefore precluded from relying on it as a basis for its June 8, 1982, refusal to bargain with respect to employees in Unit B. Accordingly, the June 8, 1982 refusal to bargain violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[25]

4. The merger and Respondent's bargaining obligation

The General Counsel contends that the merger between International unions was proper, did not significantly alter the access of Respondent's employees to their union, and did not require that Respondent's nonmember employees be permitted to vote because they were not members because of Respondent's intransigence.

Respondent argues that the Brotherhood failed to adhere to minimum standards of due process in ascertaining whether Respondent's employees desired the merger, citing State Bank of India, 262 NLRB 1108 (1982), and therefore Respondent has no obligation to bargain with the new and different organization.

The merger procedures followed by the unions in this case generally comport with those approved by the Board in Texas Plastics, 263 NLRB 394 (1982); Knapp-Sherrill Co., 263 NLRB 396 (1982); Warehouse Groceries Management, 254 NLRB 252 (1981); and Wellman Industries, 248 NLRB 325 (1980), in finding that the International union resulting from the merger of two International unions succeeded to the representation rights of the merged union, but the local union involved in Texas Plastics and Knapp-Sherrill was given the opportunity to send delegates to the merger convention, and the unit members in Wellman were given the opportunity to vote and ratified the merger. Warehouse Groceries does not indicate whether nonmembers were given an opportunity to express their desires regarding the merger.

The Board has held that in affiliation cases all bargaining unit employees must be allowed to vote in any election held on any change in affiliation of the bargaining representative. Seattle-First National Bank, 265 NLRB 426 (1982); Amoco Production Co., 262 NLRB 1240 (1982). Whether their votes are determinative of the issue is immaterial. That this principle also applies to merger cases is indicated by the Board's application of the requirements of Amoco to a merger in Laborers Local 652, 266 NLRB 219 fn. 1 (1983). State Bank of India issued 2 days before Amoco and focused on "minimal standards of due process in ascertaining whether the employees it represented desired to merge . . . ." The Board has long held that union mergers, "without more, do not operate to alter the representative character of the bargaining agent,"[26] but it has also consistently required that such changes be affected by procedures protecting the right of employees to freely select their own representatives. See, for example, State Bank of India, supra; Fluhrer Bakeries, 232 NLRB 212 (1977); Rinker Materials Co., 162 NLRB 1688, 1689 (1967). The Board, in short, has consistently required the minimal due process referred to in State Bank of India, supra.

The General Counsel's argument that Respondent's intransigence prevented the employees from becoming members and, therefore, removed any necessity that Respondent's employees be permitted to vote is based on Wellman Industries, 248 NLRB 325 (1980). Wellman involved repeated violations of Section 8(a)(5) over a several year period, including discharges, surface bargaining, unilateral layoffs, transfers, and pay reductions, together with repeated frivolous defenses and a flagrant disregard of previous Board and court orders, including a denial of certiorari by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Board viewed the employer's conduct to be so serious as to require the employer to reimburse the charging party union for litigation and negotiation expenses. In this context, the Board held that the employees' lack of premerger opportunity to express their view on the merger because they were not a chartered local union, and not because there was no collective-bargaining agreement covering them, resulted from the employer's prolonged refusal to bargain in good faith and furnished no defense to the refusal to bargain.

In neither the prior case nor the case before me has Respondent engaged in conduct as flagrant as that found in Wellman. Respondent has advanced no patently frivolous defenses, and has in fact prevailed on some issues in both cases. It cannot fairly be said on the evidence before me, including the fact that the impasse occasioned by the Brotherhood's insistence on a union-security clause did not end until March 22, 1982, that the failure to reach a contract was entirely caused by Respondent's unfair labor practices. Judge Ries, and therefore the Board and the Court that adopted his decision, specifically noted that an extension of the certification year was not appropriate "since I have not concluded that Respondent committed any unfair labor practices which appreciably delayed the bargaining."[27] The circumstances of the instant case do not remotely resemble those in Wellman, and the General Counsel's contention that the Respondent's conduct prevented its employees from having a voice in the merger is rejected.

The issue before me is not whether unit employees had an opportunity to vote on a change of representation as it was in Seattle-First National Bank, supra, and Amoco, supra. There was no vote in this case. There was, however, a selection of delegates to convey the desires of local union members to the merger convention. Respondent's employees were not polled on the question, were denied the right to select delegates, and therefore were denied the right to express their views on the merger. The thrust of Amoco is not in my opinion limited to its express holding that due process requires that in an affiliation election all unit members must be permitted to participate and vote. The underlying principle on which the Amoco holding is grounded is found in the dissent of Members Jenkins and Zagoria in North Electric Co.[28] This dissent was specifically adopted by the Board in Amoco, and states, in pertinent part:

> It appears basic to the collective-bargaining process that the selection of a bargaining representative be made by the employees in the bargaining unit. In our view, therefore, a cardinal prerequisite to any change in designation of the bargaining representative is that all employees in the bargaining unit be afforded the opportunity to participate in such selection.

Respondent's employees had designated the Brotherhood as their collective-bargaining representative. The merger effected a change in the designation of that representative. The employees in Units A and B were not "afforded the opportunity to participate in such selection," and were therefore not afforded the due process to which they were entitled. I do not think it matters at all whether an affiliation or a merger is being dealt with. The principle remains the same. Accordingly, I am persuaded that the merger was improper to the extent it relates to Respondent's employees,[29] the successorship issue regarding representation rights for these employees is moot[30], and Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain with the Union on or after July 28, 1982.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and the Brotherhood was a labor organization within the meaning of the Act until July 28, 1982.

2. By, from on or about March 22, 1982, to July 28, 1982, failing and refusing to meet at reasonable times and with reasonable promptness with the Brotherhood for purposes of collective bargaining; and by withdrawing recognition from the Brotherhood as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in Units A and B on June 4 and June 8, 1982, respectively; and by failing to furnish relevant information to the Brotherhood on and after July 12, 1982, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

4. Other than as above found, Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

THE REMEDY

A deviation from the normal remedies is required by the evidence and the complaint allegation by the General Counsel that the Brotherhood was dissolved by reason of the July 28, 1982 merger. Respondent has no bargaining obligation with the Union, and an order to bargain with the Brotherhood would be a futile act. I am of the opinion, however, that the unfair labor practices occurring before the merger require a remedy. My remedy will, therefore, require Respondent to cease and desist from its unlawful conduct and to bargain on request with any labor organization hereafter duly designated by a majority of its employees in appropriate Units A and/or B as their exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 17, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp., Fort Worth, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent contends in its exceptions that the effective date and duration of the agreement were open issues on August 28, 1985, and, accordingly, that there was no meeting of the minds between the parties on a complete agreement. Union Representative Beauchamp's credited testimony, however, indicates that he began the August 28 meeting by reviewing with the Respondent's representative, Hatley, the Company's outstanding proposals, including the comprehensive initial proposal containing the Company's position on the effective dates of the agreement. Hatley did not claim then or at any time during the August 28 meeting that the initial proposal on the effective dates had been withdrawn or modified. Moreover, Union Representative Bryant's September 6, 1985 letter informing Hatley of the agreement's ratification by the union members cited the effective dates as August 18, 1984, through August 17, 1987. In his response, Hatley did not object to these dates. We also note that Hatley's testimony concerning open issues was discredited by the judge. Therefore, we agree with the judge's finding that the Company's initial proposal regarding the effective date and duration of the contract was on the table and subject to acceptance by the Union on August 28, 1985.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 6 and 7 May 1986 in Ft. Worth, Texas, based on a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, Local 96, AFL-CIO (the Union) on 18 September 1985 and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 16 of the National Labor Relations Board on 7 January 1986.[1] The complaint alleged that W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to execute a written collective-bargaining contract embodying agreements previously reached in negotiating sessions. Respondent's timely answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were submitted by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Charging Party. All briefs were duly considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, and on substantive, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp. is a Delaware corporation engaged in the forging of commercial and military products in Ft. Worth, Texas. Jurisdiction is not in issue. W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp., in the past 12 months, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Ft. Worth, Texas facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Texas. I conclude and find that W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp. is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

Respondent and the Union have been parties to collective-bargaining agreements in excess of 30 years. The latest collective-bargaining contract was extant from 18 August 1981 through 17 August 1984. Current negotiations began 28 June 1984. On 28 September 1984 the Union struck Respondent, remaining on strike until 26 April 1985. Of the 20 scheduled negotiating sessions between the parties, the last 2 occurred 10 May and 28 August 1985. A decertification petition was filed 16 September 1985 (16–RD–1088).

Respondent's bargaining committee was composed of Harold Hatley, vice president in charge of personnel and industrial relations. Lee Chambers, vice president of finance, and Karl Arceneaux, vice president of manufacturing and engineering.

The Union's bargaining committee included several rank-and-file employees and, during the 14 months of negotiations, was chaired by Union Representative Lester Boykin for the initial meetings, Union Representative Buddy Bryant for the remainder of the meetings, excepting the last two and union representative, Leonard Beauchamp, for the last two meetings.[2]

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Bubby M. Bryant testified that he is business manager and financial secretary of the Boilermakers Lodge No. 96 in Ft. Worth, Texas.

When the Company and the Union sat down to begin negotiations, Lester Boykin, an International representative of the Union, was the spokesman for the Union. He assumed the responsibility as spokesman for two or three of the meetings. At all subsequent meetings Buddy Bryant was spokesman for the Union until Leonard Beauchamp became the representative and spokesman for the Union at the 10 May and 28 August meeting. During negotiations, there was no agreement between the parties for any procedure of adoption of tentative agreements or withdrawal of proposals. The procedure was left to the individual parties.

Bryant recalled in the early negotiating sessions and specifically the meeting of 31 July 1984, the meeting at which the Union received the Company's lengthy proposal, that the Company's position on termination was that they needed a 3-year contract. Bryant said that there was quite a discussion on that proposal. On 21 September 1984 the Company submitted an additional written proposal on safety and health.

No additional written proposals were exchanged between the parties until the 10 May meeting. At the meeting of 7 November 1984, Hatley made an oral proposal for a 3-year agreement, which included the Boilermakers pension plan with a 50-cent contribution per hour. The 13th meeting between the parties was held on 7 November. Bryant has no recall that the term of the agreement was to be anything other than 17 August 1984 through August 1987.

The 10 May meeting began with Beauchamp asking Hatley what the company proposals were. Hatley referred to General Counsel's Exhibits 4, 5, 9, and 10.

Bryant recalled that the 28 August meeting was opened by Beauchamp displaying the company proposals in front of Hatley and asking Hatley if there were any other proposals or anything else that we have to negotiate in regards to. Hatley responded that what was on the table was what had to be negotiated between the parties. Bryant stated that during the course of the negotiating sessions the union proposals were withdrawn piece by piece and the only portion of the union proposal that was viable on 28 August was that concerning the pension. The Union was still making an effort to have a pension included in the contract. A seniority list, roster, and wage rates as of 28 August 1985, had been requested by the Union during the 28 August negotiating session at the end of the meeting.

Bryant conducted the ratification vote on 5 September 1985. He took the agreements to the membership for ratification. The contract that was presented to the membership were the proposals on the table as of the 28 August meeting. It was put to the membership without a pension. The membership accepted the contract proposals as presented and without a pension.

On 6 September 1985 Bryant telephoned the Company and spoke to Lee Chambers at approximately 10:30 a.m. He told Chambers that members of Local 96 had accepted the contract as it was presented to them. Chambers only response was, "Okay." After talking with Chambers, he called for Hatley but had to leave word for him to return the call. At approximately 3 p.m. Bryant called Hatley again. He told Hatley that members of Local 96 had accepted the contract and that the Union and the Company had an agreement and he would like to set up a time when they could get together, finalize the contract, and put it in booklet form. Hatley asked Bryant about the pension information he had requested and Bryant told him that the information would be available within a week. Hatley did not question the existence of a contract. Bryant that same day confirmed the telephone conversation by registered letter. Approximately a week later Bryant called Hatley on 13 September. Hatley was not in and Bryant left word for him to return the call. Bryant did call Lee Chambers that same day and asked Chambers about an updated seniority list, classifications, and the wages that had been requested in the last meeting on 28 August. Chambers replied that he had made up the list and sent it to Hatley for his review and that he would contact Hatley and get it to Bryant as quickly as possible. Having not heard from Hatley, Bryant placed a call to him again on 18 September but Hatley was not available. The following morning he received a call from Hatley. Bryant told Hatley he was still working on the pension information and would get it to him as soon as he could get it. Bryant asked Hatley about the seniority list and the things he had spoken to Chambers about and Hatley responded he would get them to him. Hatley said he needed the pension information before he could do anything and Bryant told Hatley that they had an agreement whether he got the information on the pension or not and that the Union wanted to get the contract put into a booklet form so they could get it put to bed. During the telephone call Hatley informed Bryant that a decertification petition had been filed. Hatley also told Bryant that he had sent the Union a letter. After the telephone conversation Bryant sent a registered letter to Hatley. Later Bryant received Hatley's 16 September letter that was postmarked 17 September.

Bryant testified that between 6 and 19 September Hatley had not stated that there was not an agreement between the Company and the Union. His first indication that the Company thought that no agreement existed between the Company and the Union was during the telephone conversation on 19 September. In that conversation Hatley stated that he had to have the pertinent information about the pension before he could agree that the Union and the Company had an agreement.

Bryant identified the written marks on General Counsel's Exhibit 3. The notation deleting the additional paid holiday on 7-31-84 is in his handwriting. Page 5, "per expired agreement," means to leave the proposal as it is in the expired agreement. The Union's original proposal for duration of the agreement was 18 August 1984 to 17 August 1985. There is no notation that it was ever dropped. The undated notations at the top of page 2 refer to the fact that the Company's proposal, page 42, will be accepted as the health and safety provision. The notation on schedule A indicates that at the second meeting the Union reduced their wage proposal from 12 to 8 percent.

Leonard G. Beauchamp testified that he is a staff representative for the International and is in charge of research dealing with collective bargaining, arbitration, pension, and health insurance matters. Beauchamp became spokesman for the Union in the bargaining session of 10 May 1985. Hatley was a spokesman for the Company at that meeting. The meeting was scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. and actually started about 10:15 a.m. Beauchamp opened the meeting by asking Hatley what proposals were on the table at this point in time. Hatley stated that the Company's proposals were contained in the original proposal presented at the second meeting of 31 July 1984 and the Company's proposal on safety and health that was presented at the 21 September 1984 meeting and in addition a written proposal on the downtime. Beauchamp did not have a copy of that proposal and Hatley said it had been given to the Union in the April meeting. Hatley had a copy of it with him. He made copies for the Union and then everyone had a copy. The parties begin discussion with item 1 on General Counsel's Exhibit 9. The Union wanted a definition of machines and the Company wrote off a list of machines that would be defined under item 1. The parties then moved to item 2 dealing with half pay for certain types of downtime. The Company discussed the possibility of looking at some kind of bonus arrangement and incentive program but there was never a proposal to incorporate such an incentive plan in the contract. The 10 May discussion actually got started during the downtime proposal because Hatley told the Union that the replacement workers were more productive than the strikers. Beauchamp asked him how he made that decision and Hatley said they had made studies. The Union requested the information and ended up in a discussion on productivity. After discussion Beauchamp asked the Company if they were flexible on the proposal. Hatley stated the Company was flexible on that item provided that the Union made what they deemed to be sufficient or significant progress in certain noneconomic areas that the Company was concerned about. Beauchamp asked what areas. Hatley replied, Respondent's no-strike clause, the stewards clause, grievances procedures, and the downtime proposal. The parties moved to item 3, specifically, the inclusion of restrooms. The parties then moved to item 4 dealing with crewmembers being away from work for 5 to 30 minutes. The parties then discussed the no-strike clause and what the Company's problem was with the clause as written in the expired collective-bargaining agreement. Hatley stated that reference to the International in the no-strike clause was something he could not accept. Beauchamp said he could understand Hatley's concern and that he would look at it. The parties then discussed the Company's proposal on stewards and the grievance procedure on arbitration. Beauchamp asked for a union caucus to consider the Company's counterproposals on the no-strike clause, the stewards, and grievance and arbitration clause. After the caucus the Union told the Company that they would remove the reference to the International constitution in the no-strike clause and the Company agreed that the rest of the language was not a problem. The parties continued the meeting discussing the stewards and grievance and arbitration clauses in the Company's proposal. Before the meeting ended Beauchamp asked Hatley if the Company had implemented any of their proposals at this point. The Company said they had not implemented any of the proposals. The meeting adjourned at approximately 7 p.m.

After the meeting ended Beauchamp began reviewing the past negotiations. In early August he contacted Buddy Bryant by telephone. Beauchamp told Bryant that it was his opinion that the Company was not interested in reaching an agreement. They were just delaying negotiations. Beauchamp outlined to Bryant what he thought the union strategy should be. He told Bryant that the strategy consisted of meeting, attempting to make changes, specifically in the downtime proposal, and especially in the more aggressive areas, such as no pay for restroom breaks, that type of stuff. In any event, they would come out of the 28 August meeting with an agreement. They would agree to anything that was on the bargaining table at that meeting. Beauchamp told Bryant to do otherwise was to play into the Company's hands. It was his belief that they were just waiting until the year was up so that the strikers could not vote in the decertification election. Beauchamp told Bryant to talk to the committee about that, and if there was no major problem, to go ahead and set up a meeting in August with the Company. Bryant set a meeting for 28 August. Prior to the meeting Beauchamp reviewed his strategy with the bargaining committee. He told the bargaining committee that the Union would agree to everything that was on the table and that would be our agreement. He wanted them not to blink an eye when he said that. He wanted them to know right up front that "that's what we're going to do." They understood this strategy and they agreed to it.

The meeting was held as scheduled. Beauchamp again was spokesman for the Union, Bryant was present, and Hatley was spokesman for the Company. At the outset Beauchamp asked Hatley specifically what the Company's proposal for an agreement between W. Pat Crow and Lodge 96 were. Hatley replied that the company proposals were General Counsel's Exhibits 4, 5, and 9, including the changes made on 10 May concerning those clauses. Hatley made no objection nor did he point out any specifics in any of the written proposals that would not be considered the Company's position. Beauchamp then asked Hatley whether the Company had implemented any of their proposals since 10 May. Hatley replied they had not. Beauchamp then asked Hatley if the replacement workers were working under the terms and conditions of the expired collective-bargaining agreement. Hatley said, "Yes." The parties then began discussing the downtime proposals. Specifically the reference to restroom breaks in item 3 of the downtime proposals. After discussion the Company agreed to exclude restroom breaks from the downtime proposal. The Union agreed. The parties then discussed item 4 which dealt with the half pay during downtime. Beauchamp alerted Hatley to the fact that with the wage rate under the expired contract, several individuals, if paid half pay, they would be receiving less than the minimum wage. Beauchamp then requested that the Company modify item 4 to provide half pay rate or the Federal minimum wage, whichever was higher. Hatley agreed that it should read that way. With respect to General Counsel's Exhibit 9, the downtime proposal, all the Union was concerned with was that the terms used by the Company in their written downtime proposal was that which was normally understood in the industry. Such as waiting on a heat, setup, trail run. Once it was understood that both the Company and the Union defined the terms the same way, there was nothing more to discuss. The parties then discussed the pension proposal. Hatley asked for explanations of the pension trust that Beauchamp supplied. Some written materials Bryant had were used to help answer his questions. Hatley asked questions referring to another document, the trust agreement. For example, selection of trustees, how they are selected, and the areas it represents. Those items are in the trust document. They are not reflected in the plan document The names of the trustees are in the plan. He also asked about forfeiture and about breaks in service for strikers. He asked whether the replacement employees or the strikers could get their pension contributions back. Beauchamp told Hatley that they could not. Beauchamp explained to Hatley that they could not get their money back because the only way they could receive consideration for those contributions would be if in fact they remained under the plan and did not occur a break in service. Because its multi in nature the employees could conceivably, down the road, work for another contributing employer and not incur a permanent break. Beauchamp explained to Hatley that it was a multiemployer plan. If the people were not vested, they could incur a permanent break. But if, in the period of time they were not under covered employment they then became employed with a contractor who was a contributing employer, they would then be back under covered service and time and the amount of money that was contributed on behalf of those employees while they were employees of W. Pat Crow would be credited to them. If they remained out of covered employment for a sufficient amount of time, they would incur permanent break. And if they were not vested would forfeit all contributions, both from W. Pat Crow or any other employer. Beauchamp did at one point during the discussions make a guarantee that some of the strikers, as a result of being on strike, would not lose anything that was contributed with Pat Crow. The strikers were on a preferential hiring list and would be recalled when openings occurred.

Hatley wanted a listing of the employees who were participants and also the amounts of money that had been contributed on their behalf. He was told the Union could not supply that information because the pension trust would not release it. Hatley also expressed an interest in becoming a trustee in the pension plan. Beauchamp then reminded Hatley that the Company's proposal to eliminate the pension trust could possibly have a negative effect on the replacement employees for whom the Company had been making contributions to the trust. Beauchamp explained the vesting procedures, and how the employees could lose those contributions that were credited on their behalf if the pension plan was eliminated from the contract. In addition, Beauchamp stated that strikers could also lose some benefits if they were not vested and the requirements for maintaining those benefits were discussed. A number of employees still had not returned to work following the strike. After further discussion Hatley said the company position was changed from a definite "no" to a "maybe" on the inclusion of a pension plan. The parties continued discussing the pension trust proposal. There was a discussion about a jointly administered plan for pensions between Local 96 and the Company, that is setting up a separate trust. The Union's position was that a separate trust was an impractical thing for such a small union. The Union had a good plan already in effect and did not see any reason to change it. The Union's position on pension was to maintain the current pension plan. The Company's original position was to have no pension at all in the contract. Since further discussion was getting them nowhere and Beauchamp did not think that a trustee for about 40 employees was worth any further discussion, he turned to Hatley and said, "Look, the Union while we haven't met since May 10, 1985, has reviewed the negotiations, reviewed what progress we made on May 10, reviewed the Company's arguments for their proposals, and we are prepared at this time to agree to the Company's proposals, written proposals, that are on the table." At that point Hatley looked sick, his demeanor changed, his face got pale, and he said, "What do you mean. We've got all these open issues. We can't have an agreement. We've got all these issues outstanding." Beauchamp asked what issues are you talking about. Hatley said, "The pension." Beauchamp said, "What about the pension." Hatley said, "We haven't finished the discussion of the pension." Beauchamp said, "I tried to give you all the information I can on the pension. Have you changed your position on the pension." Hatley said, "No." Beauchamp asked, "Don't you have a position on the table, in writing on the pension?" Hatley said, "Yes we do." Beauchamp said, "Isn't that, no pension." Hatley said, "Yes, that's correct." Beauchamp said, "Fine we'll agree to the contract with no pension." Hatley then stated, "Well, you know, we might at some point consider the pension." Beauchamp said, "We will agree to an agreement with no pension, but if for some reason the Company later on decides, based on review of what we said or whatever you want, to include a pension just give us a call and we'll put it in the new contract." Beauchamp told Hatley he was submitting the Company's proposals to the members without a pension plan. Beauchamp said he would tell the members they would be ratifying the contract without a pension. Hatley still expressed concern about what the members would be voting on and Beauchamp said, "Well, I can't understand what you're so concerned about. Can't you agree to your own proposal. These are your proposals are they not." Hatley replied, "Yes." Beauchamp asked, "You mean to tell me you have a problem agreeing to these proposals?" Hatley said, "Well, we don't really have a problem agreeing to anything we propose." Beauchamp said, "I hope you don't." Hatley expressed that his concern was that, he thought there was some open issues. Beauchamp told him, "As far as the Union I'm telling you right now. We will agree to the proposals on the table." At that point Hatley took a recess and made a phone call to the president of the Company. Shortly thereafter he came back into the room and told Beauchamp and the union committee that he had talked with the president and the president wanted to convey his congratulations that they had finally come to an agreement. Some pleasantries were exchanged and Beauchamp told Hatley that the Union would be conducting a ratification vote and Bryant would be handling those arrangements. Bryant would notify him about the results of the vote. With that the negotiating team shook hands and the meeting ended after lasting all day.

Beauchamp identified General Counsel's Exhibit 10 as a result of the discussion he had with the Company on the arbitration procedure. The Company had proposed changing the location of arbitration proceedings to somewhere off the company property. The Union agreed to that reluctantly but did, in fact, agree to it. Beauchamp stated that General Counsel's Exhibits 9, 10, and 11 were on the table as company proposals at the time that the Union accepted whatever proposals the Company had on the table. Beauchamp identified General Counsel's Exhibits 12 and 13 as notes he took at the 10 May and 28 August meetings. On page 5 of the 28 August notes he wrote, "Agreed to Company's proposal except for items previously agreed to, tentative agreements, all items on the table, and previously agreed to understandings subject to membership ratification." Beauchamp read another note on the exhibit, "The Union will vote for the proposals without a pension. If the Company agrees to include then the Union has no objection."

On cross Beauchamp restated that in the 10 May meeting the "no strike clause" was agreed on by the parties. Beauchamp stated that everything else in the company proposals remained open, unagreed at the conclusion of the 10 May meeting. Beauchamp stated that between the 10 May and 28 August meeting there were no modifications of any proposals, formally or informally.

At some time during the 28 August meeting Hatley did, during the discussion on productivity, make reference to an employee performance recognition program. Beauchamp checked his notes and found that on page 3 of the 10 May notes there was a reference to a bonus reward type system that they had discussed. There was no specific proposal from the Company in regard to the bonus reward type system either oral or in writing.

Beauchamp did not recall any discussion or statements by the Company at the meetings of 10 May or 28 August to the effect that any contract that is retroactive over a year the Company did not want. Beauchamp denies the duration of the contract was discussed with or raised by the Company at either the 10 May or 18 August meetings. Beauchamp did not recall any statement from Hatley to the effect "you can vote on what you want, but until we have agreed on all the contract we don't have any agreement between us."

Beauchamp had no knowledge of any articles or any proposals having been signed off as agreed to by either party prior to the 10 May meeting. Beauchamp did not ask the Company to sign off on anything, nor did the Company ask him to sign off on anything.

Harold Hatley testified that he is vice president of personnel and industrial relations for chemical express company and he was loaned to Pat Crow Forgings just for the purpose of negotiating the contract. Hatley was the spokesman for the Company in all the negotiating sessions, and had the authority to reach an agreement with the Union and enter into a contract. All company proposals were drafted by Hatley. There was no discussion between the parties with respect to any form the bargaining would take or what procedure would be followed when agreements were reached. The only negotiation rule agreed to between the parties was that the Company would not pay the bargaining unit people who were members of the committee while they were negotiating. Hatley had been told by the Union that they had been paid in the past. He had no reason to doubt it but he was not going to do it this time.

Ground rules that were agreed on between Boykin and Hatley was, "We don't have an agreement until we agree upon all open issues and all agreements are tentative pending ratification by the union membership."

The Union introduced at the first meeting on 28 June 1984 their proposal for a new contract. The Company at the second meeting introduced their written proposal for a contract. The Company's bargaining committee was composed of Hatley, Lee Chambers, and Karl Arceneaux. Additional company proposals in writing that were made in the course of the negotiations was the production downtime proposal and the safety program proposals. In addition to these written proposals there were several oral proposals made. One was the employee performance incentive program, another was a locally administered savings retirement plan between Local 96 and W. Pat Crow Forgings.

During the course of negotiations, that is the 20 meetings, very few agreements were reached between the parties. After about seven or eight meetings Boykin finally agreed to a company proposal that anywhere in the contract where it refers to "he" that it should refer to both "he" and "she" or a statement that the masculine gender shall also mean the feminine gender. That agreement on gender was not recorded in any particular fashion that Hatley knows of. He did write on his notes the time and date it was agreed to.

At the end of the 10 May meeting several issues were still unresolved and remained so at the conclusion of the 28 August meeting. They were:

1. Performance incentive program

It was referred to throughout negotiations and was last proposed at the 10 May meeting. Hatley made the offer to the Union to join with the Company and have a mutual performance incentive program for all employees at W. Pat Crow. The Company would base this program on excellent attendance, productivity being above standard, and zero accidents for whatever period they could agree on, whether it would be monthly or quarterly or what; and for such performance they would reward the employees either cash bonus or something material in nature and a color TV or bicycle were used as examples. In the proposal the Company would share half the cost and the Union would share half the cost. The Union did not accept the proposal. The incentive program is not incorporated in any of the written proposals. It was a program that recognized employee performance and perfect attendance. Discussions never got to the point where any specifics were worked out in the program, however. The Company did not make any modification to its original proposal. They simply just raised it again. The last rejection was the 10 May meeting.

2. Duration of labor agreement

It was the company position that a 3-year labor agreement was to be effective at the time it was entered into and signed, without regard to the period covered in the Company's written proposal. The written proposal was modified in the third meeting when Lester Boykin was the spokesman for the Union. The Company has always maintained they wanted a 3-year contract. With regard to duration the Union had always wanted a 3-year contract going back to 17 August 1984. The letter Hatley received on 6 September from Buddy Bryant affirmed that. Hatley stated that the company proposal on 28 August, late in the meeting when the Union had said that they had a contract, was 3 years from the date they enter into a signed agreement going forward.

3. Employee handbook

The handbook had always been a separate book and the Company was proposing that it become part of the contract and be included in one book where both the Union and the Company would share the cost. The Union did not want to do that.

4. Production standards

Production standards, as far as piece-work output, from time and motion studies. The Union rejected that totally. The Company's offer was that standards will be established or increased pursuant to an industrial engineer actually doing time and motion studies to increase or improve productivity in the plant.

5. Work rules

Work rules concerning penalties, infraction of work rules, cost of printing the work rule sheets, and acknowledgement sheets that employees were required to sign. The Union took the position that progressive discipline will apply to all work rule infractions regardless of the severity of the infraction. The Union disagreed with sharing the cost of the printing and was not agreeable to employees signing an acknowledgement sheet once they had been given the work rules.

6. Wages

The Company's position is what was in the original proposal. The rates are listed with the classifications. The proposed reduction is approximately 18 percent. The Union's position was the rates of pay as outlined in the expired labor agreement. That is, the Union was proposing a freeze on wages. The Union's original written proposal asked for an increase but they did modify that position later in negotiations, although they did not do so in writing. In August 1985 the average hourly rate was $10.47.

7. Production downtime

The parties discussed production downtime throughout the progress of negotiations. The Company made an offer to help monitor production downtime. The Company proposed using timeclocks or what is called vibration meters, but the Union refused the timeclock offer and the vibration meters.

8. Dues checkoff

The Union wanted the Company to provide them with dues checkoff or what they referred to as a dues log to get their money. As of 10 May the Company proposed no checkoff. There was a checkoff in the expired contract.

9. Safety and health program

The safety and health program that was proposed in writing.

10. Arbitration

It was evidenced by a handwritten proposal written by Hatley that was offered to the Union on 10 May. (G.C. Exh. 10.) It was discussed and Hatley had made provision for the proposal to be accepted and signed off that particular day. The Union would not accept the proposal and refused to sign. The proposal dealt with the location of grievance and arbitration proceedings and whether employees would be compensated for attending those meetings. The Company had proposed holding the meetings off company property and no longer hold them on company property. Job stewards required to be at the meetings would not be compensated. That proposal is the additional proposal on arbitration made by the Company. All other arbitration is in the original company proposal.

11. Job classifications

The old contract had 16 job classifications, the Company was proposing only 6.

12. Overtime notification

The Union's position was that they wanted the Company to notify the employees 3 days prior to working overtime for the weekend. It was the Company's position that no notice was required. The Company would give employees a reasonable amount of time to help them out but the Company did not want to be tied down to restrictive language that would require the Company to give 3-day notice before there could be any overtime work. Hatley stated that in the expired agreement there was a provision for overtime notification.

13. Contract printing cost

Hatley said the parties were apart on that. The Union's position was that the Company would have it printed and pay for like it did in the past and the Company's position was it was time the Boilermakers took up the cost for it.

Hatley only recalled one agreement on any proposal between the Union and the Company that could have taken place in the 10 May meeting. That was the agreement to delete the reference to the union constitution in the "No strike clause."

At the start of the 28 August meeting Beauchamp held up the Company's 70-page proposal, the safety and health proposal and the production downtime proposal, and asked if these are the only things opened. Hatley answered, "Yes." There was some discussion about General Counsel's Exhibit 11 with the Union saying they did not have it and he proceeded to give them a copy at that meeting. Although his thought was that he gave it at the 10 May meeting.

There were three proposals on pension. One was to delete the pension plan entirely. Another was to guarantee the people would not lose any money in retirement due to their break in service during strike and giving the money back to the employees that they have paid into the plan. The third was the local plan between Local 96 and W. Pat Crow Forgings.

The locally administered plan between Local 96 and the Company for retirement and pension was first proposed at the 28 August meeting. The Company would be the trustee of the plan and would administer the fund. It was to be called the savings plan and keep the moneys local. There was to be no administration cost for the program. The Union did not accept the proposal.

Hatley recalled asking questions about the pension plan, questions like who handles the funds, trust fund agreement, trustees of the plan, breaks in service, effects of the strike, and people being off work.

"The way I interpreted the plan—all employees would lose their money. And we had conversation along that line." Beauchamp answered his questions but it did not help him to understand the program. Hatley did make a request for certain information about the plan—a letter from the Union or board of trustees guaranteeing that none of the employees would lose any money that they have in the plan as a result of the strike. Hatley also requested disbursements of funds from January 1984 to date for each employee based on their amounts in the plan. He also requested an accounting of funds distribution preferably in the Dallas-Ft. Worth area. "So he can actually see or get an idea, does this plan really pay off? He didn't know, And if its—you know, the Company's opinion—if its all approved—I mean, it just didn't—the hand out I looked at just didn't seem like it was the same thing." There was discussion about the administration cost. He was concerned about one article in the plan that stated the trustees could borrow money from the plan. Beauchamp's answer as far as a lump-sum settlement or give the money back, "it's not possible." Local administered plan, "No." Hatley did recall Beauchamp saying the Union would take the contract with or without the plan. But Hatley said that does not take care of the $90,000 outstanding. Beauchamp did make some statements about there being a contract. Beauchamp's first statement was, "We will take it with or without a plan." His closing statement was, "Well, looks like we have a contract." Hatley responded, "No you don't. We don't have an agreement until we agree on all items and what you do at your Union Hall is fine, but we don't have an agreement." Following those statements Hatley took a caucus. When he returned from the caucus he told Beauchamp that the president of the Company would like for him to relay to the committee his appreciation for them trying to get a labor agreement together. Hatley said he requested an itemization of specific pension information before he could go any further on negotiations. The information was disbursements of funds from January 1984 to the present date. How much money employees had in the fund as of 28 August and today. How much they would have in a plan assuming a plan on retirement was active. A letter from the board of trustees of the plan that would guarantee the Company in writing that no employees would lose any money as a result of being out on strike. He has not received any of that information.

Hatley acknowledged that Beauchamp explained to him during the negotiations that the Boilermaker Blacksmith Pension Trust had a billion dollars in assets and was the fifth largest pension trust in the country. Hatley still wanted an accounting of the pension trust to make sure the employees' money was safe. Beauchamp also told him that the individual employees get an accounting of the contributions and what they have in the trust fund although Beauchamp did not know how often they get it.

When asked "What was the Union's offer on 28 August?" Hatley responded, "His opinion was, they just wanted the contract and you fill in the blanks. That was really my opinion."

With regard to the Union's acceptance of the company proposals:

Hatley recalled that Beauchamp announced, "We accept the Company's proposals and we have a contract." Hatley stated that various conversations began between different people in the room and he simply excused himself and left the room and called the president of the Company. Hatley acknowledged that late in the evening hours on 28 August Beauchamp did say, "The Union accepts all the Company's proposals and we have a contract." Hatley at that time indicated that there were open issues, although he did not enumerate those issues. To date, Hatley has had no contact with Bryant or Beauchamp to articulate the open issues or attempt to resolve them or set up further negotiations. Hatley stated he did outline the open issues in a letter dated 16 September to Bryant.

Hatley acknowledged that during negotiations Beauchamp at one point in the discussion said, "What our position is we shall take the Company proposals plus the Company's minutes regarding the proposal of 10 May with or without a pension." Immediately thereafter, Hatley caucused with this group for about 5 minutes and then he made a phone call. Hatley returned approximately 20 minutes later. At that point Beauchamp said, "We tentatively agree on everything on the table with or without a pension." Hatley stated that he understood the agreement was tentative because it was pending ratification by the union membership. Hatley's immediate response to Beauchamp was, "No, we don't."

Hatley's testimony on cross-examination:

> Q. Okay. And Mr. Beauchamp said, "We tentatively agree on everything that's on the table." Is that right?
> A. That's . . . .
> Q. "With or without the pension. Which ever one you want."
> A. That's what he said, yes.
> Q. And you wouldn't accept that?
> A. That's correct.
> Q. Despite the fact he accepted all your proposals?
> A. That's correct.

Hatley testified that the meeting adjourned approximately 5 p.m. and there was no attempt to set up any other meeting at that time. Hatley stated that when he left the meeting he did not believe he had a labor contract with Local 96.

Shortly after 28 August he got a call from Bryant, and Buddy told him that the contracts had been ratified and the parties needed to get together to put some books together. Hatley stated he told Bryant "No, we don't have a contract. As I told you before—we don't have a contract until all open issues are resolved." Hatley added, "You're putting your cart above your horse in this matter and if you've got any problem, I want to have your boss call me." Although Hatley did receive correspondence from Bryant subsequent to the telephone call, he did not have any further telephone conversations with Bryant. Specifically, he did not have a telephone conversation with Bryant on 19 September.

Lee Chambers testified he is vice president of finance for W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc. and has been for the past 9 years. He attended all the negotiating sessions. Chambers' chief function during the course of the last three sets of negotiations in 1978, 1981, and 1984 has been the recording secretary, that is to keep the notes. Chambers said that the Company's proposal on no pension plan was only viable for the first couple of meetings and it was changed sometime after that. At the 28 August meeting when Beauchamp said there was an agreement, Hatley said, "No, we don't." Hatley added we would only have an agreement when all the matters were agreed on. When Chambers left the meeting, he did not think there had been a contract reached between the Company and the Union. Chambers acknowledged that Beauchamp stated that the Union had a contract for the membership to ratify with or without the pension, and an additional comment that there is a contingency the Company will study a pension plan or something along that line. Chambers said that at the close of the meeting on 28 August the issues that remained open were duration, production incentive program, and pension. Those were the three main issues. Chambers said the outstanding proposal on duration of the contract is contained in the Company's original proposal, General Counsel's Exhibit 4. Also there was an outstanding proposal on an incentive plan, but it was verbal. Beauchamp, at the meeting, accepted all the Company's outstanding proposals. Chambers stated that as he recalled that was his statement.

On 6 September Bryant called Chambers. Bryant called to inform Chambers that the committee and membership had met and ratified the agreement. Chambers asked Bryant how many people were present. Chambers recalled Bryant said 40 and it was unanimous. Bryant then changed it and said no it was not unanimous, but the majority accepted it. Chambers states he informed Bryant that none of the company officers or superior management had informed him that there had been an agreement and he would have to check with Harold Hatley, the chief negotiator. The telephone conversation with Bryant lasted approximately 2 to 3 minutes. Chambers stated he did not, during the course of the conversation, agree with Bryant that there was a contract between the Company and Local 96.

Chambers had another conversation with Bryant on 13 September. The Union had asked for some information from the Company at the 28 August meeting and Chambers told Bryant he had completed the list and turned it over to Hatley for his review. Bryant would have to check with Hatley. Chambers estimates the annual savings to the Company on their wage proposal to be between $150,000 and $160,000. Annual savings for the Company based on the downtime proposal would be $15,000 to $16,000. The annual savings for the Company with their no pension proposal is approximately $15,000. Chambers had made a survey of the competitors' wages in the area and a rounded estimate is approximately $2-an-hour difference. The Company had already experienced this with prior quotes because so many of the aircraft people were going out and demanding 3-year, firm, fixed contracts. That was how Pat Crow was getting beat up, because of the difference in the contract cost. Before the union contract expired, the Company had asked the Union for a wage freeze, but the Union turned it down.

Oscar Tibbs testified that he was a member of the employee negotiating committee and that he attended the bargaining session on 28 August 1985. Beauchamp asked Hatley if he still had his proposal and was it still on the table. Hatley said, "Yes it was." Beauchamp then said we accept it and Hatley said, "Okay." They went across the table and shook hands and that was the end of the meeting. Tibbs said that the meeting lasted for approximately 5 hours, and that the point in the meeting when the company proposals were accepted by the Union was late in the meeting. Tibbs did not recall Hatley stating that there were any open issues after the Union had said they accepted the Company's proposals and he was in the meeting for the whole time.

Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel's complaint alleges that the parties reached agreement on all substantive terms of a contract on 28 August, but when requested to execute a written contract thereafter Respondent refused.

Respondent contends that no agreement on contract terms was ever reached by the parties due to outstanding open issues and in the strictest sense the Company did not refuse to execute an agreement.

As Respondent argues, the essential allegation of the complaint is that "Respondent and the union agreed on contract terms." If no agreement existed, there is no statutory mandate to reduce the agreement to writing and sign it.

No witness could adequately recall the substance of negotiating sessions. Each witness attempted to reconstruct the meetings and in several cases offered written exhibits into the record. My determination is based on a composite of facts describing what took place between the parties and, particularly, at the last two meetings of 10 May and 28 August 1985.

A review of the record testimony and the objective evidence leads me to the conclusion that an agreement was reached by the parties on 28 August, and Respondent's subsequent refusal to reduce the agreement to writing and execute it as a contract constitutes a violation of the Act. Following is my reconstruction of the negotiations based on uncontroverted and credible record evidence, both subjective and objective.

The parties negotiated for 14 months, during which time 20 meetings were scheduled and held. There were only two procedural ground rules agreed to: (1) there would be no final agreement until all outstanding issues were agreed to, and (2) any agreement reached by the negotiating teams had to be ratified by the Union's membership before it became binding on the parties.

The meetings began 28 June 1984, with the Union submitting their contract proposal in writing and referenced to the changes sought in the preceding contract. At the second meeting the Respondent countered with a complete written contract proposal of its own and with oral references to the preceding contract. Over the course of the next 15 meetings there was very little movement by either party from their original proposals. Hatley recalled only one agreement between the parties that occurred in the seventh or eighth meeting. The parties agreed that the masculine gender, when written, would include reference to the feminine gender, if applicable. Bryant could recall several agreements within the same time period, but only after reference to his copy of the Union's proposal that he used as a work tool during negotiations: At the second meeting, 31 July 1984, the Union withdrew its proposal for a 10th holiday and accepted the Company's proposal that holidays remain unchanged at 9; at a later meeting the Union withdrew their proposal for increased company premium contribution and increased employee benefits and accepted the company proposal that employees health and life insurance remain the same as in the expired agreement; additionally, the Union initially proposed lung and chest X-rays every 6 months for affected employees but, at some point, accepted the company proposal as originally written. The Union's proposal sought a 1-year agreement and the company proposal sought a 3-year agreement. Bryant's notes reflected that, at the 13th meeting on 7 November 1984, Hatley renewed the Company's proposal for a 3-year agreement including the Union's pension plan with a 50-cent-per-hour contribution for each employee. The Union at that time did not accept the proposal.

Although the record contains several references to discussions of items both within and without those clauses previously proposed, there is no substantive evidence that the parties original proposals of 28 June and 31 July were modified or withdrawn to the extent that the parties were negotiating with a new or different base. That is, from the 1st to the 17th meeting, the parties were negotiating from their respective original proposals.

The 18th meeting on 5 April 1985 included a discussion of "production downtime," which ended in a written company proposal that the Union did not accept.

On 10 May 1985 the parties met for the 19th time but with Beauchamp as the union spokesman for the first time. It is undisputed that Beauchamp began the meeting by confirming that the company contract proposals were contained in the initial written proposal of 31 July 1984, the written safety and health committee program proposal, and the written letter of understanding on production downtime originating in the April 5 meeting (G.C. Exhs. 4, 5, and 9). After discussing production downtime, including employee productivity and incentive, Hatley added a written list of machines to the Company's production downtime proposal. The Union's contract proposal sought no change in the grievance procedure or the no-strike clause. The Company's proposal, however, included the no-strike clause within their proposed grievance-arbitrations clause that also recognized the functions of stewards. After discussion, the Company in writing proposed arbitration meetings be held off company property but within the metro area of Dallas-Ft. Worth and that employees and stewards attend uncompensated. Further, discussion on steward functions, including numbers to be appointed, followed based on the Company's original proposal on a stewards' clause. The parties could not agree on the grievance or the stewards' proposal. A discussion of the no-strike provision of the Union's original proposal produced agreement between the parties with deletion of the reference to the members voting in accord with the union constitution. Although further discussion followed, no additional agreements were reached.

The parties next met on 28 August 1985. The record shows that Beauchamp reviewed with Hatley what company proposals were on the table. The outstanding proposals were: The Company's original proposal of 31 July 1984; the written proposal on the safety and health committee; the letter of understanding on production downtime with schedule "A" attached; and the written company proposal on arbitration offered at the 10 May meeting. Beauchamp restated the parties' agreement on the no-strike clause reached on 10 May.

Discussion began on the production downtime proposal centering on items 3 and 4. The Company's original proposal provided for a washup time, as did the expired contract, but the Company's letter of understanding proposed no paid washup time. The Company was concerned about prior abuses of paid break periods and proposed a progressive discipline for abusers. The parties agreed to two 10-minute unpaid breaks each day and an unpaid lunch period of 30 minutes. They also agreed that restroom breaks would be deleted from item 3 and any employee abusing the privilege would be disciplined progressively—a verbal warning, suspension for 3 days, and then discharge. After reference to wage rates in the contract proposal, the parties agreed that item 4 could result in an employee being reduced in pay to a level below the Federal minimum wage. The parties agreed that the reduced wage in item 4 would be either half pay or the Federal minimum wage to give the employee the higher of the two.

Wages as proposed by the Company in Exhibits "A" and "B" of their original proposal on 31 July 1984 was discussed. The proposed wage for grade I of $10.50 an hour was to extend to 1987. Hire-in rates of new hires since August 1984 were reduced with progressive increases to the maximum after 6 months for each classification. The Company's proposal included only 6 labor grades with all 16 classifications of employees within the labor grades. The parties did not agree on wages.

The parties referred to the pension plan brochure and discussed the effect of termination of participation procedures on the striking employees yet to return to work. The status of newly hired employees as of August 1984 was discussed with particular reference to continuous employment and the inactive status of employees on layoff. Discussion thus turned to the Company's original Exhibit "C" proposal on related monetary matters. Paragraph 2 of the Company's letter of understanding on production downtime proposed half the hourly rate for specified downtime, whereas Exhibit "C" proposed the Federal minimum wage. The discussion clarified that the Company's proposal for wages on specified downtime was as shown in paragraph 2 of the letter of understanding and replaced paragraph 1 of Exhibit "C" in the Company's original proposal.

The parties returned to discussion of the Union's pension plan. Hatley expressed interest in the Union's plan and serving in a trustee capacity. Hatley sought information about administration of the Union's plan and suggested the Respondent may continue the plan.

Beauchamp at this point, on behalf of the Union, accepted all company proposals on the table, including the understandings previously agreed to. He stated that there was tentative agreement on all items on the table subject to a ratification vote by the union membership. Hatley questioned whether the parties indeed had an agreement on the pension issue. Beauchamp confirmed with Hatley that the Company's proposal on pension was as contained in the original proposal of 31 July 1984, i.e., no pension. Beauchamp accepted the Company's contract proposal with no pension.

Hatley and his committee left the room for several minutes to caucus. When Hatley returned, he informed the union committee that the president of the Company expressed appreciation that an agreement had been reached.

Hatley continued showing interest in the Union's pension plan and several points of the plan were discussed. Hatley wanted: the amount of distribution in Texas since 1984, a copy of the trust agreement, the amount each employee had in the pension accounts, the lump-sum settlement provision rules for modification, and a guarantee that the striking employees would have no loss of funds or vesting rights due to their break in service. Hatley specifically requested a letter to the Company explaining the effect of the break-in-service rules on the employees out on strike.

Beauchamp told Hatley that the union membership would vote on the Company's contract proposal of no pension; however, if the Company later agreed to include the pension plan for the employees, there would be no objection by the Union.

Neither party requested the other to "sign off" the proposals to express the parties agreement to outstanding proposals. Before the meeting ended Bryant requested a current seniority list with wage rates as of 28 August 1985.

Bryant conducted the ratification vote on 5 September. The members accepted the company proposals for a contract without a pension. Bryant telephoned the results of the vote to the Company. The next day Bryant sent a followup letter to the Company suggesting a meeting to formalize the contract. Bryant made several attempts to reach Hatley by phone but was unsuccessful until September 19. That same day Bryant received Hatley's letter of September 16 denying that any agreement had been reached and referring to the outstanding pension issue.

Bryant countered with a letter reaffirming the ratification vote for a contract without a pension and requesting the Company to execute the contract as agreed on.

Hatley, in his letter to the Union on 16 September, wrote that the pension issue remained outstanding and until it was resolved there was no complete offer for the Union to accept. In his testimony, however, Hatley enumerated 13 proposals that he considered outstanding issues at the conclusion of the 28 August meeting: duration of contract, pension, employee handbook, production standards, progressive discipline, wages, production downtime, dues checkoff, safety and health, arbitrations, job classifications, notification of overtime, and contract printing cost. Hatley, in the same testimony, also stated that several of these outstanding issues were included in the Company's initial written proposal to the Union. Thus, duration, pension, progressive discipline, wages, production downtime, dues checkoff, safety and health, job classifications, notification of overtime, and contract printing cost were on the table at the beginning of the 28 August meeting. There is no evidence to evince withdrawal by the Company of its initial proposal or any portion thereof. The evidence shows the opposite. The parties continued negotiating from the Company's initial proposal. There is record evidence that the Company orally proposed alternative pension programs for the union negotiating team to consider.

Contrary to Respondent's argument, the Union's acceptance of the initial proposal of "no pension" is not made ambiguous by the further proposal that, on reflection, Respondent may agree to continue the union pension trust as before. Moreover, the additional proposal of some future acquiescence was presented after the Union accepted the "no pension" proposal. As Hatley testified, the Company offered the Union several proposals on a pension plan and, as with any optional offer, the subject party can elect that which suits them best. It is undisputed that the Union rejected the option of paying back moneys to employees previously covered, particularly since the Union, as the employees representative, did not control the pension trust moneys, nor would it elect to pay out from its own treasury. It is equally undisputed that the Union rejected the company option of a local pension plan administered by the local union and the Respondent. Thus, the Union accepted one of the three options proposed resolving the pension issue raised by the multiple proposals. Hatley's concern over the $90,000 previously paid into the union pension trust, whether understandable or not, is not relevant to the current negotiations. The payment and use of that money was controlled by past agreements with the Union and cannot now be questioned by Respondent as a condition for reaching a new agreement. Especially where, as here, Respondent's multiple pension proposals did not include the Union's pension trust as before.

The expired contract had a safety and health provision for an employee safety committee. Respondent's initial proposal deleted the safety committee and set forth a basic policy on safety and health. During negotiations, on 21 September 1984, Hatley submitted an additional written proposal on safety and health, which, in effect, made provision for the safety committee originally deleted in the Company's initial proposal. Thus, Respondent's complete proposal on safety and health was contained in two written proposals and both were viable on 28 August. The Union specifically accepted both proposals as the contract term on safety and health at the 28 August meeting, which effectuated a tentative agreement between the parties on safety and health. Therefore there was no "open issue" on safety and health at the close of the meeting.

Hatley's contention, expressed in his testimony, that the parties had not reached agreement on the arbitration clause, is not supported by the record evidence. It is undisputed that the Company made two written proposals on arbitration and nothing more. The initial proposal contains the grievance and arbitration procedure and Hatley's handwritten proposal of 10 May completes the Company's proposals making provision for arbitration meetings to be held off company property with no compensation for employees or stewards attending. Both proposals were on the table on 28 August and were specifically accepted by Beauchamp, according to Hatley's later testimony. Absent additional proposals on arbitration (and there are none) there can be no "open issue" on arbitration.

Hatley's testimony of the "open issue, overtime notification" was in error. The expired contract did not contain a provision for notification of overtime, but the Union's initial contract proposal did submit adding a new section to article XIV of the expired contract. The Company's initial proposal on "overtime and premium pay" did not include a provision for overtime notification nor does the record contain any evidence that Hatley made any such proposal to the Union. In the absence of a proposal by the Company on "overtime notification" there can be no outstanding issue based on the Union's proposal. All union proposals lacking tentative agreement were effectively abandoned and/or withdrawn when Beauchamp accepted the open company proposals as the basis for a union contract.

Hatley's reference to open issues on "the employee handbook" and "work rules" is unsupported by the record evidence. The expired contract contained a lengthy management-rights clause that made provision for the Company to supply each employee with a copy of the "employee handbook" and to furnish each employee with a copy of "work rules" as well as posting on the bulletin board. The Company's initial proposal, however, reduced the managements-rights clause to a single short paragraph vesting all rights in management not specifically limited by any arguments reached. There is no evidence of a specific proposal by the Company on "employee handbook" or "work rules" in this record, therefore no "open issues" exist involving "the employee handbook" or "work rules."

Hatley's assertion that "open issues" on "production standards" and "the employee incentive program" existed following both the 10 May and 28 August meeting is unfounded. The record evidence shows that discussion of the written proposal "production downtime" included references to "production standards" and an "employee incentive program" as a means of improving production of the striking employees, if and when they returned to work, and rewarding the replacement employees for their efforts. Beauchamp credibly testified that Hatley, during the discussions, praised the replacement employees for their more efficient production including less downtime and more injury-free employment. Hatley testified that discussions of "production standards" were geared for some future time because any establishment or increase standards would be based on time and motion studies yet to be made by an industrial engineer. Hatley also stated that discussions of "an employee incentive program" never got to the point where any specifics were worked out nor did the Company make any modification to its original proposal or incorporate such a subject in a written proposal. As Hatley testified, "they [company] simply just raised it again." The last such raising and discussion was 10 May. Discussions during negotiations do not make proposals. It is clear that neither the "employee incentive program" nor "production standards" were discussed sufficiently to formulate either into a specific proposal or as an addition to the written production downtime proposal. Thus, neither "production standards" nor "an employee incentive program" were on the table or subject to acceptance as a term of the negotiated contract.

Contract printing cost cited by Hatley as an "open issue" between the parties is clearly "closed." The expired agreement in article XXV made provision for the Company to absorb the cost of printing and distribution to all employees. Respondent's initial proposal of 31 July 1984, article 32, reversed the prior provision making the Union responsible for the printing and distribution cost of any agreement reached between the parties. There is no evidence in the record that Respondent's article 32 was withdrawn, abandoned, or replaced by any subsequent proposal. It was, therefore, included in the company proposals accepted by Beauchamp on 28 August. Having been accepted by the Union as a proposed term for the contract, it cannot now remain an open issue.

Although only referred to by Hatley, inferentially, as a change in Respondent's position I am treating his testimony of "dues checkoff" as his opinion of an "open issue." But for Hatley's bare statement, there is not one scintilla of substantive evidence that dues checkoff was negotiated and much less that Respondent's initial proposal "dues checkoff" was modified. Because Hatley appeared to be building his testimony rather than making a genuine attempt to recall what occurred at the critical meetings, I am discrediting him on his "open issues" testimony. In addition to being somewhat contradictory, Hatley's testimony was confused by injections of personal opinions or mere assertions that certain facts were extant. Without more, his testimony cannot alter the sequence of events evinced by credible testimony of other witnesses and the objective evidence in the record. Further, the union proposals, and the manner employed by the union to modify those proposals, are irrelevant. This is not a case of piecing together a contract from opposing proposals. The contract here is contained entirely within the Company's proposals.

My determination that an agreement was reached between the parties on 28 August is supported by substantial record evidence and the current Board law. Whether parties have reached agreement on a collective-bargaining contract is not measured by the technical requirements of contract law. As Respondent argues in brief, the Board does require that parties to collective-bargaining negotiations have a meeting of the minds on all substantive terms for a final agreement to be constituted. If disagreement over the substance of certain contract terms exist, there is no meeting of the minds. Here, there is no doubt there was a meeting of the minds. Hatley had complete authority to negotiate a contract and to reach a final agreement. To implement that authority Hatley was the single author of all proposals made by Respondent whether oral or in writing. The proposals were in contract form, clause by clause. Beauchamp, in turn, had complete authority to negotiate a contract with final agreement of the Union exercised by the employee members of the Union. The parties were negotiating under the auspices of two ground rules: (1) There would be no final agreement until all outstanding issues were resolved, (2) all agreements on contract terms were tentative pending a ratification vote of the membership. Neither party suggested a signoff procedure on tentative agreements. The failure to use a signoff procedure, however, did not produce disputes over tentative agreements during negotiations. The absence of disputes is partially due to the experience of the negotiators and partially due to the lack of any tentative agreements of substance during the first 17 meetings. Both parties were holding firm to their initial proposals. Hatley then modified, in writing, several of the Company's proposed clauses with additional language. These additions were identified and recognized as proposals by Hatley and formed the basis for negotiations. In only one instance was an oral proposal made by Hatley. That instance was the alternative pension plans proposed by Hatley at the 28 August meeting. The colloquy between the parties and the correspondence between the parties subsequent to the 28 August meeting suggest, only, that Hatley still had questions in his mind about the Union's pension plan. Albeit Hatley testified that several other items were raised orally at many meetings, it is a fact that any proposal representing a change from the expired contract or a concession by the Union was reduced to writing by Hatley. Once the parties understood the meanings of terms used there was little room for disagreements over substance of contract terms. The record evidence shows that such disagreements did not exist. Clearly, therefore, when Beauchamp accepted all written company proposals on the table on 28 August there existed a meeting of the minds. The Respondent's "mind" was memorialized in the written proposals and the Union's "mind" was superimposed on the written company proposals by Beauchamp's unequivocal acceptance. Accordingly, I conclude and find that the parties reached a meeting of the minds on 28 August for a complete and final agreement and that the Union by letters dated 6 and 19 September requested the Company to finalize the agreement. Further, I conclude and find that Respondent's failure to acknowledge final agreement was ever reached is tantamount to a failure to execute the final agreement as requested by the Union. (Contrary to Respondent's argument in its brief that in the strictest sense, the Company did not, nor has it to this date, ever refused to execute an agreement.) By positioning itself to deny execution of the contract as requested, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The hiatus of silence between 9 and 16 September, in conjunction with Hatley's single attempt to resurrect a "pension issue" subsequent to the 28 August meeting, serves to enforce my resolution that an agreement had been reached. Further, if Hatley had favored one pension plan over another, he simply would not have proposed the unfavorable or would have withdrawn it with dispatch. Hatley choose to do neither. Further, Respondent's argument that it would be unreasonable to bind the parties to a 3-year contract with an effective date in 1984 because the Company sought wage concessions during the 14 months of negotiations is unavailing. The agreement reached on 28 August does not dictate any retroactivity of wages since the replacement employees are paid at or below the wage level of the agreement.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent, by refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement reached on 28 August, as requested by the Union on 6 September, has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

2. Respondent has not engaged in any other unfair labor practices.

3. The aforementioned unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order the Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to execute a collective-bargaining agreement, previously agreed on, shall be ordered to forthwith execute the agreement reached on 28 August 1985.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, W. Pat Crow Forgings, Inc., a Subsidiary of TIC Investment Corp., Ft. Worth, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall[4]

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, Local 96, AFL-CIO, by refusing to execute an agreed-on contact.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, Local 96, AFL-CIO, execute forthwith the contract on which agreement was reached with the Union on 28 August 1985, completed copies of which shall be furnished by the Union.

(b) Post at its offices in Ft. Worth, Texas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Red Arrow Freight Lines, Inc. and Perry Wayne Middlebrook. Case 26–CA–11970

June 20, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On August 31, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. Red Arrow Freight Lines, Inc. (the Respondent) filed exceptions and a supporting brief; the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief; and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, constructively discharged Dennis Spruill after Spruill was assigned to the Respondent's Little Rock to Memphis freight assignment (Little Rock-Memphis run). The Respondent contends that Spruill's decision to resign rather than accept the Little Rock-Memphis run was not foreseeable and, thus, it cannot be held responsible for Spruill's personal decision to terminate his employment. We find merit in the Respondent's exception.

The Respondent is a Texas corporation engaged in the interstate transportation of freight by motor vehicle. It operates a terminal in Little Rock, Arkansas. On November 9, 1986,[2] the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it laid off Perry Wayne Middlebrook in order to remove his pro-Teamsters union influence from the Little Rock terminal.[3] Middlebrook was working the Respondent's Little Rock-Memphis run at the time of the layoff. Once Middlebrook was laid off, it became necessary to assign another employee to handle this run. When no other employee indicated a desire to be assigned to the Little Rock-Memphis run,[4] the Respondent, on November 14, selected Spruill, the junior unassigned driver. The uncontroverted evidence reveals that under the collective-bargaining agreement in effect, a driver can be required to take an assignment and, if he refuses, can be terminated.

Spruill, who lives in Irving, Texas, did not learn of his assignment to take over the Little Rock-Memphis run until November 16, approximately 2 hours before he was scheduled to leave Little Rock for Memphis. Because he could not have traveled from Irving, Texas, where he was located, to Little Rock, Arkansas, in time for the start of the scheduled trip, Spruill told the Respondent's representative to have another driver handle the run. Spruill was told to contact Michael D. Rhodes, manager of Line Haul Operations, the following day.

The credited testimony indicates that Spruill telephoned Rhodes the next day. When Rhodes instructed Spruill to proceed to Little Rock to take over the assignment, Spruill refused, saying that he would quit rather than go to Little Rock. Rhodes asked Spruill to put his resignation in writing and Spruill agreed, but he never did. When Rhodes did not receive the anticipated written resignation, Rhodes sent Spruill a termination letter dated November 19.

In order to prove that an employee was constructively discharged, the General Counsel must establish that the burdens imposed on the employee "must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force [the employee] to resign" and that the burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activity. Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1976). While acknowledging that Spruill's resignation was not a constructive discharge in "the usual sense," the judge in this case relied on Howard Johnson Co., 209 NLRB 1122 (1979), and found that "but for" Middlebrook's illegal layoff, Spruill would never have been assigned to the Little Rock-Memphis run and would not have subsequently resigned. This "domino theory," the judge concluded, established Spruill's "constructive discharge." We do not agree.

[1] The judge concluded that the Respondent did not effectively repudiate Penfield's unlawful "no solicitation" instructions under the standards articulated in Passavant Memorial Area Hospital, 237 NLRB 138 (1978). We agree with the judge. The Respondent's "Notice to Employees," which was not posted until more than 5 months after Penfield's unlawful instructions, was untimely under Passavant. Moreover, we note that under Passavant the attempted repudiation must be free from other proscribed illegal conduct and must be specific to the coercive conduct. Here, inter alia, the attempted repudiation occurred in the context of other unremedied unfair labor practices, specifically Middlebrook's unlawful layoff, and did not refer to or acknowledge Penfield's unlawful statements. See, e.g., EPE, Inc., 284 NLRB 191 fn. 2 (1987), enfd. 845 F.2d 483 (4th Cir. 1988).

[2] All dates are 1986 unless otherwise noted.

[3] The Respondent has not challenged the judge's conclusion that it violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it laid off Middlebrook.

[4] The Respondent "posted" the assignment to allow other drivers an opportunity to "bid" on it. No employees, other than Middlebrook, bid on the assignment. Middlebrook's bid was determined to be invalid by the Respondent.

289 NLRB No. 23

In Howard Johnson, supra, the Board found that the employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when it laid off four nonunion employees in order to conceal the employer's unlawful motivation in laying off nine other union activists. The Board reasoned that the employer's action in laying off the four nonunion employees was "causally related" to the unlawful discrimination. In that case, however, it was clear the employer took direct action resulting in the employees' loss of their employment. In this case, however, while the record reveals that the Respondent had some difficulty in filling the Little Rock-Memphis run and that the assignment was not an especially profitable one for the driver assigned, there is no evidence to suggest that the assignment was particularly difficult or unpleasant or conditioned on an employee's abandoning rights guaranteed by the Act. Additionally, while called as a witness, Spruill never explained why he resigned rather than accept the Little Rock-Memphis run. Thus, there is no evidence that it was foreseeable that Spruill would resign rather than accept the Little Rock-Memphis run. Cf. Sure-Tan, Inc. v. NLRB, 467 U.S. 883, 895 (1984); Maxi City Deli, 282 NLRB 742 (1987). We conclude that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when it accepted Spruill's resignation and we will dismiss that part of the complaint.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Delete paragraph 5 and substitute the following.

"5. Respondent did not cause the termination of line driver Dennis Spruill in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER[5]

The Respondent, Red Arrow Freight Lines, Inc., Little Rock, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Prohibiting employees from discussing the Union at times when they are not actually working.

(b) Laying off or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their activity on behalf of Teamsters Local 878 or any other labor organization.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Perry Wayne Middlebrook immediate and full reinstatement to his former job of the little Rock-Memphis run, but specifically to the position he would be holding absent the discrimination against him, revoking, if necessary, any conflicting assignments to other drivers or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Make whole, with interest, Perry Wayne Middlebrook for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner described in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful layoff and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the layoff will not be used against him in any way.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its facilities located in Little Rock, Arkansas, and Dallas and McAllen, Texas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order that steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[5] The General counsel requests a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

We amend the judge's Order and notice to employees to conform to our decision, correct certain inadvertent errors, and more closely address the violations found.

Because Perry Wayne Middlebrook has consulted the bulletin boards in the McAllen and Dallas, Texas terminals, the Respondent shall post the notice to employees at those terminals, plus its Little Rock, Arkansas location, the location where Middlebrook was working when he was laid off. Contrary to the judge, however, we find no reason to order posting at the Respondent's San Antonio general office because no affected employees are assigned there and no unfair labor practices occurred there.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United Stated Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the NationalLabor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT prohibit you from discussing the Union at times when you are not actually working.

WE WILL NOT lay you off or otherwise discriminate against you because you assist Teamsters Local 878 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Perry Wayne Middlebrook immediate and full reinstatement to his former job of the Little Rock-Memphis run, but specifically to the position he would be holding absent the discrimination against him revoking, if necessary, any conflicting assignments to other drivers or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL make Perry Wayne Middlebrook whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the discrimination against him.

WE WILL notify Perry Wayne Middlebrook that we have removed from our files any reference to his layoff and that the layoff will not be used against him in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. We are here because Red Arrow Freight Lines laid off line driver Perry Wayne Middlebrook effective 9 November 1986 and terminated line driver Dennis Spruill 10 days later. The principal question is whether the General Counsel established a prima facie case. Answering that question yes, I find that Red Arrow and the Union of Transportation Employees conspired to lay off Middlebrook in order to remove his Teamsters union influence at Red Arrow's Little Rock, Arkansas terminal, and that the "domino" effect of Middlebrook's layoff resulted in the constructive discharge of Spruill. As alleged, I find that Red Arrow violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by the layoff and constructive discharge. I order Red Arrow tc offer Middlebrook and Spruill reinstatement to the jobs they would be holding absent the discrimination against them, revoking, if necessary, interim assignments made to other drivers.

This case was tried before me in Little Rock, Arkansas, on 29–30 April 1987 pursuant to the 6 March 1987 complaint issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 26 of the Board. The complaint, subsequently amended, is based on a charge filed 27 January 1987 by Perry Wayne Middlebrook (Middlebrook) against Red Arrow Freight Lines, Inc. (Respondent or Red Arrow). Middlebrook filed a first amended charge on 25 March 1987.[1]

In the complaint, as amended before and at the hearing, the General Counsel alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by promulgating and maintaining, since 1 October 1986, an overly broad no-union talk on company time, and since 20 April 1987, a rule prohibiting the posting of written material on company property or bulletin boards without the permission of management.

The complaint also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act on 6 November 1986 by laying off Middlebrook, and on 15 November 1986 by assigning Dennis Spruill to drive the Little Rock to Memphis run, and on 19 November 1986 by constructively discharging Spruill.[2]

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent took these actions in order to discourage its employees from supporting or joining the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

By its answer Respondent admits certain factual matters but denies violating the Act.

The General Counsel and the Respondent filed posthearing briefs. Attached to the General Counsel's brief are a proposed order and a proposed notice to employees. Thereafter the General Counsel submitted a 24 June 1987 motion to strike portions of Respondent's brief or, in the alternative, "a motion [for leave] to file as a 3-page reply brief." Respondent also submitted a motion for leave to file its eight-page reply brief, dated 25 June 1987. The motions for leave to file are granted and as appears later, I have considered the motions and all briefs. Fruehauf Corp., 274 NLRB 403, ALJD fn. 2 (1985). As discussed in a moment, I grant the General Counsel's motion to strike in a limited respect.

[1] This manner of setting forth dates complies with the wishes of the Board.

[2] All dates are for 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

Accompanying the General Counsel's brief was a motion to correct three misspellings on four pages of the transcript. That unopposed motion to correct is granted.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Red Arrow is an interstate common carrier of freight by motor vehicle. It has its headquarters (general office) in San Antonio, Texas (1:102; G.C. Exh. 4 at 1).[3] A Texas corporation, Red Arrow also has offices or terminals in various cities in Arkansas, Texas, and Oklahoma, including Dallas, Houston, and McAllen, Texas. Respondent has been a wholly owned subsidiary of Carolina Freight Corporation since January 1984 (G.C. Exh. 4 at 1). The terminal involved here is the one at Little Rock, Arkansas. As stipulated by the parties, Respondent opened its Little Rock terminal in July 1986 (G.C. Exh. 3, No. 1).

The pleadings establish that Respondent, during the 12 months ending in July 1987, will have derived gross revenue exceeding $50,000 in the operation of its interstate business from the Little Rock terminal. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits by the pleadings, and I find, that International Brotherhood of Teamsters (International Teamsters) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

At the hearing Respondent, in answer to an amended pleading, admitted, and I find, that Teamsters Local 878 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act (1:189–190; G.C. Exh. 15).

The parties stipulated, and I find, that the Union of Transportation Employees (UTE) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act (1:12).

III. THE ALLGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Overview

The General Counsel's theory on the principal issue is that Red Arrow unlawfully laid off Middlebrook on 5 November (effective 9 November) when it assertedly discovered he was assisting the Little Rock employees to join Teamsters Local Union 878. Middlebrook's layoff had a "domino effect" on other Red Arrow drivers, and this domino effect caused Respondent to terminate Dennis Spruill on 19 November (1:14–15, opening statement, and 1:196).

Respondent's countering position is that it laid off Middlebrook solely because it agreed with the UTE's interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement that Middlebrook improperly was recalled in October from layoff and awarded the Little Rock position. Middlebrook's recall assertedly violated the contract's seniority provisions. When the UTE pointed out the discrepancy to Respondent, Red Arrow had no choice but to return Middlebrook to layoff status (1:15–19, opening statement).

The General Counsel concedes that the case as to Spruill stands or falls with that of Middlebrook (1:208–209). Red Arrow argues that Spruill's case should be dismissed even if merit is found to Middlebrook's case for the reason that Spruill refused an assignment to the Little Rock-Memphis run and either quit or was terminated over that superseding event (Br. at 50).

B. Background

Since the 1950s Red Arrow and the UTE have had a bargaining relationship (1:41–42). With a term effective from 15 March 1985 through 15 March 1988, the current collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) provides in the first sentence of section 1 of the article on recognition (R. Exh. 3 at 1, art. 1):

> The COMPANY acknowledges the UNION as the exclusive bargaining agent for employees in the following classifications: (1) Line Drivers, (2) Checkers, Pickup and Delivery Drivers, Forklift Operators, Non-Drivers, and Part-Time Employees in this classification, (3) Mechanics, Servicemen, and Part-Time Servicemen.

Joseph M. Chandler Jr., Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, explained that in some other companies the line drivers are called over-the-road drivers and the pickup and delivery drivers are known as city drivers (1:31–32). The latter sometimes are referred to in the record as local drivers or terminal drivers (1:94, 252).

Respondent opened its Little Rock terminal on 21 July 1986 (G.C. Exh. 3). The terminal manager has been Alan Penfield (1:60). In its 25 February 1987 position letter to NLRB Region 26, submitted during the Region's investigation of Middlebrook's charge, Respondent asserts that it and the UTE have interpreted the contractual recognition clause as extending to all terminals owned by Red Arrow, and that it has been their practice to treat new terminals as "accretions to the contractually established bargaining unit." (G.C. Exh. 4 at 3.) The 13-page position letter is signed by Respondent's counsel and verified by Chandler as "true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief." (G.C. Exh. 4.)

Middlebrook's original charge alleged assistance to the UTE at Little Rock in violation of Section 8(a)(2) of the Act. Respondent's position letter defends on several grounds including accretion and majority status, and that, in any event, the 27 January 1987 charge is time-barred under Section 10(b) of the Act. The first amended charge omits the 8(a)(2) allegation, and the complaint contains no such allegation.

[3] References to the two-volume transcript of testimony are by volume and page.

As we shall see, Chandler testified that he was unconcerned about the Little Rock employees signing cards for the Teamsters because he viewed the Little Rock terminal as immune from such organizing under the Board's contract-bar rule (1:27, 43). That, in turn, is based on the accretion argument.

Much of Respondent's position about accretion, and its argument on brief, is based on a lengthy treatment of the accretion matter in the 25 February 1987 position letter (G.C. Exh. 4) that Respondent submitted to NLRB Board Region 26 during the investigation of the charge filed in this case. None of the witnesses testified about accretion.

By his motion dated 24 June 1987, counsel for the General Counsel moved to strike those portions of Respondent's brief relying on General Counsel's Exhibit 4 (Respondent's 25 February 1987 position letter) or, in the alternative, moved (for leave) to file his three-page document as a reply brief on the accretion matter. The basis of the General Counsel's motion to strike is that Respondent's position letter (G.C. Exh. 4) was offered by the General Counsel, and received in evidence, for the limited purpose of showing inconsistencies between factual statements in that document and Respondent's evidence at the hearing (1:73, 76). Respondent's reliance, as to accretion, on the detailed statements (facts and argument) in its 25 February position letter is improper, the General Counsel argues, because the statements (the factual ones, at least) are hearsay. I agree, and I grant the General Counsel's motion to strike those references, which appear at pages 9, 10, and 42 of Respondent's brief, to the extent Respondent relies on them to establish the truth of the facts asserted.

I shall consider Respondent's accretion contention for the limited purpose of its argument that Red Arrow was unconcerned about the Teamsters' organizing at Little Rock because of the theory of contract bar. After all, Chandler testified, that was why he was not upset about the contents of Terminal Manager Penfield's Halloween report to Chandler, and why Chandler considered the matter a "non-event." (1:27, 43.) Chandler's testimony about contract bar also is reflected in a 12 November letter from Respondent's law firm denying the Teamsters' 4 November demand for recognition (R. Exh. 7). For this limited purpose, therefore, the accretion contention expressed in Respondent's 25 February 1987 position letter to NLRB Region 26, although it expands on Chandler's contract-bar testimony, adds nothing to the substantive evidence. Accordingly, I also accept the General Counsel's document as a reply brief. I shall return to the accretion subject later.

Larry D. Wright, a business representative for the UTE, testified that in August, shortly after the Little Rock terminal opened, he visited with the newly hired employees, distributed copies of the CBA, and said he would not sign them as members until they had completed their probationary period of 90 days (2:298–299). Although placing the event in September, local driver Roy Jackson confirms the substance of Wright's testimony (1:175, 177). He recalls that UTE President Jeff Saari accompanied Wright. Jackson also testified that when Penfield hired him in August, Penfield showed him the UTE contract, stated that it covered Jackson, and stated that the new employees could sign union cards after their 90-day probationary period expired (1:176).

In several ways Respondent distinguishes between its local and line drivers. One of the pertinent distinguishing features is the different supervisory chain. The local drivers and other terminal employees at Little Rock are under the supervision of Terminal Manager Penfield who in turn reports to Charles Schmidt, vice president of operations (1:63, 70). Schmidt apparently works at Respondent's San Antonio headquarters. Penfield has no authority over the line drivers (2:302–303).

The line haul drivers are under the general direction of Michael D. Rhodes, manager of line haul operations, who works in Respondent's Dallas office. Reporting to Rhodes are several line haul supervisors and dispatchers (1:44, 61, 216–217). Vice President Chandler testified that Respondent has some 139 drivers currently on the seniority list (1:31), and the 14 January 1986 seniority list (R. Exh. 6 at 10–13) names some 161 line drivers. The January 1986 seniority list is the one the parties relied on during the events giving rise to this case.

Another relevant distinction between the local drivers and the line drivers exists under Red Arrow's seniority system. Consistent with the three classification groups in the unit description, the seniority list is divided into those three groups (R. Exh. 6). Line Haul Manager Rhodes confirms this (1:223–224).

Rhodes also testified that although the line drivers have one seniority list for the entire Red Arrow System, the city (local) drivers have location seniority as well as systemwide seniority (1:227, 243, 255). The easiest way to describe or explain the line haul seniority system, Rhodes testified, is that the entire line constitutes one terminal (1:257).

Middlebrook's home is in Mission, 6 miles from Respondent's terminal at McAllen in the Valley area of south Texas (1:82–83, 89, 121). He went to work for Respondent at the McAllen terminal on 17 July 1984 as a part-time city driver. That work, which included breaking and loading freight, proved too much an aggravation on one of his legs which had been wounded while he was serving in the U.S. Marine Corps in Vietnam (1:83–84, 123). Consequently, in April 1985 Middlebrook transferred to the line driver classification working out of the Dallas office while living in Mission, Texas (1:84–85).

By memo dated 22 September 1986 Line Haul Supervisor Claudie Marsh informed Middlebrook that because of "slack business" he was being laid off "effective September 26, 1986." (G.C. Exh. 14.) Marsh concludes the memo by advising Middlebrook that when and if conditions permit, "you will be recalled from layoff." Although the memo had been mailed to Mission, Marsh gave Middlebrook a copy on Thursday, 25 September (1:85).

C. Perry Wayne Middlebrook

1. Middlebrook's Little Rock grievance

During the initial months after opening its Little Rock terminal, Red Arrow used its city, or local, drivers at Little Rock to make daily roundtrips to Memphis, Tennessee (1:85, 218; G.C. Exh. 3, No. 2). It appears that Respondent has a related company with a terminal in Memphis (G.C. Exh. 4 at 10). Because Respondent uses the Memphis terminal as an agent only, Red Arrow does not assign drivers there (1:85). The one-way distance between the terminals is about 140 miles (1:86). Article 54, section 3 of the CBA allows Red Arrow to use city drivers for runs within a 65-mile radius of origin (R. Exh. 3 at 126).

Facing imminent layoff, and apparently aware that Respondent was using city drivers for the line haul between Little Rock and Memphis, Middlebrook went to UTE President Jeff Saari on Friday morning, 26 September, to file a grievance.[4] Pointing out that he was entering layoff status that very day, Middlebrook asked Saari whether he would be able to bid on the Little Rock to Memphis run if the grievance proved successful and Red Arrow posted the run for bid. Saari said yes, adding that in a similar situation in 1974 he had successfully bid on a run even though employee Robert Rancher (apparently with more seniority) was still in layoff status (1:85-86, 139-140). Business Representative Larry D. Wright testified that Saari has told him the same story (2:284-285). Although Saari's bid was under a prior contract, there is no evidence that the current contractual provisions were not the same then.

Saari had a grievance typed on the spot (G.C. Exh. 7), Middlebrook and Business Representative Doug Deere signed it, and that very morning, 26 September, Deere and Middlebrook presented the grievance to Rhodes (1:87).

Middlebrook returned to his home in Mission. Every week he would go to the McAllen terminal and check the bulletin board. Middlebrook's grievance was successful, for on 9 October Red Arrow posted ("bulletined") the Little Rock-Memphis run for bid (G.C. Exh. 3a at 2; 1:219, Rhodes). Middlebrook saw the posting and submitted his bid (1:89, 149).

Rhodes testified that Middlebrook was the only employee to bid for the Little Rock-Memphis run (1:220). According to Rhodes, Middlebrook's bid while in layoff status concerned Rhodes. There were other drivers on layoff who were senior to Middlebrook (1:220-221). Rhodes testified that he telephoned Vice President Chandler for clarification. Chandler informed Rhodes that Middlebrook would be the successful bidder because the other and more senior drivers in layoff status did not bid (1:226-228, 253-254).

When the posting period expired, Red Arrow, on 16 October, assigned the Little Rock-Memphis run to Middlebrook effective Sunday, 19 October (G.C. Exh. 3b). Checking the bulletin board at the McAllen terminal, Middlebrook learned that he had been the successful bidder. On Saturday morning, 18 October, he left Mission for Little Rock. Middlebrook stopped at Dallas to make certain he had not been bumped. When Supervisor Marsh said that as far as he could ascertain Middlebrook had not been bumped, Middlebrook continued on to Little Rock where he drove the Little Rock-Memphis run for several days until Rhodes, as we shall see, laid him off effective Sunday, 9 November, "due to business conditions." (1:90-94).

2. Middlebrook and Teamsters Local 878

Although a member of the UTE (1:120, 155), Middlebrook favors the Teamsters and has held a Teamsters card (1:123). He credibly testified that UTE President Jeff Saari and Business Representative Larry Wright have held several discussions on the topic in the past and that Saari and Wright are well aware of his preference and of his reasons (1:122).

After arriving in Little Rock Middlebrook discovered that the city drivers were uninformed about Red Arrow's systemwide bidding procedure and unaware they could be bumped from Little Rock and have to take a position at some other terminal in Red Arrow's system. Since they had not signed with the UTE, Middlebrook suggested that they sign with the Teamsters. Because the city drivers feared they could be bumped to another city under the UTE contract, they told Middlebrook to contact the Teamsters (1:94-95, 171).

Middlebrook contacted B. J. Alexander, an assistant business agent for Teamsters Local 878. Later Middlebrook was assisted in his organizing efforts by Jim DeNote, a line driver working from the pool board out of Dallas (1:96-97, 158). According to plan, on Friday, 31 October, B. J. Alexander arrived on Respondent's parking lot about 25 feet from the terminal. The time was about 6:30 p.m. Alexander began conversing with Middlebrook and the drivers who signed Teamsters cards on the spot. Two of the four or five city drivers present at the time were part-time drivers (1:97-101, 158-160).

Middlebrook observed Terminal Manager Penfield come to the door and look out during the card signing. City driver Roy Jackson was the last to arrive and sign, around 7 p.m. All the drivers, a total of seven or eight, signed cards for Alexander on that occasion (1:100-102, 172). Penfield denies observing any organizing effort (1:62), although he does not deny seeing Middlebrook and Alexander on the parking lot about 25 feet from the building.

After Jackson had signed, Penfield came out and introduced himself to Alexander in Middlebrook's presence. Alexander introduced himself, stated he had all the employees signed, and that he was demanding recognition of the Teamsters. Penfield said he had no authority to grant it. Alexander asked for the names of Respondent's president and vice president so he could correctly address a certified letter, but Penfield, saying he had to call San Antonio, went inside the terminal. Middlebrook sifted through some papers he had in his car, found the San Antonio address, and furnished that to Alexander along with the names of President Ray Powell, Vice [4] The layoff was "effective September 26, 1986." Middlebrook interpreted the time to mean at the beginning of 26 September (1:88-89).

President Charles Schmidt, and Vice President Joseph Chandler Jr. (1:102–105, Middlebrook; 160–161, Alexander).

Penfield denies ever speaking with Alexander, and contends that he learned of the card signing only when driver Jackson came in and told him (1:61–62).

Jackson testified that after he signed a card he went inside the terminal and informed Penfield that 100 percent of the (city) drivers had signed cards for the Teamsters. Jackson decided to inform Penfield because he was concerned about (losing) his job (1:173). Penfield confirms that Jackson did come to report this information (1:61–62, 67–68).

Penfield testified unfavorably and I do not credit him. Crediting the General Counsel's witnesses, I find that Penfield did look out, observed the card signing, and eventually came out and spoke with Alexander.

Aside from Penfield's possibly associating Middlebrook with the Teamsters' efforts by virtue of Middlebrook's presence with the group, there is no evidence showing exactly how Penfield gained knowledge that Middlebrook was involved in the Teamsters' soliciting of the city drivers on company premises. Nevertheless the record establishes that Penfield did reach that conclusion. Thus, during the investigation of Middlebrook's charge by NLRB Region 26, Respondent submitted a lengthy position letter dated 25 February 1987 (G.C. Exh. 4). The letter is from Respondent's attorneys, and Chandler signed a verification statement attached to the letter. At page 12 of the letter Respondent addresses an allegation that Penfield, in early November, announced a rule prohibiting union talk on company time and premises. The position statement continues (G.C. Exh. 4 at 12):

> In early November, when Mr. Middlebrook and a Teamster representative began soliciting the pickup and delivery drivers on Company premises . . . .

At the hearing Chandler sought to disavow this by saying he did not gather the information and he had no knowledge that Middlebrook was soliciting for the Teamsters (1:42, 45). I do not credit Chandler.

Jackson testified that after he made his report of the card signing to Penfield, Penfield called San Antonio to obtain the telephone number of Respondent's labor relations person (Chandler). When Penfield placed his next call (to Chandler), Jackson stepped out to the dock and performed some work. When Jackson returned, a few minutes later Penfield was completing a call. On hanging up, Penfield told Jackson not to talk about any union activities on company time, that Red Arrow recognized the UTE until the contract expired in March 1988, and that (in the meantime) Respondent would not recognize any other union, and not to be surprised if the UTE came to Little Rock and talked to the employees (1:173–175). Penfield does not deny Jackson's description. The admonishment not to talk about any union activities on company time is the subject of complaint paragraph 8, discussed later.

Middlebrook testified that after searching through a briefcase at his car, and after furnishing the names and San Antonio address to Alexander, he went inside the terminal (1:105). On arriving at the terminal office, Middlebrook saw Penfield hanging up his telephone. Middlebrook asked what the "G/O" (the San Antonio general office, apparently) had to say. "Joe Chandler hit the ceiling," Penfield replied. Middlebrook asked if there was anything else, and Penfield replied no. Middlebrook then left (1:105–106). Penfield denies talking with Middlebrook after having the telephone conversation with Chandler, and denies saying, "Joe Chandler hit the ceiling." (2:304.)

Neither Jackson nor Middlebrook testified about seeing the other at Penfield's office when Penfield hung up the telephone. Respondent contends that this reflects a discrepancy in their testimony on a material point (Br. at 16). The evidence is ambiguous, for it is quite possible that Jackson, who had been working in the terminal for an unspecified time, returned to the office after Middlebrook had come and gone. The call Penfield was completing is not shown to be the call Penfield completed with Chandler when Middlebrook arrived in the office. Accordingly, I find no discrepancy between the accounts of Middlebrook and Jackson.

Penfield testified that when he reached Chandler, at the latter's home, the evening of 31 October, he told Chandler that he had been informed his Little Rock drivers had signed Teamsters cards. Chandler said not to worry about it because the employees were represented by the UTE, and to tell Jackson not to worry about it. Penfield denies that Chandler was upset (1:64–65, 68). Within the next day or two Penfield reached his superior, Vice President Schmidt, who instructed him not to accept any package from a Teamsters representative and not to accept any registered mail (1:69–70).

Chandler testified that on 31 October he had left work early to go Halloween trick-or-treating with his children. That evening he received a call from Penfield advising that the Little Rock employees had signed cards for the Teamsters. Chandler assured Penfield that his concern was unfounded because the Little Rock employees were represented by the UTE. Denying that he was upset at Penfield's report, Chandler concedes he was somewhat upset that Penfield persisted in talking when Chandler had things to do of more importance to him. Chandler considered the matter a "non event," and when the call ended Chandler went trick-or-treating with his children. He denies that Penfield mentioned Middlebrook's name (1:25, 27, 42–43).

Penfield concedes that at 9 a.m. on Monday, 3 November, he assembled his employees on the dock and told them there must be no union "business" on company time (1:63).[5] Middlebrook's Memphis run was from 11 p.m. to 5:30 a.m. and Penfield did not see him until later that day when he gave him the same admonition (1:63, 68).

[5] Penfield's actual testimony is that the dock meeting occurred the "next day" after Jackson informed him about the union organizing. Because the next day was a Saturday, and because the terminal employees work Monday through Friday (1:70), I find that Penfield meant Monday, 3 November.

Because Penfield's admissions about his statements to employees are directly related to complaint paragraph 7, which attacks a no-solicitation rule, I shall postpone further discussion of Penfield's admonition until I cover that allegation.

On Monday, 3 November, Teamsters Representative Alexander telephoned Respondent's San Antonio office attempting to reach President Ray Powell. Because Powell was unavailable, Alexander testified, he spoke with Chandler and demanded recognition for the Little Rock employees. According to Alexander, Chandler said he would give Powell the message. In his pretrial affidavit of 6 February 1987, however, Alexander merely states that he identified himself and left someone, unidentified, a call-back message with a "company official" for Powell to call. "I don't recall" the official's name "right now" Alexander wrote in his affidavit. By the time of the hearing, however, his memory was jogged and he remembered that it was Chandler (1:161–162, 165–168, 170).

Chandler denies having any conversation with Alexander (1:28; 2:307). Chandler's explanation offered in support of his denial is significant because of the contrast with his asserted response when Penfield called the evening of 31 October. Thus (2:307):

> Q. Why are you certain that the conversation with Mr. Alexander never took place?
> A. If any representative of any labor organization contacted me, and demanded recognition, we would have, one, had a very lengthy conversation, explaining our address, our legal representatives, the address of our legal representatives, and how to address mail to us.
> It would have been an extremely important conversation that I would have, one, remembered, and, two, I would have been required to report to my superiors. [Emphasis added.]

Continuing with his answer, Chandler describes returning from lunch one day and finding a note that a Teamsters representative had called and left a call-back message for anyone at Red Arrow. Chandler testified he threw the message in the trash without returning the call (2:308).

By letter dated 4 November and addressed to Ray Powell, Teamsters Local 878, by President Billy Patrick, demanded recognition of Respondent's Little Rock employees in a unit of "all checkers, drivers, and warehouse employees," excluding guards, statutory supervisors, and all others (G.C. Exh. 11). Patrick advised that a majority of the unit had designated Local 878, and offered to have a card check by a neutral person in order to verify majority status. Alexander testified that Patrick signs all demand letters (1:163).

Responding through its attorney by letter dated 12 November, Red Arrow advised the Teamsters of Respondent's CBA with the UTE and cited the Board's contract-bar rule (R. Exh. 7). Chandler testified that the Teamsters never replied (2:309). Alexander testified, in effect, that Teamsters 878 dropped the matter when Alexander learned that a UTE representative had come to Little Rock in early November, met with the employees, and persuaded them to sign UTE cards (1:164).

Apparently at some time during the day on Wednesday, 5 November, a UTE form notice to members (G.C. Exh. 8) was posted above the timeclock announcing a meeting for that night at 7:30. Middlebrook, a member of the UTE, was not informed of the meeting and did not see the posted notice until he came to the terminal at 10 p.m. in preparation for his usual night run to Memphis (1:106–107).

UTE Business Representative Larry D. Wright met with the Little Rock employees the evening of 5 November, and all the employees signed UTE cards (2:293). Jackson testified that, just as Terminal Manager Penfield had predicted, the UTE came to Little Rock the following week (the week following Halloween) and signed up the employees (1:175). Middlebrook testified that driver Jim Lyons told him all the employees had signed with the UTE (1:108).

3. Middlebrook laid off 9 November 1986

a. The layoff

When Middlebrook came to work Wednesday night, 5 November, there was a note for him to see Penfield the next morning. Middlebrook returned from Memphis about 5:30 a.m. on 6 November and waited for Penfield who arrived about 7:45 a.m. Penfield gave Middlebrook an envelope containing a message on a computer printout (1:106–109). The message, dated 5 November and from Michael Rhodes, has for its subject reference, "Layoff," and reads (G.C. Exh. 3c):

> Effective Nov. 9, 1986 you are hereby placed on layoff status due to business conditions.
> You have certain rights available to you including the option to pull extra run[s] if you notify this office in writing.
> When and if business conditions permit you will be recalled from layoff.

Middlebrook asked Penfield why, but the terminal manager referred him to Rhodes' message. Penfield testified that his total involvement in Middlebrook's layoff was delivering Rhodes' message to Middlebrook (2:303). Penfield complied with Middlebrook's request to call Rhodes so Middlebrook could talk to Rhodes (1:109).

When Penfield handed the telephone to him, Middlebrook asked Rhodes why he was being laid off. Rhodes said the reason was on the notice. To Middlebrook's inquiry about the (Memphis) run Rhodes replied, "Well, it's covered." Middlebrook responded that he could cover the run as an unassigned driver until the run was posted and rebid. Rhodes said that was unnecessary for he already had the run covered. Middlebrook said he would file a grievance. "Go ahead, but I doubt if you'll win it," replied Rhodes (1:110, 143, 151).

On hanging up the telephone, Middlebrook asked Penfield what had gone wrong, that there had been a UTE meeting the day before without notice to him. Middlebrook asked what Powell, Schmidt, or Chandler had to say about the Teamsters. Penfield replied that Powell was (had been) at a meeting elsewhere and that Penfield could not elaborate on what Vice President Schmidt said. Chandler, Penfield reported, said that the UTE is the union for Red Arrow at this time. Penfield added, "I got my wrist slapped," that he was not going to get it slapped again, and that he did not want to hear any more about the matter (1:110–111).

Middlebrook testified that the layoff notice about "business conditions" was the only reason he was ever given by Red Arrow (1:113). As we see in a moment, Supervisor Steve Ellis suggested a specific reason to Middlebrook.

Rhodes, Respondent's manager of line haul operations, testified that he used the phrase "business conditions" in Middlebrook's layoff notice because that is the language in article 66, section 1 of the contract (1:232–233). The provisions of article 6 are pertinent and they read (R. Exh. 3 at 151–152):

> ### ARTICLE 66
> ### REDUCTION IN FORCES
> Section 1. Any reduction in forces due to slack business or insufficient work will be in accordance with seniority rights.
> The COMPANY will notify employees at least four (4) work days in advance of being laid off. If the layoff is due to an official request by the UNION to cut the board, or due to the bidding process outlined in Article 53, Section 2(d), the four (4) day notice is not required.
> Section 2. Line employees on layoff may work unassigned at their home terminal. They will not be called to work until all available assigned pool men have been used. If more than one laid off employee is used, they will be offered the remaining loads in seniority order.
> Employees on layoff have the option to either accept or reject extra work. Therefore, employees on layoff must notify the COMPANY in writing that he will or will not be available for extra work.
> Section 3. Line employees on layoff status may be used as outlined above. It is understood, however, that if his pay is as much as thirty-five (35) hours per week, at the prevailing hourly rate of pay, for two (2) consecutive weeks, such employee will be returned to regular status. If more than one employee is on layoff, the senior employee will be returned to regular status.

Because of his relatively low seniority, Middlebrook has been laid off or bumped on more than one occasion (1:150; 2:321). On two of these occasions, the layoff notices based the layoff on a "decline in business" (G.C. Exh. 17; layoff effective 1 March 1985) and "due to slack business" (G.C. Exh. 14; layoff effective 26 September 1986). That is to say, an actual condition of slack business or insufficient work, the ground specified in article 66, existed.

Here, by contrast, there was no decline in business as far as the Memphis run is concerned. As we see later in more detail, Respondent had trouble finding a driver for the Memphis run. Rhodes concedes that since Middlebrook's layoff Respondent has been forced to assign junior drivers to the Little Rock-Memphis run, and that each one gets out of the assignment after a short period of time (1:249). Moreover, Respondent has added a second Memphis run, this one beginning at 10 a.m. Middlebrook testified that he was not recalled from layoff for the second run, or any other run (1:117).

Some hint as to why drivers do not want the Little Rock to Memphis run lies in Middlebrook's testimony that the short 280-mile roundtrip yields little profit. Indeed, Middlebrook could survive on it only because his mother lives in little Rock and he apparently lived with her to save on expenses when he was in Little Rock (1:86). Too, it would seem that the line drivers (apparently all from Texas) would dislike having to work away from home for long periods of time. Finally, the run is at night (11 p.m. to about 5:30 a.m.), although runs elsewhere may also be all-night trips.

On Saturday, 8 November, as Middlebrook was traveling from Little Rock to his home in south Texas, he stopped at Respondent's Dallas office to see if he could get some clarification about his layoff. From one of the offices there he spoke by telephone with Steve Ellis, a stipulated supervisor[6] (1:57). Ellis framed the bottom line succinctly when Middlebrook asked about bidding on other runs (1:115): "While you're on layoff you can't bid." As we shall see, however, Ellis' "law" is flawed.

b. UTE representatives meet with Rhodes

From the bottom-line rule Supervisor Ellis enunciated for Middlebrook on 8 November, we must travel backwards a few days to see how Red Arrow developed the rule that Ellis expressed to Middlebrook. Unfortunately, the description of events is rather tedious.

Previously, I mentioned the asserted concern by Rhodes when Middlebrook, in October (following his grievance), bid on the Little Rock-Memphis run while Middlebrook was in layoff status. Rhodes telephoned Chandler who advised Rhodes that Middlebrook would be the successful bidder, even though junior to others on layoff, if no one else bid. No one else bid, and Middlebrook was assigned to the run.

According to UTE Business Representative Larry Wright, in early November UTE President Jeff Saari told him that two Houston employees in layoff status had called to protest the awarding of the Little Rock-Memphis run to Middlebrook. The two employees, William J. Walker and Robert B. Sharp, supposedly complained that they had seniority over Middlebrook (2:268–270, 272).

After discussing the matter, Saari and Jackson concluded that Respondent had erred in assigning the Little Rock-Memphis run to Middlebrook because Walker and Sharp, also in layoff status, had seniority over Middlebrook (2:270). In fact, Walker and Sharp were working under the shop classification in Houston while on layoff from their line driver classification. But they had the right to bump back into the line driver classification

[6] Middlebrook described Ellis as his immediate supervisor (1:145).

(1:290, 297, Jackson). The seniority provisions of the contract appear in article 13. Section 8 provides that each of the four classifications (the fourth classification being for part-time employees) shall have its own seniority roster (R. Exh. 3 at 32). Seniority is defined as being "system-wide" under section 1 of article 13.

That same day (about Monday, 3 November, apparently) Saari and Jackson telephoned Rhodes, informed him of their conclusion, and arranged to meet with him. The next day the three met in the office of Rhodes in Dallas (1:228, 2:271–273, 285). Rhodes dates the meeting as being around 4 or 5 November (1:228). Jackson dates the meeting as being the day after the call to Rhodes (2:272–273, 285–286) and 1 or 2 days before his 5 November meeting with the Little Rock employees (2:291–292). It appears that the meeting with Rhodes occurred on either Monday or Tuesday, 3 or 4 November. Assuming that the version of these witnesses is credited, the meeting most likely occurred on 4 November with the telephone call to Rhodes having been made on Monday, 3 November. (As we shall see, I find that it was Rhodes who called the UTE representatives.)

At the 4 November meeting the three (Rhodes, Saari, and Jackson) discussed the situation and the provisions of the CBA. As Jackson and Saari earlier had done, the three concluded that the assignment to Middlebrook was improper (1:229–230, 251, Rhodes). Jackson testified that Rhodes realized an error had been made after the UTE representatives had pointed out the contract article (2:295). Wright asked Rhodes to revoke the assignment and return Middlebrook to layoff and to fill the position from unassigned drivers (1:229; 2:286). As a result of the discussion, Rhodes testified he sent the layoff notice (quoted earlier) to Middlebrook (1:231).

When asked whether he was aware that Middlebrook was attempting to organize the local drivers in Little Rock, Rhodes testified, "I don't believe so." He denies that either Penfield or Chandler told him before Middlebrook's layoff. Conceding that at some point he heard something about it, he thinks that knowledge came at a later date, but he does not know when it was or who told him (1:230–231, 245). Later in his testimony, Rhodes was more positive that when he laid off Middlebrook he was not aware of any such activity by Middlebrook and, in answer to a leading question of whether the decision to lay off Middlebrook was "strictly the result of interpretation and application of the collective-bargaining agreement" responded, "Yes, it was." (1:251.)

Saari did not testify. Jackson testified that nothing was said in the meeting with Rhodes that Middlebrook had been organizing for the Teamsters. Rhodes confirms this, although his first answer is that nothing was said "to the best of my knowledge." (1:230, 257.) According to Wright, he was not told of Middlebrook's organizing activities until he arrived at Little Rock on 5 November and the employees there informed him (3:287–288, 295, 301).

Chandler testified that he had no role in Middlebrook's layoff, was not consulted about it, and made no recommendation concerning Middlebrook's layoff (1:29, 33, 43, 58). According to Chandler, when Penfield called him on 31 October he made no reference to Middlebrook, and as of Middlebrook's layoff Chandler had no knowledge that Middlebrook was involved in union organizing activities (1:27, 42, 45). Before that layoff, Chandler testified, he had no discussion with Rhodes that Middlebrook was involved in union activities (1:45).

Penfield's professed unawareness of any union activities has been mentioned (1:62–63). He likewise testified that he played no part in the decision to lay off Middlebrook from the Little Rock position, and merely served to deliver the layoff message from Rhodes (2:303). Before that time, Penfield testified, he had not discussed Middlebrook's union activities with Rhodes or any other company official because he was not aware of such activity (2:303, 304, 305).

Although Jackson testified that, as of the 4 November meeting with Rhodes, he was aware only of two senior employees (Walker and Sharp) being skipped (2:277), Rhodes testified as if he, on 4 November, became aware that a total of four had been skipped (1:236, 239). Indeed, Rhodes apparently was aware of all four in mid-October, for that was the reason he assertedly consulted Chandler in mid-October before awarding the run to Middlebrook (1:225–226).

Rhodes identified them from the 14 January seniority list (R. Exh. 6 at 12) as all being on layoff at the relevant time (1:225–226). I list the names below. Their positions on the seniority list (for line drivers) appear among the 161 names (my count) on the list as follows. Because Spruill also figures later in the testimony I show him also.

Name	Seniority Date	Location	Position
Dennis L. Spruill	11-5-84	Dallas	141
Edward J. Blaschke	3-11-85	Houston	142
Joe A. Johnson	3-11-85	Houston	143
William J. Walker	3-11-85	Houston	144
Robert B. Sharp	3-11-85	Houston	145
Perry W. Middlebrook	4-22-85	Fort Worth	146

c. Respondent's basis for the layoff

As earlier noted, Rhodes testified that he based his decision to lay off Middlebrook strictly on his interpretation (shared by the UTE) and application of the CBA (1:251). According to Rhodes, revoking the assignment earlier made to Middlebrook had the effect of protecting seniority rights (1:238).

Because the arguments expressed by the UTE, and particularly by Wright, to Rhodes on 4 November persuaded Rhodes, I shall cover the essence of Wright's description of his presentation. Wright contended that Respondent's assignment of the Little Rock-Memphis run to Middlebrook violated the seniority concept set forth in article 13, section 4, of the CBA (1:273, 275). The first paragraph of section 1 is the one in issue. As corrected by Wright at the hearing, that paragraph reads (R. Exh. 3 at 30):

> Section 4. The rights of seniority shall be recognized in all seniority groups or classifications with respect to runs or job assignments, and in all cases of reduction of forces or recalls to service Layoffs will be made in seniority order at each terminal affected provided bids are not received from a senior laid-off employee from another terminal. The exception to this is outlined in Article 13, Section 5 (System wide bid time).

As the foregoing appears in the printed booklet, the first two sentences above appear as one sentence, for there is no period between "service" and "Layoffs." Wright testified that the absence of a period was an error (2:273-274).

When Wright and Saari complained to Rhodes that the Middlebrook assignment violated the fundamental concept of seniority written into the contract, Rhodes asked how he could get someone else to take the run when only Middlebrook had bid on it (1:255). Wright responded (2:276-280, 286-287), and Rhodes concurred (1:255-257), that Red Arrow had the contractual right under article 53, section 2(d) and section 4 (clarifications), to assign unassigned drivers, in reverse seniority order, to any run on which no bids are received (R. Exh. 3 at 118, 123).

If there are no unassigned drivers, Respondent then could turn to drivers on layoff, recall the most senior, and assign him to the Little Rock-Memphis run. According to both Rhodes (1:241) and Wright (2:278-280), both Respondent and the UTE have always interpreted article 53, section 4 (R. Exh. 3 at 123) as effecting an automatic termination of any driver refusing to accept an assignment. In other words, Rhodes testified, a driver has no choice once an assignment is made (1:241).

Wright urged Rhodes to use these provisions to force a driver, through the seniority system, to take the Little Rock-Memphis run (2:276, 287). Rhodes confirms that Wright proposed that Middlebrook be returned to layoff status and the other sections used to force a driver to take the Little Rock-Memphis run (1:229, 255). As we have seen, Rhodes, acting to implement the conclusions he reached with Wright and Saari on 4 November, the very next day sent a computer message to Middlebrook notifying him he was laid off effective 9 November. Rather than informing Middlebrook his earlier assignment had been made in violation of seniority, Rhodes used some of the language of article 66 which covers layoffs "due to slack business or insufficient work."

Wright describes Middlebrook's October bid as "illegal" (2:276). He testified that it is not proper for an employee on layoff, junior to one or more other employees on layoff, to bid for and receive a posted position (2:284). By contrast, the senior laid-off employee may bid for a new position that is posted (2:284). The later statement clearly complies with article 13, section 5 of the CBA which provides for just that. Thus, the terse rule Supervisor Ellis expressed to Middlebrook on Saturday, 8 November, is misleading.

The pertinent clause in article 13, section 5, reads (R. Exh. 3 at 31): "Employees on layoff may, in addition to bidding on bulletined positions, express a preference to remain on layoff at their home terminal."

No provision in the contract states that Respondent is prohibited from accepting a bid from a junior driver on layoff, and assigning a posted run to that junior driver, when there are senior drivers on layoff who have not bid. Wright testified, however, that "several years ago" (predating the current contract, presumably) some city employees were laid off. (Wright did not specify the city.) The senior employees were able to find jobs with other employers during their layoff from Red Arrow. Some of the junior employees were able to work a few hours a day at the Red Arrow terminal. When some permanent jobs were posted for bid, the junior employees bid because they had seen the posting. The senior employees apparently were unaware of the posting. Wright testified that the junior employees were not permitted to get the positions and that Red Arrow had to recall the senior employees (2:284).

By contrast, Wright concedes that UTE President Jeff Saari has told him that Saari himself, in 1974, was recalled from layoff (2:285). And recall Middlebrook's testimony that Saari, in September, assured Middlebrook he could bid from layoff on the Little Rock-Memphis run because he had done so in 1974 some 30 days before Robert Rancher, a senior employee, was recalled from layoff (1:86, 140).

Thus, the evidence as to past practice is limited and conflicting. Although the earlier events occurred under a prior CBA there is no evidence that the relevant language of the early contract was different from that of the current CBA on this point. Neither side objected to the evidence offered by the other on this issue (such as to possible hearsay), and the evidence is part of the record. Even so, I note that the evidence is not well developed. No documentary records were offered, and neither was the language from the earlier contract, In any event, neither party knew of a past practice example which had occurred during the term of the current CBA.

After Middlebrook was notified of his layoff, Respondent on 6 November reposted ("bulletined") the Little Rock-Memphis run for bidding (G.C. Exh. 3d; 1:233, Rhodes). Again Middlebrook bid, and again he was the only driver who did so (1:233-234). Treating Middlebrook's bid as invalid, Respondent, on 14 November, assigned the run to Dennis Spruill effective 15 November because Spruill was the least senior unassigned driver (G.C. Exh. 3e; 1:233-235).

With four drivers senior to Middlebrook on layoff status from their line driver positions, Rhodes testified he felt he would violate the seniority rights of the four if he assigned the run to Middlebrook (1:236). Asked how he would be violating the seniority rights of the four when none had submitted a bid, Rhodes testified that under the contract an employee who is laid off for a period of 9 months forfeits all seniority rights (1:237-238). Wright also relies on this provision (2:286-283). The relevant contract section (from art. 13, Seniority) reads:

> Section 5. Employees laid off due to a reduction in forces, if not recalled to service within nine (9) > months and not having performed service with their COMPANY and will forfeit all seniority rights.

But it is undisputed that the four senior employees who did not bid (Blaschke, Johnson, Walker, and Sharp) had bumped back and were working in the shop at Respondent's Houston terminal while on layoff from their line driver classifications (1:129, 136; 2:290, 297).

It is theoretically possible that one or more of the four senior Houston employees orally grieved to his supervisor, in the presence of a union representative as the contract specifies (R. Exh. 3 at 17) in article 8, section 4, step 1 (2:290). Wright does not know whether that procedure was followed. He testified that UTE President Saari received a call from Walker and Sharp in Houston complaining about the October assignment to Middlebrook and calling for the error to be corrected (2:268, 287).[7] Saari apparently told the two that the UTE would get the matter resolved (2:287). In any event, Wright testified that neither Walker nor Sharp (nor either of the other two) filed a written grievance (2:287), and Rhodes testified that he never received a grievance on the matter (1:245).

As I have described, Line Haul Manager Rhodes and UTE Representative Wright deny there was any discussion at the 4 November meeting in Rhodes' office of Middlebrook's organizing on behalf of the Teamsters. They also testified that as of their 4 November meeting in Dallas they knew nothing of Middlebrook's union activities.

Before resolving the issue of knowledge, I need to summarize some of the evidence also relating to driver Dennis Spruill. A portion of Spruill's testimony bears on the question of Respondent's knowledge as to Middlebrook.

d. Dennis Spruill's testimony bearing on the question of knowledge

Dennis Spruill testified that he was hired 1 October 1984 (1:180). As previously noted, the seniority list discloses the date to be a month later on 5 November.

Spruill testified that he was informed on "the 24th" (of October 1986, presumably) that he was being bumped effective "the 27th" from the Oklahoma City terminal (1:180). That left him in the unassigned driver status. No month or year is given for his bumping and the full, correct date does not appear elsewhere in the record. No documentary evidence was introduced covering the point. October 27, 1986, was a Monday. According to Spruill, on "the 27th" he was in the Dallas terminal checking the seniority roster to see where he might be able to get an assignment. He observed that only Middlebrook, who had the Little Rock-Memphis assignment, had less seniority. Supervisor Claudie Marsh told Spruill that he could not bump Middlebrook because the Little Rock terminal was supposed to be negotiating a deal whereby the Little Rock terminal would change unions and go with the Teamsters (1:180–181).

The testimony by Spruill concerning Marsh's remark about the Teamsters and the Little Rock terminal is significant. If Supervisor Marsh in fact said what Spruill attributes to him, then it adds some force to the General Counsel's contention that Vice President Chandler gave more importance to Penfield's call of 31 October than Chandler would have us believe. There is, however, a discrepancy in the dates in that Spruill dates Marsh's comment 4 days before B. J. Alexander signed the Little Rock employees.

On Thursday of the same week (30 October, presumably) Spruill again was in the Dallas terminal. Supervisor Steve Ellis asked why Spruill did not bump Middlebrook. Because, answered Spruill, Supervisor Marsh had said he could not do so. Ellis assured Spruill he could do so because Middlebrook was still an employee of Red Arrow. Spruill, however, decided not to bump Middlebrook and thereafter Spruill continued in his unassigned status. The following week (beginning Monday, 3 November) Spruill remained off for vacation. Although he was on vacation, Spruill was called to take a run (a single trip, apparently) to Jackson (state not given). The week following that (presumably beginning 10 November) he received no notice, sat at home all week waiting for a call, and did not check a bulletin board 1:181, 187).

On Sunday, 16 November, Supervisor Steve Ellis called Spruill at 4 p.m. and asked if Spruill was going to cover the Little Rock-Memphis run scheduled to leave Little Rock in 2 hours. Spruill was at his home in Irving, near Dallas (1:181, 182). As it happens, on Friday, 14 November, Respondent had, posted an assignment of Spruill to the Little Rock-Memphis run (effective Saturday, 15 November (G.C. Exh. 3e; 1:181, 185, 187). Of course, Spruill was unable to accept the assignment and this led to his separation from employment. I discuss later Spruill's separation from employment. Before passing on Spruill's testimony about Marsh's remark regarding the Teamsters, I should observe that a portion of Wright's testimony could be construed as suggesting that Spruill was laid off automatically on the sixth day after he was bumped.

Respondent points (Br. at 49) to Wright's testimony that an unassigned driver has only 5 days to exercise his right to bump a less senior driver. If he fails to exercise his seniority right to bump, he is laid off (2:277). Presumably Wright was referring to the following two paragraphs of article 53, Bulletins and Assignments, section 2 (R. Exh. 3 at 118):

> A senior employee has the right to bump a junior employee whenever he loses his run through no fault of his own provided these rights are exercised within five (5) days, excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, of the time he loses his assigned run.
> If a man has no seniority, or is bumped, or loses his run through no fault of his own, he will be allowed to run off the Pool Board in any terminal where a vacancy exists and is in the process of being bid in. If no vacancy exists, he will be placed on layoff status and used as outlined in Article 66.

---

[7] Over the General Counsel's hearsay objection, I received Wright's description for the limited purpose offered—to show course of events, the basis for the action the UTE thereafter took (2:268–269).

Wright's description is misleading, for unassigned drivers are not automatically laid off if they do not exercise their bumping rights within 5 days. Under article 53, sections 2 and 4, bumped drivers become relief drivers who make runs from the pool board in any terminal where there is a vacancy on the pool board open for bid. If no vacancy exists, and only then, a bumped driver is laid off (R. Exh. 3 at 118-119, 123).

We still are left with the discrepancy in dates. A discrepancy exists, in my opinion, because it is unlikely there was talk at Red Arrow in Dallas or San Antonio about the Teamsters before B. J. Alexander signed the Little Rock drivers on 31 October (a Friday) and Penfield, that same evening, telephonically reported the card signing to Vice President Chandler.

Several possibilities exist. First, Spruill's account is false either because he incorrectly thought Ellis made the remark about the Teamsters or because Spruill is lying. If I credit Spruill as to the remark, then I must find Spruill off on his dates. The latter seems possible since the seniority list shows that Spruill recalled his hiring date as being a month before it actually was. Perhaps Spruill, in a similar fashion, placed his conversation with Marsh as being a week earlier than it actually was (assuming he is correct regarding the date he was bumped). That would Place Spruill in the terminal on Monday, 3 November. But that is the week he set aside for vacation even though he did accept a trip that week to a city named Jackson.

Spruill testified in a persuasive fashion. Crediting Spruill, I find that Marsh remarked about the Teamsters as Spruill described. Because of the uncertainty of the timeframe, however, I decline to attach any weight to the evidence.

4. Credibility resolved and conclusions reached

a. Some evidentiary and procedural rules

To establish a prima facie case that Respondent unlawfully laid off Middlebrook, the General Counsel must show both knowledge (of Middlebrook's activity on behalf of the Teamsters) and motivation (that the intent to lay him off because of those union activities was a moving factor in the layoff decision).

As I discuss the evidence and resolve credibility, it will be well to keep in mind that these preliminary findings eventually must satisfy certain evidentiary and procedural rules bearing on the question of whether the General Counsel carried the Government's burden of establishing a prima facie case.

The first rule is an evidentiary one: Disbelief of a negative (a denial does not establish a positive. That is, the General Counsel must carry the Government's burden of proof as to knowledge (an element of the General Counsel's prima facie case) with affirmative evidence. Success in persuading an administrative law judge to disbelieve the adversary's denial and to find the opposite to be true does not equal the necessary affirmative evidence. Garrett Flexible Products, 270 NLRB 1147, 1148 (1984); McCormick & Co., 254 NLRB 922 (1981); Council of Bagel & Bialy Bakeries, 175 NLRB 901, 903 (1969); Roper Corp. v. NLRB, 712 F.2d 306, 310, (7th Cir. 1983).

Quoting from an earlier case, the court in Roper explained that the reason for the rule is clear, for if the rule were otherwise "a case could be made for any proposition in the world by the simple process of calling one's adversary and arguing to the jury that he was not to be believed." Roper, id.

The opinions in Dyer v. MacDougall, 201 F.2d 265 (2d Cir. 1952) (majority opinion by Judge Learned Hand; concurring opinion by Judge Jerome Frank) apparently suggest that the rule does not apply to bench trials or, if so, not invariably. Judge Frank expressly stated he opposed any such invariable rule. Judge Frank would allow a plaintiff to win based solely on disbelief of the defendant when otherwise the plaintiff would suffer a "grave injustice." 201 F.2d at 272. If the Board views the rule as being something less than absolute, however, it has not said so.

Second, the Board also has enunciated a related procedural rule regarding the General Counsel's burden to establish a prima facie case in motivation cases. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980). The sufficiency of the General Counsel's prima facie case is tested as of the close of the General Counsel's case-in-chief. Esco Elevators, 271 NLRB 1262, 1268 (1984); Hillside Bus Corp., 262 NLRB 1254 (1982).

Thus, even though a respondent proceeds with its own case-in-chief (usually after its motion to dismiss has been overruled), the Government's prima facie case must appear in the evidence it adduced during the General Counsel's case-in-chief. The General Counsel cannot reach into the Respondent's case-in-chief and rely on evidence adduced there, even during cross-examination, to supply one or more vital elements of the Government's prima facie case.[8] By proceeding with its defense, a respondent does not waive this requirement.[9]

A different result prevails in Federal court trials of discrimination cases. When a defendant there elects to proceed, the trier of fact must consider all the evidence in rendering a decision. Postal Service Board of Governors v. Aikens, 460 U.S. 711, 31 FEP Cases 609 (1983). The Board has not indicated whether it views Aikens as applying to unfair labor practice trials under the Act.

When the General Counsel rested the Government's case-in-chief here, Red Arrow moved for dismissal on the ground the General Counsel had failed to establish, (1) knowledge as to Middlebrook, a vital element in the Government's prima facie case, and (2) a showing of protected conduct by Spruill. I denied the motion and Respondent elected to proceed with its evidence (1:193-

[8] Under Board law in motivation cases, therefore, admissions made during the Respondent's case-in-chief are unavailable to assist the General Counsel in establishing a prima facie case. Of course, if the General Counsel's evidence establishes a prima facie case, then Respondent's admissions during its case-in-chief are activated and reinforce the Government's case.

[9] In nonmotivation cases resolution of whether a respondent has waived its right to insist that the General Counsel establish a prima facie case may depend on whether the respondent moved to dismiss the complaint when the General Counsel rests at the close of the Government's case-in-chief. Under Sec. 102.41 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, a respondent does not waive its objections by proceeding.

215). By electing to proceed with its own case-in-chief, Red Arrow did not waive its motion to dismiss.

In short, in assessing whether the General Counsel established a prima facie case here, I must view the Government's evidence in isolation, apart from Red Arrow's proffered defense. Esco Elevators and Hillside Bus, supra. Even though the General Counsel, under Federal Rules of Evidence 611(c), called adverse party witnesses as part of the Government's case-in-chief here, and even though I disbelieve them and find the truth to be that which they deny, my discrediting of them and finding the opposite to be true does not qualify as the affirmative evidence the General Counsel must adduce in order to carry the Government's burden of establishing a prima facie case by a preponderance of the evidence. Roper, supra.

Of course, distinguish an admission by a 611(c) witness from an administrative law judge's disbelief of a denial by such witness. An admission is positive evidence, but disbelief of a negative, even when the opposite is found to be true, still leaves a negative. Finding the opposite of a respondent's denial to be true means simply that the administrative law judge credits the Government's affirmative (positive) evidence and inferences reasonably drawn from such evidence.

b. Credibility findings and preliminary conclusions

(1) Knowledge

First, Perry W. Middlebrook, B. J. Alexander, and Roy Jackson testified persuasively, and I credit them. In contrast, Vice President Joseph Chandler, Little Rock Terminal Manager Alan Penfield, Line Haul Manager Michael D. Rhodes, and UTE Business Representative Larry D. Wright testified in an unpersuasive fashion and I do not credit any of the four on disputed matters.

The General Counsel's direct evidence of knowledge by Respondent of Middlebrook's link to the Teamsters, while not strong, is established. When Penfield observed his drivers signing cards for B. J. Alexander, he also, I find, saw Middlebrook standing there with them. That evening Penfield, I find, reported his observations—including that of Middlebrook's presence with the group—to Vice President Chandler.

As reported by Penfield through Middlebrook, Chandler "hit the ceiling." Chandler's agitation was caused, I find, not by any irritation with Penfield's timing or persistence in reporting, but with the facts Penfield reported. That does not mean Chandler's ire necessarily focused on Middlebrook.

Also on 31 October, however, Penfield instructed city driver Roy Jackson not to engage in union activities on "company time." On the next business day, Monday, 3 November, Penfield instructed all his city drivers, plus Middlebrook, that they were not to conduct "union business" on company time.

Although the foregoing falls short of indicating that Penfield viewed Middlebrook as having participated in the organizing, Respondent's position letter by 25 February 1987, quoted earlier, states differently. Chandler, as previously mentioned, disavows that portion of the position letter. I do not credit Chandler.

Observing each of Respondent's witnesses testify,[10] I was struck by the untruthfulness I saw in their demeanor. Judge Joseph A. Wapner of television's The People's Court describes it this way in an interview given to Michael Ryan which appears in the 5 July 1987 issue of Parade Magazine at 8, 9, They Tell It To This Judge On TV:

> What I like about running a court is seeing people, analyzing them to see if they're telling the truth, if they're in this for greed or have an honest claim. Sometimes you have documentary proof and prior statements. Sometimes it gets down to a gut feeling; you look at the demeanor of a person. Sometimes you have to distinguish between people who are nervous because they are in court and people who are nervous because they are lying. Sometimes you tell by looking in their eyes.

I strongly disbelieve Respondent's witnesses, and I find the truth to be that which they deny. Penfield knew. So did the others. But my finding of knowledge does not rest on my disbelief of Respondent's witnesses. First, there is Chandler's "hit the ceiling" reaction on receiving Penfield's report—a report which included Middlebrook's name. Second, there is Respondent's 25 February 1987 admission that Middlebrook was assisting Alexander with the soliciting on 31 October.

Prima facie, therefore, at least Penfield and Chandler were aware of Middlebrook's involvement in the soliciting of Teamsters cards on 31 October. Aside from the General Counsel's argument that such should suffice to impute knowledge to Respondent, we come now to the point raised by Respondent's counsel (1:194; Br. at 36-41) that Penfield's knowledge, even if established, is not shown to have been communicated to Michael Rhodes, the official who made the decision to lay off Middlebrook. As counsel stated during his argument supporting the motion to dismiss (1:194):

> Now, in this case, the evidence reveals that Terminal Manager Alan Penfield apparently had some knowledge of Mr. Middlebrook's organizing activities, but there is not a scintilla of evidence that this knowledge was communicated to Mr. Rhodes.

First, Rhodes admits hearing about Middlebrook's organizing activities, but he "believes" the report (from someone he no longer recalls) came at a later date (1:230-231, 245, 251). I disbelieve his denial as to the timing, and I find that he knew before he decided to lay off Middlebrook. But how did he learn? That is to say, did he in fact learn? Aside from his admission of knowledge gained later (which I find was gained before Middlebrook's layoff), or imputing Penfield and Chandler's knowledge to Rhodes (as the General Counsel argues should be done, Br. at 19-20), there is no direct evidence showing how Rhodes learned. Of course, showing the "how" is relevant only in determining whether he learned, for if in fact he knew then the question of how he learned is immaterial.

[10] My reference to "Respondent's witnesses" is a shorthand way of naming Chandler, Penfield, Rhodes, and Wright. Two of them, Chandler and Penfield, were called by the General Counsel during the Government's case-in-chief under Fed. R. Evid. 611(c), and the bulk of their testimony was given at that time.

In accordance with Chandler's testimony that he would consider a call from a union representative demanding recognition as extremely important, and a call that he would report to his superior (2:307), I find that no later than early Monday, 3 November, Chandler relayed Penfield's report to his own superior. Penfield's report, I find, included a conclusion that Middlebrook was assisting the Teamsters representative in organizing.

It requires no stretching of reality to find, as I do, that on 3 November the information Chandler reported to his superior (unidentified in the record) was relayed to Rhodes, the person over Middlebrook and all line drivers.

The General Counsel argues, and Respondent denies, there is ample evidence which circumstantially shows that Rhodes was aware of Middlebrook's activities for the Teamsters when Rhodes decided at the meeting of 4 November to lay off Middlebrook. Discussion of the circumstantial evidence carries us into treatment of the reasons advanced for Middlebrook's layoff on 9 November. However, it is settled that the same set of circumstances may be relied on to support both an inference of knowledge and an inference of discrimination. Abbey's Transportation Service, 284 NLRB 696 (1987); A. J. Ross Logistics, 283 NLRB 410 (1987).

(2) Motivation

The General Counsel lists several items as demonstrating unlawful motive.

TIMING. Certainly the timing factor is significant if it were not for the matter of the UTE representatives. Saari and Wright protested on behalf of the laid-off employees (of whom Saari assertedly named Walker and Sharp). Rhodes, as I have found, learned on 3 November of Middlebrook's activity at Little Rock on behalf of the Teamsters. A day later, 4 November, Rhodes met with Saari and Wright and jointly decided that Red Arrow had erred by permitting Middlebrook, a laid-off employee, to bid successfully on the Little Rock-Memphis run. Rhodes adopted Wright's suggestions: that Middlebrook's assignment be revoked, Middlebrook returned to layoff, the junior unassigned driver assigned to the run, and, if there were no unassigned drivers, the senior laid-off driver assigned to the run.

Did Walker and Sharp complain to Saari? None of those three testified. Wright dates their call to Saari as occurring, apparently, on Monday, 3 November, and Wright and Saari in turn called Rhodes the same day, setting up their meeting of 4 November (2:267–268, 272, 285). Is it sheer coincidence that Walker and Sharp waited over 2 weeks before calling Saari? If they were "upset" when they called, as Wright testified (2:268),[11] why did they wait over 2 weeks before registering their complaint? The line Marcellus spoke seems apropos: "Something is rotten in the state of Denmark." (Hamlet, I, iv, L. 90.)

In short, I find there was no call from Walker, Sharp, or from any laid-off employee. It never happened. It was a "non-event." Aside from my reliance on Wright's unfavorable demeanor, I find it implausible that Walker and Sharp, emotionally "upset," would wait 2 weeks before calling. I also note that none of the three (counting Saari) testified. As a practical matter it is unlikely either Walker or Sharp would complain. This is so because neither would want to place himself in the potential position of being forced to go to Little Rock—and that could happen if there were no unassigned drivers to take the Little Rock-Memphis run.

It is obvious none of the laid-off drivers wanted the run, and they declined to bid on it the repeated times, beginning in September, that Rhodes had to post it. Moreover, the four drivers senior to Middlebrook on layoff had no concern about the need to work for Red Arrow during the 9 months after their layoff—for they already were working in the shop at Houston! But if Walker and Sharp did not telephone Saari, what prompted Wright and Saari to call Rhodes?

What happened, I find, is that Rhodes (having been informed of events by communications within Respondent's management hierarchy) called Saari or Wright on 3 November and described Penfield's report that the Teamsters, assisted by line driver Middlebrook, had persuaded all the city drivers in Little Rock to sign cards for the Teamsters. Saari and Wright then arranged to meet with Rhodes the following day. Wright also arranged to hold a meeting with the Little Rock employees in Little Rock on 5 November. Middlebrook, of course, was not informed of that meeting even though he is a UTE member.

When Saari and Wright met with Rhodes on 4 November, the three discussed the situation for the express purpose of devising a plan for removing Middlebrook from Little Rock because of his influence with the employees there concerning the Teamsters. Wright suggested the revocation plan, Rhodes adopted it and prepared the layoff message that was sent and delivered to Middlebrook the following day. In short, I find that the three conspired to discriminate against Middlebrook because Middlebrook's efforts to persuade the Little Rock employees to join the Teamsters would create a headache for both Respondent and the UTE.

Respondent asserts that the conspiracy angle should carry no weight because the General Counsel did not issue a complaint against the UTE (Br. at 40). Why the General Counsel did not do so is not a matter I need resolve. So far as the record reflects, no charge was filed against the UTE and, of course, a complaint must be based on a charge.

Animus. The General Counsel also argues animus by pointing to Chandler's "hit the ceiling" reaction to the Halloween report from Penfield, plus the promulgation of an allegedly unlawful no-solicitation rule, inconsistencies in Chandler's testimony, and pretextual and shifting defenses. (Br. at 20.) I discuss the no-solicitation rule in a later section.

[11] The evidence was offered and received for the course of events and not for the truth. In the context of this analysis, however, Wright's assertion is part of the evidence to be reviewed for the purpose of resolving credibility.

Contending there is no showing of animus here, Respondent argues that it was unconcerned by the fact the Little Rock employees had signed Teamsters cards (Br. at 41–42). This contention is based on its belief that the Little Rock employees were covered by the UTE contract because it has been the practice of the parties, by their interpretation of the recognition clause of the CBA, to treat new terminals as accretions to the recognized bargaining unit. Respondent, through its attorneys, expressed this position in its letter of 12 November (R. Exh. 7) denying the Teamsters' demand for recognition, and Chandler expressed it at the hearing when he testified that he was unconcerned about Penfield's report of card signing at Little Rock because of the Board's contract bar doctrine. A "non-event" Chandler described the card signing (1:27, 43).

I need not explore the parties' legal debate over whether the Little Rock employees may be considered an accretion to the contractually established bargaining unit. That exercise is unnecessary for the simple reason I do not believe Chandler. As mentioned earlier, I find that Chandler was upset about the contents of Penfield's report. Even without speculating on Chandler's reasons, the signing by all employees undeniably meant that Respondent was faced with a problem, even though it might be one on which Respondent ultimately would prevail with its contract-bar argument. The problem was twofold. First, that all employees had signed meant the Teamsters would demand recognition, Respondent would have to respond to that, and possibly there would have to be litigation over it. Second, it meant a disruption, of unknown duration, of its apparently stable relationship with the UTE as to the Little Rock terminal. In short, the news Penfield conveyed to Chandler was not good, and it upset Chandler.

I find that Chandler viewed the Teamsters, and Middlebrook, as a disruptive influence for Red Arrow at Little Rock. I find that he conveyed all this to his superior (unidentified in the record) and that Respondent, through Rhodes, acted on this concern. Thus, animus is shown.

Shifting reasons. The General Counsel's shifting reasons argument is this. Respondent's termination notice of "business conditions" is an economic ground, but at the hearing Respondent advanced its assignment-by-mistake argument.

Responding to this in its 25 June 1987 reply brief, Respondent argues it has "never contended that Middlebrook's layoff was due to economic conditions." Respondent contends Rhodes picked the "business conditions" phrase as being similar to the language in article 66 of the CBA, and that the phrase is similar to the "slack business" or "decline in business" used in prior layoff notices (G.C. Exhs. 14, 17) to Middlebrook himself. The General Counsel points to the very same evidence in support of the Government's argument (Br. at 23).

Respondent's reply brief argument overlooks Rhodes' testimony (unsupported by any record evidence) the "workload" dictated that he lay off one driver (1:240). Indeed, in its posthearing brief Respondent points to this testimony of Rhodes in arguing that if Middlebrook had not been laid off then "Respondent would have been required to lay off one additional man based on workload requirements" (Br. at 45). But Respondent switches again in light of Supervisor Steve Ellis's statement to Middlebrook when Middlebrook stopped in Dallas en route to south Texas after his layoff (1:115): "While you're on layoff, you can't bid." Respondent argues that Ellis' statement gave Middlebrook the reason he had been laid off (Reply Br. at 2).

Although Rhodes' use of "business conditions" connotes an economic basis, as the General Counsel argues, I find that was not Respondent's intention. Recall that Rhodes' decision to revoke Middlebrook's assignment was, as I have found, the result of the 4 November conspiracy by Rhodes, Wright, and Saari to deprive Middlebrook of his statutory rights in order to get him out of Little Rock. No economic ground was needed for this. Instead, the contract could be interpreted in a way that would require the assignment revocation in the name of honoring the contractual principle of seniority.

Had Ellis been dictating the layoff notice to Middlebrook, perhaps the notice would have read differently. Rhodes, I find, chose the "business conditions" phrase not only because of its similarity to the article 66 language, but also because it is ambiguous enough to cover the contractual basis Respondent had jointly devised with the UTE. Rhodes gave unsupported testimony of a (business) need to lay off one driver. Rhodes testified with an unfavorable demeanor and I do not credit him.

Respondent appears to have shifted in relation to who initiated the contact between Rhodes and the UTE. In its 25 February 1987 position letter to NLRB Region 26, Respondent wrote that, shortly after the assignment to Middlebrook, Rhodes met with "UTE representatives and expressed his concern that the parties had violated the seniority provisions of the contract by accepting a bid from a less senior laid off employees." At this point (G.C. Exh. 4 at 10), Respondent inserts its footnote 6 reading:

> What called this to Mr. Rhodes attention was the fact that when Middlebrook was recalled, the Respondent, because of lack of available jobs would have been required to lay off one additional unassigned driver. The result would have been this individual, in addition to the three more senior employees already on layoff, each having more seniority than Middlebrook and being laid off while Middlebrook had an assigned position.

Respondent's February 1987 position letter implies that Rhodes initiated the contact with the UTE because Rhodes recognized, when Middlebrook was recalled, that the recall would overstaff the drivers by one. This supposed overstaffing attracted Rhodes' attention to Middlebrook's situation (G.C. Exh. 4 at 10 fn. 6). At the hearing Rhodes does not expressly state that the UTE initiated the contact, but he certainly implies the UTE did so when he testified that Wright asked him to explain how Middlebrook could be holding a bid position with senior drivers on layoff (1:228). Wright, called as a witness by Respondent, contends that it was he and Saari who called Rhodes (2:271–272, 285–286). At page 37 of its posthearing brief, Respondent acknowledges that the UTE initiated the contact.

Aside from the matter of Respondent's shifting positions, Rhodes' testimony, and Respondent's argument about a business need to lay off one driver is unpersuasive. Presumably the business need to lay off a driver did not exist in mid-October when Respondent posted the Little Rock-Memphis run for bid and awarded it to Middlebrook. Apparently the "need" developed after Middlebrook began working the run on 19 October.

Yet in their testimony about their 4 November meeting in Dallas, neither Rhodes nor Wright describes any mention of a business need to lay off one driver in Red Arrow's system. No business records or other evidence was offered to support Rhodes assertion of a "workload" need to lay off one driver. The "need" seems to have conveniently arisen after Penfield's Halloween report to Chandler.

As a witness before me, Rhodes testified in an incredible fashion and I do not credit him. Finding the business need to lay off one driver to be a hoax, I infer that Respondent chose to conceal an unlawful motive. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966).

(3) Contract interpretations

Before passing to other matters, I must discuss the parties' differing interpretations of article 13, section 5, of the CBA. The General Counsel argues that language there authorizes laid-off employees to bid on bulletined (posted) positions (Br. at 23). Respondent describes that interpretation as "the General Counsel's most glaring misconstruction of the contract between the parties." (Reply Br. at 3.) Respondent contends that the section pertains to the occasion when there is systemwide bidding. To evaluate these positions, section 5 must be quoted in its entirety (R. Exh. 3 at 30–31):

> Section 5. Employees laid off due to reduction in forces, if not recalled to service within nine (9) months and not having performed services to the COMPANY will be considered out of service with their COMPANY and will forfeit all seniority rights.
> Employees on layoff who fail to bid at system-wide bid time will be considered to have resigned their employment and will forfeit all seniority rights provided they have been properly notified as specified below.
> Employees on layoff may, in addition to bidding on bulletined positions, express a preference to remain on layoff at their home terminal. This preference will be expressed, in order, on the bid form at the time of bidding. If these employees are not assigned to more preferred positions, the bids will be set aside and the assignment of these employees will be made in the following manner.
> After all other assignments have been made, if open jobs still exist, these positions will be offered to this group in seniority order unless there are more such employees than there are jobs available. If there are more remaining employees than positions available, open jobs will be assigned in the following manner: All remaining employees will resubmit bids. They may express a preference to remain on layoff, however they must bid all open positions. Assignments will be made so that seniority is respected.
> Employees who refuse to accept assignment to an open position under the provisions of this section will be considered to have resigned their employment and will forfeit all seniority.

At page 32 of the contract appears two "clarifications" of section 5. The second clarification is the pertinent one, but they both read:

> CLARIFICATIONS
> Article 13, Section 5
> Not having performed services to the COMPANY means the last time employee actually punched the time clock.
> At system-wide bid time, employees on layoff will be sent a certified letter or handed a letter in the presence of a committeeman notifying them of the system-wide bids, and if such employee on layoff chooses not to exercise his seniority and bid on a job that his seniority will allow him to hold, then he will forfeit all of his seniority rights and be removed from the seniority roster.

The General Counsel's position is (1) the plain and unrestricted language of the third paragraph of article 13, section 5 states that employees may bid on bulletined positions; (2) under article 53, section 2, no distinction is made between employees and laid-off employees when a run is posted for bidding; (3) Chandler, Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, and the person who personally handles Respondent's labor relations (1:24), interpreted the contract as calling for Respondent to assign the run to Middlebrook even though he was on layoff since the drivers senior to him did not bid, and (4) the past practice. As to the past practice, I earlier found the evidence to be limited, conflicting, and of no help.

Respondent's argument is that the third paragraph of section 5 is a continuation of the second paragraph which sets forth procedures for laid-off employees bidding at systemwide bid time. There is no contention by the General Counsel that Middlebrook bid at systemwide bid time. Respondent writes further (Reply Br. at 4):

> It is interesting to note that at the hearing, the General Counsel did not proffer testimony from any witness that Article 13, section 5 stands for the proposition he is now asserting. Respondent did not offer testimony regarding that provision because it is irrelevant to the instant case.

Apparently because it deemed the language irrelevant, Respondent chose not to have Chandler, its vice president over labor relations, testify concerning his understanding of article 13, section 5. However, the record contains Chandler's interpretation (given before Penfield's Halloween report) by virtue of the testimony by Rhodes concerning his mid-October call to Chandler for Chandler's advice. On that occasion Chandler advised Rhodes that the Little Rock-Memphis assignment would go to Middlebrook because the senior drivers on layoff had not bid.

The General Counsel asked Chandler, while Chandler was testifying as a witness called under Federal Rules of Evidence 611(c), why Middlebrook was laid off. Chandler testified that Middlebrook was laid off when it was determined he had been recalled from layoff in violation of the seniority provisions of the contract. Chandler added that he played no role in the layoff and was not consulted about it (1:28-29, 43). I interpret Chandler's testimony to be his statement of Respondent's reason for Middlebrook's layoff. Chandler was not asked to give his understanding of article 13, section 5, or whether Respondent's reason for the layoff was, in his opinion, required by the CBA. When Chandler testified during Respondent's case-in-chief he was not asked about this subject.

(4) Conclusions

If I found it necessary to make a finding regarding the interpretation of article 13, section 5, I would adopt the General Counsel's reading. I would find that the systemwide bid time provisions of section 5 require a laid off employee to bid at that time, and that, under the third paragraph he may bid at other times. However, as the interpretation Respondent contends for on brief is not facially frivolous, I see no need to make a finding on the matter. This is so because even if Respondent's interpretation is viewed as possible, or even reasonable, I nevertheless find that Respondent devised it here solely for use as a pretext to remove Middlebrook from Little Rock in order to chill the organizing effort there by the Teamsters.

Although Wright was successful on 5 November in persuading the Little Rock employees to sign with the UTE, Rhodes, Wright, and Saari did not know in advance that would be the result of Wright's visit there. Nor could they anticipate that such signing would cause the Teamsters to abandon its organizing effort in Little Rock.

The General Counsel established a prima facie case regarding Middlebrook. I further find Respondent's evidence to be either false (such as a business need to lay off one driver) or fashioned as a pretext (such as its interpretation of the CBA) to justify laying off Middlebrook because of his activities for the Teamsters.

In conclusion, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when, effective 9 November 1986, it laid off Perry Wayne Middlebrook.

D. Dennis Spruill Terminated

1. Facts

On 6 November, after Middlebrook was notified of his layoff, Respondent posted the Little Rock-Memphis run for bidding (G.C. Exh. 3d). The only bid Respondent received was from Middlebrook. Respondent viewed Middlebrook's bid as invalid because the same set of circumstances prevailed which called for his layoff from the posted position (1:233-234, 246, Rhodes).

With no bids received other than Middlebrook's, which Respondent deemed to be invalid, Red Arrow assigned the Little Rock-Memphis run to Dennis Spruill, the junior unassigned driver (1:234-235, 239-240). Spruill had not bid on the position (1:239). Respondent notified Spruill of the assignment by virtue of a 14 November bulletin board announcement reflecting that the assignment was effective Saturday, 15 November (G.C. Exh. 3e). As previously discussed, Rhodes (1:235, 241, 256), Wright (2:278-280, 286-287), and Chandler (1:53) testified that a driver can be required, under article 53, section 4 of the CBA to take an assignment and if he refuses he can be terminated.

Sunday, 16 November, was the day Spruill was to begin the Little Rock-Memphis run (1:185). The 6 November posting sheet explains that the run begins Sunday night at "2300," or 11 p.m., and operates through the following Friday. Spruill testified that no one had called him the preceding week, that he had not checked the bulletin board, and that he had taken a personal trip that same weekend to Oklahoma City (1:181, 183, 187).

At 4 p.m. on Sunday, 16 November, Supervisor Steve Ellis called Spruill and asked him if he was going to cover his run. Sure, answered Spruill, where is it. Ellis said Spruill was scheduled to leave Little Rock at 6 p.m. for a Memphis "flip." Spruill told Ellis to protect his load (have another driver take it) for there was no way he could get from his home in Irving (Dallas) to Little Rock in 2 hours. Ellis told Spruill to call Rhodes the next day (1:182-183, 185, 187).

The following morning, Monday, 17 November, Spruill called Rhodes and reported the foregoing facts. According to Spruill, Rhodes said he would have to discipline him. Spruill replied Rhodes did not have to worry about any discipline, that he would simply resign. Rhodes said all night (1:182-183, 185-186, 187).

Spruill testified that after thinking over the matter the rest of the day he decided against resigning. It was too late that night to notify Rhodes of his change of mind, and Spruill never informed Rhodes thereafter (1:186). Had he not been assigned to the Little Rock-Memphis run, Spruill testified, he would not have resigned (1:187-188).

Rhodes denies there was any discussion of discipline. He testified he instructed Spruill to proceed that day to Little Rock to assume the run, but Spruill said he would quit before he would go to Little Rock. Rhodes asked Spruill to put his resignation in writing and Spruill said he would but never did (1:242, 248).

Not hearing from Spruill, Rhodes sent Spruill the following termination letter dated 19 November (1:242–243; G.C. Exh. 12):

> On Line Notice 58 dated November 14, 1986 you were assigned to run number 716–7161T. This run was assigned based on your failure to exercise a bid and you being the junior unassigned person in the system.
> On Sunday, November 16, 1986 you failed to report to pull the run. On Monday, November 17, 1986 you advised me via telephone you were resigning your position at the Red Arrow Freight Lines. To date you have failed to do so.
> Based on your actions, I find it necessary to terminate your employment with Red Arrow Freight Lines.

I credit Rhodes over Spruill in this matter. It seems strange that Spruill, if he is credited, apparently made no contact with Respondent's Dallas office during the next 2 or 3 days before he received Respondent's termination notice. Spruill's conduct in failing to call Rhodes, or to go check the bulletin board if he was interested in other runs, is more consistent with the version of Rhodes than with that given by Spruill.

2. Conclusions

Arguing that Middlebrook's layoff had a "domino effect" which resulted in Spruill's termination (1:14, 208), and citing Howard Johnson Co., 209 NLRB 1122 (1974), and the theory of "causally related," the General Counsel contends that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it terminated Spruill (Br. at 27–28).

As amended at the hearing (1:8), the complaint alleges that Respondent "caused" Spruill's 19 November termination by laying off Middlebrook and thereafter attempting to force Spruill to drive the Little Rock-Memphis run (G.C. Exh. 15; 2:263–264). The General Counsel's position is that because of the "domino effect" Spruill was constructively discharged (1:203, 211).

Describing the evidence as showing that the Respondent either terminated Spruill or caused his termination, the General Counsel, at the close of the hearing, moved to conform the pleadings (par. 9) to the proof. The General Counsel explained his theory as being either an outright discharge or a constructive discharge. Respondent objected, and I reserved ruling until this decision (2:330–332).

It is arguable the language alleged is broad enough to encompass both theories. Actual discharge appears not only closely connected to the allegation, but integrally related. In any event, the matter of discharge was fully litigated. I grant the General Counsel's motion to conform.

Respondent sees the initial issue as one of causation. Was Spruill's termination caused by Middlebrook's layoff or by Spruill's voluntary decision that he did not want the Little Rock run or his job with Respondent? Spruill's refusal and resignation, Respondent argues, combine to constitute a superseding or intervening cause of Spruill's termination. Respondent describes the General Counsel's "domino effect" theory as "murky reasoning unworthy of credence." (Br. at 50.)

The Board specifies two elements of a constructive discharge. First, the burdens imposed on the employee must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in the employee's working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force him to resign. Second, it must be shown that those burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities. Crystal Princeton Refining, 222 NLRB 1068 (1976).

Although one may initially think of the Crystal Princeton rule in connection with an employee assigned to perform unusually heavy, dirty, dangerous, or other physically unbearable work, the elements of Crystal Princeton are elastic enough to cover a variety of situations. For example, in Sure-Tan v. NLRB, 467 U.S. 883 (1984), the Supreme Court upheld the Board's findings that Sure-Tan had violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by constructively discharging its undocumented alien employees through reporting them to the Immigration and Naturalization Service in retaliation for their participating in union activities. See Sure-Tan, 277 NLRB 302 (1985).

The concept of a constructive discharge also includes an employer's presenting an employee with the "Hobson's choice" of conditioning employment on the employee's abandoning rights guaranteed by the Act. CER, 269 NLRB 1070, 1074 (5th Cir. 1984), enfd. 762 F.2d 482 (1985). The Hobson's choice concept goes at least as far back as the early case of Atlas Mills, 3 NLRB 10, 17 (1937).

Although the Hobson's choice cases frequently involve a choice between retaining a job with a firm which is converting to nonunion status, or leaving the job in order to remain union,[12] the concept recently was manifested in a mental anguish situation. Maxi City Deli, 282 NLRB 742 (1987). In Maxi City Deli the Board found a constructive discharge when an employee quit after becoming emotionally distraught when the employer threatened to expose her daughter's abortion if the employee mother did not cease her union activity.

Was Spruill's resignation a constructive discharge? Not in the usual sense. Although Middlebrook gave some testimony that most drivers would find the job assignment a difficult one on which to survive economically, we must recall that Respondent established the run in response to Middlebrook's grievance of September 1986. The UTE supported that grievance. As the record reflects, drivers can be forced to accept job assignments away from their homes. Spruill gave no testimony describing the run or explaining why he may not have wanted it. Thus, the evidence falls short of showing that the job entailed intolerable working conditions.

Was there a Hobson's choice? Again, not in the usual sense. The choice given did not involve relinquishing statutory rights, and there is no showing that the job assignment was intolerable.

As noted earlier, the General Counsel cites and relies, not on the Crystal Princeton line of cases, but on Howard Johnson Co., 209 NLRB 1122 (1974). Spruill resigned, but he did so because he was assigned to the Little Rock run which had been taken from Middlebrook. But for Middlebrook's illegal layoff, Respondent would not have assigned Spruill to the Little Rock-Memphis run.

[12] As in Watt Electric, 273 NLRB 655, 659 (1984).

Does Spruill's refusal and resignation, as Respondent argues, constitute a superseding cause? In Sure-Tan v. NLRB, supra, the Supreme Court rejected a similar argument. There Sure-Tan argued that it was the employee's status as illegal aliens that was the "proximate cause" of their deportation. The Supreme Court noted the administrative law judge's conclusion that, but for Sure-Tan's letter to the Immigration Service, the discriminatees would have continued to work indefinitely. 467 U.S. at 894-895.

Similarly, it is apparent here that but for Respondent's unlawfully laying off Middlebrook from the Little Rock-Memphis run, Respondent would not have assigned Spruill to that run, and Spruill would not have resigned or, as here, been terminated in the absence of submitting a written resignation. Thus, the General Counsel's "domino" theory of discrimination is established as, in effect, a constructive discharge. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it constructively discharged Dennis Spruill on 17 November 1986.

E. The No-Solicitation/No-Distribution Rules

1. The allegations

The complaint contains two allegations on the subject of no-solicitation. Because they are related I shall discuss them together.

As amended at the hearing, complaint paragraph 7 reads (G.C. Exh. 15):

> 7.
> (a) On or about October 1, 1986, by issuing a company policy manual, Respondent promulgated and since said date has maintained the following rule:
>> Solicitation is permitted only when (1) the product or service being sold is directly related to the business activity of the corporation, (2) the solicitation has been approved by the Executive Policy Committee, and (3) the solicitation does not interfere with the work schedule. All solicitation which does not meet all of these requirements is prohibited.
> (b) On or about April 20, 1987, by issuing a new company policy, Respondent promulgated and since said date has maintained the following rule:
>> The posting of any leaflets, notices, literature, or other material on Company property or bulletin boards without the permission of management is strictly prohibited.

Moments after he rested his case-in-chief, the General Counsel moved to add paragraph 7(b) to the complaint. Respondent objected on the basis the amendment was untimely, but it could point to no practical prejudice such as a need to call a witness not present. Overruling Respondent's objection, I granted the General Counsel's motion to reopen the Government's case and to amend the complaint (1:197-203). Mercury Marine, 282 NLRB 794 fn. 2 (1987).

Appearing in complaint paragraph 8, the second allegation reads:

> (a) In late October 1986 and early November 1986, the exact dates being unknown at this time, by verbal announcement, Respondent promulgated and since said date has maintained the following rule:
>> No union talk on company time.
> (b) Respondent promulgated and maintained the rule described above in paragraph 8(a) in order to discourage its employees from joining, supporting, or assisting the Union.

2. Discussion

Although literally accurate, the allegations of complaint paragraph 7 tend to mislead. This is so because the company policies were issued to supervision—not posted on a bulletin board for employees to read. Accordingly, I shall dismiss paragraph 7.

Respecting complaint paragraph 8, the evidence has been described earlier. Terminal Manager Penfield does not deny telling city driver Roy Jackson, the evening of 31 October, not to talk about any union activities on company time (1:175). Penfield admits telling his terminal employees, plus Middlebrook, on 3 November that they must not conduct any union business on company time (1:63, 68).

In its 25 February 1987 position letter to NLRB Region 26, Respondent wrote (G.C. Exh. 4 at 12):

> Finally, with respect to the Charging Party's allegations that Terminal Manager Alan Penfield announced, during the first week of November 1986, a rule prohibiting union talk on Company time, the Respondent would submit as Exhibit "4" a policy statement concerning solicitations while on Company time. This policy, effective since October 1, 1986, prohibits all solicitations on Company time and premises that do not meet the three requirements set forth therein. In early November, when Mr. Middlebrook and a Teamster representative began soliciting the pickup and delivery drivers on Company premises and during the employee's working hours Mr. Penfield (in accordance with this policy) informed the employees that there would be no union solicitations allowed on Company time and property. The same rules were in force at the time the UTE representative came to Little Rock to sign up the drivers and, as stated previously, the UTE conducted its membership activities during the employee's off duty hours and away from Company premises.

Penfield's instructions to Jackson and the other employees was overly broad (the distinction between union talk and union business is immaterial here). The reference to "company" time rather than to "working" time is a material distinction. The former term implies all the time an employee is "on the clock" (being paid) which normally includes breaktimes. Because breaktimes are employees' free time, in which they may discuss union activities or solicit their fellow employees to join or support a labor organization, Penfield's instructions violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Our Way, 268 NLRB 394 (1983); Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 fn. 1 (1981).

Citing decisions by the Board,[13] Respondent, however, contends it effectively disavowed Penfield's remarks when it posted the following notice to employees (R. Exh. 1b). The notice is dated "April 20,1987," but Penfield testified that he did not post it at the Little Rock terminal until a day or two later (1:66–67):

> NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
> The National Labor Relations Act gives employees these rights:
> To engage in self-organization
> To form, join or help unions
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing
> To act together for collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
> To refuse to do any of these things.
>
> Accordingly, we give you these assurances:
>
> WE WILL NOT do anything that interferes with, restrains or coerces you with respect to these rights.
>
> WE WILL NOT make, announce or enforce any rule which prohibits only union solicitations.
>
> WE WILL NOT issue any rule prohibiting solicitation without clearly telling employees when they may lawfully engage in such activities. All prior rules regarding solicitation are hereby rescinded.
> WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain or coerce you in the exercise of rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.
> /s/ Ray Powell
> Ray Powell
> President
> This notice will remain posted for 60 consecutive days from the date of posting and must not be altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

The General Counsel contends the disavowal is untimely under Passavant and, in any event, the violation was integrally related to Middlebrook's layoff (Br. at 31). Countering, Respondent argues the notice was timely because Respondent did not have notice its solicitation rules were being questioned until the complaint issued on 6 March 1987 (Reply Br. at 7). Respondent offers no explanation of the further delay of 6 weeks before the posting occurred even if some allowance is made for consultation with counsel. Of course, Respondent's argument in its reply brief overlooks its own position statement, submitted 25 February during the investigation of the charge. The relevant portion of that statement, quoted above, defends Penfield's remarks as being lawful.

I agree that Respondent's attempted repudiation is untimely. Moreover, I find that the notice fails to comply with the Passavant rule because it fails to be clear and "specific in nature to the coercive conduct." Penfield told employees they could not "talk" about union activities or engage in union "business" on company time. Rather than repudiating these statements in a manner which would leave employees with the clear understanding that they were free to engage in such conduct, Respondent loaded its notice with ambiguity and confusion about "solicitation." In one paragraph Respondent even implies that it legally may prohibit union solicitation as long as it also prohibits other types of solicitations. The sentence rescinding all prior rules about "solicitation" does not cure these defects. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's 20 April 1987 notice to employees fails to effectively repudiate Penfield's unlawful instructions to employees.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Red Arrow Freight Lines, Inc. is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. Each of the following is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act: (a) International Teamsters, (b) Teamsters Local 878, and (c) the UTE.
3. On 31 October and 3 November 1986 Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Alan Penfield, the terminal manager of Respondent's Little Rock, Arkansas terminal, instructed employees they were not to talk about union activities or engage in union business on company time.
4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it laid off line driver Perry Wayne Middlebrook effective 9 November 1986.
5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act regarding line driver Dennis Spruill (a) on 14 November 1986 by assigning Spruill to the Little Rock-Memphis run, and (b) on 17 November 1986 by constructively discharging Spruill.
6. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by adopting or maintaining no-solicitation/no-distribution policies which, even if unlawful if applied to employees, were communicated only to supervision.
7. The unfair labor practices found affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Respondent must:

(1) Offer Perry Wayne Middlebrook immediate and full reinstatement to his former job of the Little Rock-Memphis run, but specifically to the position he would be holding absent the discrimination against him revoking, if necessary, any conflicting assignments to other drivers or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(2) Offer Dennis Spruill immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of unassigned line driver, but specifically to the position he would be holding absent the discrimination against him revoking, if necessary, any conflicting assignments to other drivers or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(3) Make whole, with interest, Perry Wayne Middlebrook and Dennis Spruill for any loss of earnings and other benefits each may have suffered as a result of Respondent's discrimination against each. Backpay shall be computed in the manner established in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

(4) Expunge from its files any reference to its unlawful 9 November 1986 layoff of Perry Wayne Middlebrook and its 17 November 1986 constructive discharge of Dennis Spruill, and it must notify each in writing that this has been done and that evidence of such discrimination will not be used as a basis for further personnel action against him.

Because Perry Wayne Middlebrook consults Respondent's bulletin board at the McAllen, Texas terminal, and Dennis Spruill does the same at the Dallas, Texas terminal, I shall order Respondent to post the notice to employees at those terminals, plus its San Antonio, Texas general office, as well as its Little Rock, Arkansas location.

June 20, 1988

DECISION ON REVIEW

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On December 11, 1979, the Regional Director for Region 27 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in this proceeding. He found appropriate for collective bargaining the petitioned-for unit of registered nurses employed by the Employer at St. Luke's Hospital in Denver, Colorado. The Hospital is one of three facilities that comprise the Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center. In accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review. The Employer contended that the smallest appropriate unit was an all-professional unit, which included the employees at all three of its Denver-area hospitals, i.e., St. Luke's, Presbyterian Hospital in Denver, and Presbyterian Hospital in Aurora. By telegraphic order dated January 8, 1980, the Board denied the Employer's request for review.

An election was held, and the Petitioner was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative for the Employer's registered nurses at the St. Luke's facility on February 24, 1980.[1] Following the Employer's refusal to bargain, the Board found that the Employer had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, and issued a bargaining order.[2] On July 8, 1981, the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit denied enforcement of the Board's Order and remanded the case to the Board for further consideration.[3] On October 9, 1981, the Board accepted the court's decision as the law of the case.

On August 24, 1984, the Board remanded the case to the Regional Director for further consideration consistent with its decision in St. Francis Hospital, 271 NLRB 948 (1984) (St. Francis II). Pursuant to the remand, and after a hearing at which further evidence was taken, the Regional Director issued a Second Decision and Direction of Election on June 26, 1985. He found that an overall professional unit was the smallest appropriate unit. The unit included all professional employees (except physicians) at all three of the Employer's facilities. The Petitioner requested review of the decision regarding both issues, and the Board granted review on August 27, 1985.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case, including the Employer's brief on review, and has decided to affirm the Regional Director's determinations regarding the issues of unit scope and unit composition for the reasons stated in this decision.

In 1979, St. Luke's Hospital Association, which operated St. Luke's Hospital, and the Presbyterian Medical Center, which operated Presbyterian Hospital in Denver and Presbyterian Hospital in Aurora, merged and became Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center. Presbyterian Hospital is located 10 blocks from St. Luke's in Denver. Presbyterian Hospital in Aurora, an acute-care institution, is located about 12 miles from Denver.

In his Second Decision and Direction of Election, the Regional Director found that since the merger, a number of centralized policies have been implemented and others strengthened. A single board of directors was established with representatives from the former boards of both of the merged companies. Corporate offices are located in a separate building. Corporate officers include three vice presidents and an administrator for each hospital, who report to the president of the Medical Center. The corporate officers are responsible for the overall centralized management of the three facilities, including a centralized accounting system, budgeting and staffing decisions for each hospital, purchasing and distribution of supplies, and employee educational programs. The hospital administrators have no authority to change corporate policies or to deviate from determinations regarding wages, benefits, and staffing.

The Medical Center is surveyed, reviewed, and accredited as a single entity by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. The record shows that the three "campuses" are functionally integrated. The staff physicians have admitting privileges at all three facilities, and it is a common procedure for patients to be transferred among the hospitals for specialized care not available at the admitting hospital.

[1] An Intervenor on the ballot was the Colorado Nurses' Association, affiliate of the American Nurses' Association. The Intervenor has indicated that it would not participate in an election in an overall professional unit.

[2] Not reported in bound volumes of Board decisions.

[3] Specifically, the court held that the Board's application of the traditional presumption favoring single facility units failed to consider Congress' directive against unit proliferation in the health care industry. The court, therefore, held that in making unit scope determinations in the health care industry, the factors that the Board traditionally considers must be balanced against the public interest in preventing fragmentation. In this regard, the court directed the Board to specify the manner in which its unit determination implements or reflects Congress' admonition that due consideration be given to preventing proliferation. Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 450, 455 (10th Cir. 1981). Further, the court found sufficient evidence to sustain the appropriateness of an all professional unit, focusing on the disparity of interests between employee groups which would prohibit or impede fair representation of the employees' interests. Id. at 456.

289 NLRB No. 30

The Employer's human resources department is responsible for all the standardized personnel policies, including a systemwide employee handbook and a supervisor's manual; wage rates and fringe benefits; and disciplinary and grievance procedures. The Employer has uniform qualifications and hiring standards for jobs. Job openings are posted systemwide and seniority is accrued systemwide. A significant number of transfers have occurred since the merger, and employees of one facility have hiring preference at the other two facilities. We note, however, that the hiring of registered nurses continues to be done at each facility, and that the newspaper advertisements for Presbyterian Medical Center designate which campus or campuses have openings.

The record shows that all applicants for professional positions submit identical job applications, have the same orientation course, are subject to the same disciplinary procedure, and have the same grievance program. In addition, all professional employees have identical benefits, including extra vacation days and continuing education days, which are not extended to the nonprofessional employees. The professional employees, including the registered nurses, are among the Employer's highest paid employees (the majority of these employees are in grades 13-17, and the nurse anesthetists and pharmacists are in grade 22).

The registered nurses are the largest group of professional employees and they work 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. The record shows that a number of other professionals, e.g., pharmacists, dieticians, and respiratory therapists, also work the same schedule. All the Employer's professional employees have specialized skills, training, and education which require post-secondary education. Their common educational background (in certain courses of study) provides for some overlap in qualifications, skills, and duties with the other professionals.

The record also shows frequent contact among the registered nurses and other professional employees. The pharmacists (who also have areas of specialization) participate in inservice education programs, have frequent contact with the nurses regarding medication dosages, and may work at permanent pharmacy units which are being set up on the nursing floors (in addition to the central pharmacy facility). The social workers and clinical dieticians spend over half of their time in the patient care units coordinating patient care with the nurses. Further, the Employer's team approach to health care includes a procedure that necessitates daily contact and substantial sharing of information, in addition to "committee" planning by groups of professionals for total patient care.

Regarding contact between the facilities, the Medical Center has a wide variety of specialization, but not all specialities are available at each facility. Therefore, nursing specialists may "float," or perform work at one of the other facilities. Clinical specialists in the Employer's education division work at all three facilities, as do the inservice educators. There is evidence that a few nurses work at two facilities on a regular basis; that nurses who perform the same job may cover at another hospital for a vacationing nurse; and that on low patient-census days, the registered nurses are given the option of taking the day as a cost-containment day without pay, or of working in one of the other facilities, if needed.

The Regional Director concluded that the degree of integration shown among the three facilities is sufficient to negate both the separate identity of the St. Luke's facility and the appropriateness of a unit limited to St. Luke's employees. Further, he concluded that all the professional employees share a community of interest because they have common concerns and are subject to common policies. Thus, applying the standard set forth in St. Francis Hospital, supra, he found there are no "sharper than usual differences" between the registered nurses and the Employer's other professional employees, and that the smallest appropriate unit must include all the Employer's professional employees.

With respect to his conclusion that the smallest appropriate unit must include all three of the Employer's facilities, the Regional Director found that the three facilities are located in close proximity; the administration and management are centralized; all personnel and labor relations policies, wages, and benefits are uniform; there is contact and interchange among the facilities as certain nurses and professional employees may "float" among the three, and may cover for one another on the same job at another facility; and jobs are posted and seniority is honored systemwide.[4] Applying the 10th Circuit's decision as the law of the case, we agree with the Regional Director's conclusion that, based on these facts, the multifacility unit is the appropriate bargaining unit in which the election should be held.[5] [4] We note that prior to the 1979 merger, the Board directed an election in a two-facility unit of registered nurses at Presbyterian's Denver and Aurora facilities. See Presbyterian Medical Center, 218 NLRB 1266 (1975).

We also agree with the Regional Director that applying the disparity-of-interests standard set forth in St. Francis II and mandated by outstanding precedent[6] to the facts set forth above, the smallest appropriate unit must include all the Employer's professional employees.

Accordingly, we shall remand this proceeding to the Regional Director in order that he may conduct the election pursuant to his Direction of Election, issued June 26, 1985, except that the payroll period for determining eligibility shall be that ending immediately before the date of issuance of this Decision on Review.

[5] In making this determination, we have not applied the presumption favoring single facility units in the instant case because of the strictures of the Tenth Circuit's remand. We note, however, that the Board recently reaffirmed the validity of the presumptive appropriateness of a single facility unit in the health care industry in Manor Healthcare Corp., 285 NLRB 224 (1987), a policy to which we adhere. In Manor, the Board found that a consideration of the congressional policy against proliferation in this field does not warrant a health care industry exception to the single facility presumption. Rather, the Board stated that the concern against undue proliferation could best be accommodated by retaining the single facility presumption, and "allowing the party opposing such a unit to rebut the presumption by a showing of circumstances that militate against its appropriateness, including an increased risk of work disruption or other adverse consequences . . . ." 285 NLRB supra at 225. We believe this approach accords with, and is not inherently inconsistent with, the Tenth Circuit's direction that traditional factors be balanced against the public interest in preventing fragmentation. As noted in St. Vincent, the Board currently is engaged in the process of rulemaking, which is anticipated to reduce the need for lengthy and costly case-by-case adjudication of bargaining unit issues in the health care field; however, the Board is continuing to process cases under existing law until the final rule has been issued.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On October 24, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a Motion for Correction of the Decision of the Administrative Law Judge,[1] the Union filed exceptions, and the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Respondent filed reply briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

1. The judge concluded, inter alia, that the Respondent's unilateral decision to require its employees to use their accrued vacation time during a forthcoming 5-day 1985 Christmas shutdown period constituted a unilateral change in employees' working conditions in violation of Section 8(a)(5). He also found that by refusing to arbitrate a grievance filed by the Union concerning this compulsory vacation use requirement, the Respondent had breached its duty to bargain. Although we adopt the judge's conclusion and rationale concerning the unilateral change violation, we affirm the finding that the refusal to arbitrate violated Section 8(a)(5) on the basis of the rationale set forth in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 284 NLRB 53 (1987). In that decision we held, inter alia, that the respondent's refusal to arbitrate any grievances after the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement constituted a wholesale repudiation of its obligation to arbitrate in violation of the Act. Under the circumstances in this case, we find that the Respondent's refusal to arbitrate violated the Act. After denying the Union's grievance concerning the compulsory vacation use, the Respondent stated that it would not arbitrate the grievance because the Christmas shutdown was to occur after the contract had expired. In essence, the Respondent maintained that it had no obligation to arbitrate any grievance involving a matter which would occur after the expiration of its contract with the Union. This refusal to arbitrate thus "constituted an unlawful unqualified abandonment because it encompassed not only grievances for which there may have been no postexpiration obligation to arbitrate under Nolde, but also grievances arbitrable under Nolde." Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., supra. See also Litton Business Systems, 286 NLRB 817, 818–819 (1987). Accordingly, we conclude that the Respondent's unqualified refusal to arbitrate violated the Act.[5]

[1] In the motion to correct the judge's decision, the General Counsel contends that the judge inadvertently omitted from his Conclusions of Law his finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by unlawfully assisting employee Shivar's decertification petition and that the judge inadvertently referred in sec. II,F of his decision to those strikers named in "Appendices A and B" rather than those strikers named in Appendices B and C. We grant the General Counsel's motion to correct the judge's decision and we shall modify the Conclusions of Law accordingly.

We further correct the judge's inadvertent statement in sec. II,A of his decision that employee Hayson circulated a decertification petition among the bindery employees. Hayson circulated such a petition among the maintenance employees. Finally, we correct the judge's erroneous statements in secs. II,A and E, as well as the Conclusions of Law and the remedy sections, of his decision that the strikes in the bindery and maintenance units began on January 22, 1986. The evidence establishes that the Union called a strike in the bindery unit on January 20, 1986, and that the maintenance unit went on strike on January 23, 1986.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge' s credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge found that the Respondent did not engage in bad-faith bargaining with the Union concerning a successor contract in the bindery unit and an initial contract in the maintenance unit. No exceptions to these findings were filed.

Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by unlawfully encouraging or assisting employee Shivar in the filing of a decertification petition. We note that Shivar asked Supervisor Capps only how he could get the Union to stop "harassing" him, not how to remove the Union as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. At that point, there is no evidence that Shivar had independently decided to petition to decertify the Union. Rather, it was Supervisor Capps' suggestion that Shivar file a decertification petition that resulted in the circulation of a decertification petition. Consequently, the Respondent in fact instigated the decertification effort and, as that action has a tendency to interfere with employees' exercise of their Sec. 7 rights, it violates Sec. 8(a)(1). The fact that the Respondent's conduct may not have been as active or prolonged as in some of the cases cited by the judge, in our view, does not negate its unlawful nature. Finally, given the circumstances here, including particularly that it was Capps, not Shivar, who raised the idea of the filing of a decertification petition, we cannot attribute the significance which our dissenting colleague does to the mere fact that Shivar approached Capps.

[4] The judge included in his remedial order a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988). Accordingly, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order by deleting this provision.

[5] We find it unnecessary to address whether the underlying grievance was arbitrable. As we have adopted the judge's finding that the compul-

2. Following unsuccessful negotiations to obtain collective-bargaining agreements in the bindery and maintenance units, the Union called a strike in both units. As noted, the record reveals that the bindery unit employees commenced a strike on January 20, 1986,[6] and the maintenance unit began striking on January 23. Although the judge found that these strikes were economic at their inception, he concluded that they both were converted into unfair labor practice strikes on March 5, the date on which the Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit.[7] He thus determined that all striking employees in the two units had become unfair labor practice strikers as of that date. The Respondent has excepted to the judge's finding that the strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike, arguing first that the withdrawal of recognition in the maintenance unit was lawful. Alternatively, the Respondent argues that even if the withdrawal of recognition in that unit was unlawful and the strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike in the maintenance unit, the strike in the bindery unit remained an economic strike. As we have adopted the judge's conclusion that the decertification petition in the maintenance unit was the product of unlawful assistance and therefore have adopted his conclusion that the withdrawal of recognition in that unit was unlawful, we agree with the judge that the strike in the maintenance unit was converted into an unfair labor practice strike by the unlawful withdrawal of recognition. We find merit, however, in the Respondent's exception to the judge's finding that the strike in the bindery unit was thereby also converted into an unfair labor practice strike.

As the judge noted, an economic strike is converted into an unfair labor practice strike when an employer's unfair labor practices aggravate or prolong the strike. It is well settled that the unlawful withdrawal of recognition from a union prolongs the strike because it deprives the employees of their bargaining representative and thereby precludes the possibility of reaching agreement on a contract and impedes the settlement of the strike. See Ashe Brick Co., 280 NLRB 1383, 1391 (1986); Wilder Construction, 276 NLRB 977, 982 (1985), enfd. 804 F.2d 1122 (9th Cir. 1986). Accordingly, the Respondent's unlawful withdrawal of recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit converted the strike in that unit into an unfair labor practice strike. Our reasoning requires a different result, however, with respect to the strike in the bindery unit. The judge found, and as noted, we agree, that the decertification petition filed in the bindery unit by employee Rogers was not tainted by unfair labor practices and that the Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in that unit on March 4. Consequently, the withdrawal of recognition in that unit was not an unfair labor practice and could not prolong the strike in that unit because the Respondent no longer had any legal obligation to bargain with the Union in that unit. Nor do we accept the argument that the bindery unit employees were sympathy strikers in support of the maintenance unit strikers. The bindery unit employees went on strike before the maintenance unit employees commenced their strike and no evidence was proffered to establish that the bindery unit employees continued their strike because of unfair labor practices committed against the maintenance unit employees. Accordingly, we find that the strike in the bindery unit was not converted into an unfair labor practice strike and that the bindery unit employees remained economic strikers.

3. Having determined that only the strike in the maintenance unit was converted into an unfair labor practice strike, we find that only those strikers in the maintenance unit who were not replaced as of March 5 are entitled to immediate reinstatement with backpay. We shall amend the recommended remedy and Order accordingly. In all other respects, we adopt the judge's findings concerning the Respondent's refusal to reinstate the striking employees.[8] sory use of vacation time constituted an unlawful unilateral change and have ordered the Respondent to rescind this action and to restore accrued vacation leave, the grievance has become moot.

[6] All dates are 1986 unless noted otherwise.

[7] In contrast, the judge found the March 4 withdrawal of recognition in the bindery unit to be lawful and we affirm that finding.

[8] The Respondent excepted to the judge's conclusion that employees Brad Bowman, Richard Frauenthal, Lester Posey, W. E. Posey, and Mike Segler did not permanently abandon their employment with the Respondent when they executed statements of resignation. Alternatively, the Respondent argues that even if these employees are eligible for reinstatement, backpay should be tolled as of the date that the resignation statements were executed. We adopt the judge's finding that the five named employees did not permanently abandon their employment. We further find it unnecessary to address the Respondent's alternative argument regarding backpay because the record does not indicate that any of the five are entitled to backpay in any event. As noted above, we have found that only maintenance unit strikers who were not replaced as of March 5 are entitled to immediate reinstatement with backpay. Of the five named employees, however, only Brad Bowman and W. E. Posey were members of the maintenance unit. The record discloses, however, that before both of these strikers executed their resignation statements on February 12, the Respondent informed them that their jobs had been filled and that they would be placed on a preferential hiring list. Thus, both were replaced before the strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike. Consequently, they are not entitled to backpay but they "shall be placed on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory practice utilized by the Respondent, and they shall be reinstated before any other persons are hired or on the departure of their preconversion replacements [citations omitted]. Ashe Brick Co., supra at 1384.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for the judge's Conclusions of Law 6, 7, 10, and 11.

"6. By announcing about October 16, 1985, and by implementing its decision to require compulsory vacation use by unit employees for the 1985 Christmas shutdown without notice to or bargaining with the Union and by generally repudiating any obligation to arbitrate grievances arising after the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement in the bindery unit through its refusal to arbitrate a grievance on this action, the Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

"7. By encouraging and assisting employees employed in its bindery and maintenance units in the circulation of petitions to decertify the Union, the Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

"10. The Respondent's violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act referred to in paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 above converted the economic strike in the maintenance unit which began on January 23, 1986, into an unfair labor practice strike on March 5, 1986.

"11. By refusing to reinstate those strikers listed in Appendix C to the Board's decision who were not replaced as of March 5, 1986, following the unconditional request of the Union on behalf of the striking employees made on May 5, 1986, and by treating such strikers as economic strikers, the Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

AMENDED REMEDY

We amend the judge's recommended remedy as follows: Because the employees named in Appendix C to the Board's decision who participated in the economic strike beginning on January 23, 1986, which was converted into an unfair labor practice strike by the Respondent's violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act on March 5, 1986, requested unconditional reinstatement on May 5, 1986, the Respondent shall immediately reinstate them to their former or substantially equivalent positions without impairment of their seniority rights and other privileges. In order to make room for them, the Respondent shall dismiss, if necessary, all persons hired on or after March 5, 1986. If after such dismissals there are insufficient positions available for the remaining strikers, any available positions shall be accorded the strikers on a nondiscriminatory basis in accordance with seniority or other neutral criteria. Former strikers named in Appendix B for whom no positions are immediately available shall be placed on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory basis, and they shall be reinstated before any other persons are hired or on the departure of their replacements.

Further, those former striking employees entitled to immediate reinstatement shall be made whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's refusal to reinstate them in accordance with their unconditional request to be reinstated. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Rose Printing Company, Inc., Tallahassee, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(c).

"(c) Refusing to bargain with the Union by generally repudiating any obligation to arbitrate grievances arising after the expiration of the bindery collective-bargaining agreement."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(e).

"(e) Immediately and fully reinstate its maintenance unit employees listed in Appendix C who participated in the strike which began on January 23, 1986, and who unconditionally reapplied for reinstatement on May 5, 1986, to their former or substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any replacements hired in their former jobs on or after March 5, 1986. Make whole these employees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the 'Amended Remedy' section above. Place the remaining former strikers on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory basis and offer them employment before any other persons are hired or on the departure of their replacements."

---

[9] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

3. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(h).

"(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

4. Substitute the attached appendices for those of the administrative law judge.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, dissenting in part.

I would not hold that the Respondent unlawfully encouraged the circulation of a decertification petition in the context of a conversation between employee Shivar and Supervisor Capps. Shivar expressed to Capps his feeling that he was being "harassed" by the Union and asked the supervisor how this could be stopped. Capps replied that he did not know but would find out. Later, Capps suggested to Shivar that Shivar should consider circulating a decertification petition. When he expressed ignorance about how to go about this, Capps replied he would seek additional information. Subsequently, Capps gave Shivar the name and phone number of an attorney to call.

The judge recommends that we find that the supervisor's initial suggestion was unlawful because it "effectively implanted" in the employee's mind the idea that decertification "was the only alternative available for Shivar's concerns." In the judge's view, the supervisor's comment was, in short, "overkill."[1]

I do not agree with the judge that the supervisor's remark had such a mesmerizing effect on the employee's mind as to constitute interference or coercion under Section 8(a)(1). Nor do I think that Capps' comment in any way parallels the Board precedents on which the judge relied.[2] In those cases, the employer's representatives were engaged in an active course of conduct that encouraged and assisted employees in seeking decertification. The vice of such employer activity is that it interferes with employee free choice in the same way that an unlawful promise of benefits or an unlawful interrogation can. In each situation, the employees are expected to respond in a way favorable to the employer. A failure to make the expected response carries the risk of retaliation.

Here, in contrast, the employee approached the supervisor, posing an open-ended question concerning union harassment. Capps' limited response, notwithstanding the fact that it was given at a later time, was not irrelevant to that question and not outside the bounds of reasonableness. Certainly, had Capps approached Shivar and initiated the suggestion of decertification as part of a strategy to undermine the Union, an entirely different situation would have been presented, one which I would have no trouble finding illegal.

APPENDIX A

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with Graphic Communications Union, Local 241-B, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the following unit:

> All regular and full time maintenance employees, including maintenance mechanics, plant clericals, baler operator and janitor employed at our Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, bindery and press room employees and operators, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change the terms and conditions of employment of our employees in the above unit without the consent of the Union or without a valid impasse in bargaining having been reached.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with the Union by generally repudiating any obligation to arbitrate grievances arising after the expiration of the bindery collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully encourage or assist employees to circulate petitions to decertify the Union.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on their unconditional application to return to work.

---

[1] Interestingly, the judge finds no problem with Supervisor Capps' followup recommendation of a particular attorney to explore the possibility of decertification because it was no more than a direct response to a request by an employee for information.

[2] Weisser Optical Co., 274 NLRB 961 (1985); Placke Toyota, 215 NLRB 395 (1974).

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize and, on request, bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of employees in the maintenance unit set forth above regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, reduce it to writing and sign it.

WE WILL withdraw the requirement of compulsory use of accrued vacation leave for the 1985 Christmas shutdown and we will restore employees any loss of accrued vacation they were involuntarily required to take during that shutdown.

WE WILL restore the maintenance unit employees terms and conditions of employment in existence prior to March 5, 1986, and continue them in effect until an agreement on any changes is reached with the Union or a bona fide impasse exists.

WE WILL make employees whole, with interest, for any losses they suffered as a result of the unilateral changes in working conditions in the maintenance unit on and after March 5, 1986.

WE WILL immediately and fully reinstate all of our maintenance unit employees who participated in the strike which began on January 23, 1986, and who were not permanently replaced as of March 5, 1986, to their former jobs or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions if available, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, any person hired by us on or after March 5, 1986; WE WILL make these employees whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings resulting from the discrimination against them; and we will place any remaining former strikers on a preferential hiring list and offer them reinstatement before any other persons are hired or on the departure of any striker replacements.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUTTON S. BRANDON, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried at Tallahassee, Florida, 7–10 July 1986.[1] The charges were filed by Graphic Communications Union, Local 241-B, Graphic Communication International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union or Local 241), in Case 12–CA–11819 on 18 November; in Case 12–CA–11912–3 on 18 February (amended 27 March and 17 and 21 April); in Case 12–CA–11958 on 19 March (amended 17 and 21 April); and in Case 12–CA–12033 on 8 May. The charge in Case 12–CA–12046 was filed by George W. Hayson, an individual (Hayson) on 15 May (amended 22 May). On 22 May, the Regional Director for Region 12 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), issued an order consolidating cases and a consolidated complaint based on the charges filed by the Union. Subsequently, on 26 June, an order further consolidating cases consolidating Hayson's charges with the earlier union charges for hearing was issued along with amendments to the earlier consolidated complaint. The complaint, as amended, alleges violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), by Rose Printing Company, Inc. (Respondent or the Company). The primary issue is whether Respondent bargained with the Union in good faith with respect to a successor contract in its bindery unit and an initial contract in its maintenance unit. A finding that it did not do so creates other issues including: (a) whether a subsequent strike by Respondent's bindery and maintenance unit employees was an unfair labor practice strike, (b) whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to reinstate the strikers following an unconditional offer to return to work, (c) whether Respondent violated the Act in implementing its last bargaining proposal offer in the bindery unit, and (d) whether Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in both the bindery and maintenance units and subsequently unilaterally changed the working conditions of employees in the maintenance unit. Additional issues are presented regarding whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by sponsoring a decertification petition among its maintenance employees in March, and suggesting the circulation of an antiunion petition among bindery employees in November. Additional 8(a)(5) allegations raise issues of whether Respondent violated the Act by its unilaterally announced and implemented policy requiring employees to use vacation leave rather than leave without pay during the Christmas plant shutdown and whether it refused to arbitrate a grievance regarding said policy. The complaint further raises an issue of whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by threatening its employee Hayson and retaliating against him for discriminatory reasons. A final issue was presented at the hearing regarding the eligibility for reinstatement of certain strikers who resigned their employment with Respondent during the course of the strike in order to obtain their retirement fund contributions.

[1] All dates herein are from July 1985 through June 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the able briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Florida corporation with an office and place of business in Tallahassee, Florida, where it is engaged in the publishing and binding of books. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and during the same period of time purchased and received at its Tallahassee, Florida facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Florida. The complaint alleges, and Respondent admits, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The consolidated complaint alleges further, Respondent admits, and I also find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Overview of Uncontroverted Facts

Respondent is owned and operated by the Rosenberg family. Prior to June 1985, a 50-percent interest in Respondent was owned by Mrs. Charlotte Rosenberg with the remaining 50 percent owned by her son Charles Rosenberg and two sisters. Charles Rosenberg, for the 1-year period prior to June 1985, was the acting chief executive officer of Respondent. In June 1985, Charles Rosenberg acquired the ownership interest of his sisters giving him a full one-half interest in the ownership of Respondent. Around the time he acquired the additional interest in ownership, Charles Rosenberg became the chief executive officer of Respondent.

In its publishing and bookbinding business, Respondent operates three departments that are relevant to these proceedings: the bindery department whose employees have been represented for several years by the Union,[2] the maintenance department whose employees have been represented by the Union since January 1985, and the press department, whose employees are represented by Local 193-C (Local 193), of the same International union as Local 241. Discussions between Local 241 and Local 193 concerning a merger of the two unions took place in the fall of 1985 and while the members of Local 241 voted in favor of the merger, the members of Local 193 rejected the proposal.

Respondent maintained collective-bargaining agreements with both Local 241 and Local 193, effective from 1 December 1982 to 30 November 1984. Both contracts provided for a wage reopener for the period commencing 1 December 1983. As a result of negotiations at that time, and notwithstanding the fact that Respondent was losing money during the period, Respondent agreed to wage increases of approximately 45 cents for journeymen in both bargaining units.

In 1984 negotiations were undertaken with both Local 241 and Local 193 for new collective-bargaining agreements to succeed the expiring ones. The Company was represented in these negotiations by its labor attorney, Allen Blake, and its comptroller and member of its board of directors Greg Poirier, among others. The end result of these negotiations was an extension of the collective-bargaining agreement in each unit until 30 November with no wage increases.

In late 1984 the Union began organizing Respondent's maintenance employees. Subsequently following a Board-conducted election, Local 241 was certified on 23 January 1985 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's maintenance employees.[3] Negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union covering maintenance employees began in March 1985 with Respondent again represented by its attorney, Blake. During the course of these negotiations, however, Blake was fired and a new labor attorney, James Blue, was hired. Blue attended the first maintenance unit negotiations on 22 April. Negotiations on the maintenance unit dragged on into the fall when negotiations began again between Respondent and Local 241 regarding the bindery unit's collective-bargaining agreement and between Respondent and Local 193 regarding the press department unit.

[2] The specific bindery unit in which the Union was recognized, which Respondent in its answer admits is appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining, is as follows:

> All employees in Respondent's bindery operation at its Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] The specific unit for which the Union was certified is as follows:

> All regular full-time maintenance employees, including maintenance mechanics, plant clericals, baler operator, and janitor employed by Respondent at its Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, bindery and pressroom employees and operators, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

On 16 October around the time of the start up of negotiations on the bindery's collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent posted a Christmas shutdown notice stating that the plant would close down for the Christmas period and that employees would be charged 4 or 5 days' vacation during the shutdown. It is undisputed that this announcement was made without prior notice to, or bargaining with, Local 241. The Union protested this action during their bargaining sessions in early November. The Union took the position that employees were entitled to choose whether to take vacation leave or leave without pay during the shutdown as they had done in 1984, when, after bargaining, Respondent had agreed with the Union that employees could choose between using vacation time or time off without pay during the Christmas shutdown. Respondent, expressing uncertainty about the past practice, rejected the Union's contention and insisted employees use vacation leave during the Christmas shutdown. While the Union filed a grievance on the matter on 8 November, the grievance was not resolved and the Union did not seek arbitration of the matter because it was told by Respondent's personnel manager, David C. Goodwin, that Respondent would not arbitrate the grievance since the shutdown would take place after the contract expired on 30 November.

The Union filed a charge with the Board on this issue on 18 November (Case 12-CA-11819) after which Respondent on 18 December announced that the resolution of the matter would be made by the Board or, if the Board so ordered, by an arbitrator. The posted announcement also stated, however, that depending on final resolution employees would either receive their vacation pay during the shutdown or be permitted to schedule their vacations in the future. Employees were directed to advise their supervisors of their preference by 20 December.

The negotiations on collective-bargaining agreements in both the bindery and maintenance units were not successful. On 17 January Respondent through its attorney Blue presented the Union with Respondent's final offer in the bindery unit and announced that it would be implemented at the beginning of the day shift on 20 January. About 22 January the Union called a strike in the maintenance and bindery units. During the course of this strike and during the period of 28 February to 3 March, employee Carrie J. Rogers circulated a petition among the bindery unit employees expressing their desire that the Union no longer represent them for collective bargaining. Rogers delivered this petition to Respondent on 3 March. Also on 3 March employee Hayson circulated a similar petition among the bindery employees and also delivered a copy of that petition to Respondent, while forwarding the original to the Board's Regional Office in Tampa. As a result of the petitions, Respondent by letters to the Union dated 4 and 5 March, respectively, withdrew recognition from the Union in the bindery and maintenance units.

By telegram dated 5 May, the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work "all striking employees." By letter dated 6 May, Respondent acknowledged receipt of the offer to return to work and stated that the replaced striking employees "are now on a preferential recall list and would be offered reinstatement consistent with the law applicable to economic strikers."

It is undisputed that about 5 March after a withdrawal of recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit, Respondent changed the terms and conditions of employees in that bargaining unit.

B. Respondent's Alleged Intentions in the 1985 Negotiations

1. William Windham's testimony

The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent, in both the bindery and maintenance units, bargained with the Union only "with the intent of delaying the bargaining process and not reaching an agreement." The General Counsel predicates these allegations upon the testimony of William Windham, a former official of Respondent, and relies on other conduct of Respondent including its bargaining proposals during negotiations to corroborate Windham.

Windham was hired by Respondent in 1983 and testified he worked as plant manager and later as manufacturing manager after he was replaced as plant manager by George Tabor in the early part of 1985.[4] According to Windham, he participated in negotiations between Respondent and both Local 241 and Local 193 on the wage reopenings in 1983. Those negotiations concluded with a wage increase being given. Charles Rosenberg (Rosenberg) did not personally take part in the negotiations, and subsequently made statements on several occasions in the presence of Windham, Mrs. Rosenberg, and Greg Poirier that he would get it (the wage increases) back in negotiations the following year.

In 1984, still according to Windham, when the contract with Local 241 came up for negotiation, Rosenberg stated more than once at staff meetings or management meetings that if Respondent did not get concessions from the bindery unit he wanted them "on the street." Further, Windham testified with some vagueness that Rosenberg indicated that Respondent could hopefully get a contract with the pressmen's union, apparently feeling that Respondent could still operate if that union did not strike.

Mrs. Rosenberg and Poirier expressed concern about a strike, Windham testified, fearing that Respondent could not afford to take a strike. Windham testified that he sided with Rosenberg stating that if he did not get the concessions he needed to operate, he would rather have a strike. As a result of this internal conflict, Sheldon

[4] Respondent denies that Windham ever occupied the position of plant manager, apparently basing its position in this regard on the fact that he was not empowered to engage in purchasing for Respondent. While the issue on Windham's status as plant manager is largely academic, it is clear that on at least one occasion in late 1984 Windham signed a notice to employees as plant manager. Moreover, evidence submitted reflects he was listed as plant manager in the minutes of a management meeting in June 1984.

Rosenberg, chairman of the board of directors of Respondent at the time, came to Tallahassee to meet with management. He apparently was unable to resolve the dispute. However, Sheldon Rosenberg did remove Rosenberg from any labor relations authority. That this did in fact occur is indicated by a letter dated 1 February 1985 from Respondent's attorney Blake to Greg Poirier in which Blake responded to the contention by both Unions that the 1984 agreement to extend the collective-bargaining agreements was conditioned on the removal of Rosenberg from any further involvement in labor relations with the unions. Blake conceded in his letter that oral statements were made at the bargaining table that Rosenberg would no longer be in labor relations but rebutted the Union's assertion that that was a condition of agreement. In any event, the 1984 negotiations culminated in an extension of the old agreements with both Unions as a result of Sheldon Rosenberg directing that Respondent accept the Union's proposals in this regard.

Windham also testified Respondent was opposed to union organization by the maintenance employees. After discussions with Rosenberg, and in an effort to thwart union selection by the maintenance employees, Windham hired two new employees in the maintenance unit prior to the January election and after the two gave him assurances they would not vote for the Union. In addition, Rosenberg made arrangements in early 1985 prior to the election to hire an additional cleaning crew. That effort was rejected by Mrs. Rosenberg and Poirier in a shouting match with Rosenberg. Windham testified he witnessed the affair and joined in a discussion with Poirier in an effort to convince Charles that it would be futile to put the new people in as part-time employees to vote in the upcoming election in the maintenance department. As a result the additional cleaning crew was not hired. This aspect of Windham's testimony was not denied by Rosenberg, and neither Poirier nor Mrs. Rosenberg testified in this proceeding.

As further evidence of Respondent's animosity toward union organization in the maintenance unit, Windham testified that Rosenberg and George Tabor, who became plant manager in the spring of 1985, directed him in early June 1985 to lay off Albert Spivey who had been elected as president of the Union and who was a negotiator for the Union in the maintenance unit. Windham acknowledged that the layoff of Spivey was part of an overall layoff of 10 percent of the employees in each department. However, Respondent laid off more than 10 percent in the approximately eight-employee maintenance unit in order to reach Spivey who had seniority over one other employee. Spivey resigned his employment sometime after the layoff and was never recalled. He resigned his office in the Union in August.

Subsequent to Spivey's resignation, the other maintenance employee junior to Spivey was offered recall to work but declined to return. Further, according to Windham's testimony, which is not specifically contradicted in this regard, there were additional hires in the maintenance department. One such hire was a detective who Windham testified was hired by Tabor and Goodwin in the maintenance department. According to Windham, Tabor told him that the detective, who was hired in mid July and who worked through July and approximately 3 weeks in August, was employed to gather evidence on maintenance employee Brad Bowman because Bowman was on the Union's negotiating committee. Windham related that Goodwin had confirmed to him that this was the purpose for hiring the detective.

Windham further testified that following Respondent's loss of the election in the maintenance unit after Windham had given assurances that such a loss was not likely, Rosenberg expressed to Windham his displeasure stating that Windham was "in trouble." Approximately 3 months later, Windham was in fact replaced as plant manager by George Tabor. Windham continued his employment by Respondent, however, as production manager until he was discharged in November.

It is undisputed that Windham was a member of the management negotiating team in bargaining negotiations with the maintenance unit through mid-July. Still according to Windham, Charles Rosenberg made statements to him on three or four different occasions that there would be no contract with bindery employees in 1985, and that Respondent would start negotiating with maintenance people but with no intention of reaching an agreement. Rather, Rosenberg stated he would stretch out the maintenance negotiations until the bindery and pressmen unit negotiations started in the fall. He added that there would be no bindery contract reached with the bindery unit, that they would strike, and the employees would be replaced when they struck, and that Respondent would be rid of the Union in the maintenance and bindery departments. However, with respect to the pressmen unit and Local 193, Rosenberg stated that he would seek concessions from Local 193 but would still try to get a contract that Respondent could live with inasmuch as he felt that Respondent could operate if the bindery went out but not if the pressmen struck. Further, according to Windham, at one of the meetings he attended with management relating to the maintenance unit agreement, Windham asked Tabor what would happen if the maintenance and bindery units accepted a contract. Tabor's reply was there was no way they could accept it. At still other meetings, Tabor had stated that Respondent would not get a contract with the bindery and maintenance departments.

2. Other evidence of Respondent's intent

As other evidence of Respondent's intent to provoke a bindery and maintenance strike, the General Counsel points to Respondent's development of a strike plan in the summer of 1985. The strike plan was admittedly developed by Personnel Manager Goodwin. Goodwin's strike plan included, inter alia, a proposed erection of a fence around Respondent's premises, and a polling of supervisors regarding which of their employees they anticipated would engage in a strike if one was called. In addition, it is undisputed that as part of the strike plan, Windham made visits to other printing facilities during the summer of 1985 to ascertain whether other concerns could handle Respondent's work in the event of a strike.

The General Counsel also relies on the testimony of Joel Tidwell to support the proposition that Respondent intended to avoid agreement with the Union. Thus, Tidwell, the president of Local 193, testified that he had a conversation with Tabor prior to the beginning of negotiations between Respondent and both the bindery and pressmen units. In the conversation that took place in either Tabor's office or the board room Tabor asked if Local 193 would agree to negotiate without the presence of attorneys. Tabor added that Respondent and the bindery unit were so far apart that he did not think they could reach an agreement, but he felt he could reach an agreement with Local 193, because he was able to talk to them. Local 193 subsequently agreed to negotiations without attorney representation and such negotiations were undertaken. Labor attorneys for both sides were subsequently called in after 8 or 10 meetings. During the course of these negotiations, Tidwell testified, both Tabor and Goodwin made statements several times that they were so far apart with Local 241 that they would never get a contract. Further, Tidwell testified that in November during the time when merger discussions between Locals 193 and 241 were taking place, Tabor inquired of Tidwell about the merger. Tidwell replied that there was little possibility and Tabor remarked that he felt like Local 193 would be better off if they did not merge with 241 for if they did, Local 193 would have the same problems as Local 241. Tabor did not specify the "problems."

While the General Counsel does not contend that Respondent's bargaining proposals with respect to both the bindery and maintenance unit in themselves establish an intent to avoid agreement, such proposals are relied on as circumstantially supporting the proposition that Respondent intended to cause the maintenance and bindery units to strike while reaching an agreement with Local 193. Concessions were sought from each union, but the extent of concessions sought from Local 241 appeared to be greater than for Local 193. Thus, Respondent proposed to increase employee contributions to the pension plan from 3 to 4 percent for Local 193 while contributions by employees in Local 241 were proposed to be increased from 3 to 6 percent. No change in the management rights provision was proposed by Respondent with respect to Local 193 but with respect to Local 241 Respondent proposed in its management rights clause to eliminate all past practices as a basis for contract interpretation or application. Under Respondent's proposals, Local 193 would keep a basic workweek of 37-1/2 hours with mandatory overtime of 16 hours after 40 hours per week. But Respondent proposed to increase Local 241's workweek from 38-3/4 to 40 hours per week with mandatory overtime for the first 24 hours per week after 40 hours. Respondent proposed to reduce disability pay from 70 percent for 26 weeks to 60 percent for Local 193 but to 50 percent for Local 241. No change in sick leave was proposed by Respondent for Local 193 but Respondent proposed to eliminate sick leave for new hires for Local 241. Respondent's proposal for vacation leave for employees represented by Local 193 was capped at 30 days while leave for employees represented by Local 241 was capped at 20 days except for those already receiving more than 20 days. With regard to wages, Respondent proposed a wage increase of 45 cents per hour for journeymen in the press department with proportional increases for others while no wage increase was proposed at all for Local 241. Moreover, with manning changes proposed by Respondent along with discretionary authority retained by Respondent to transfer employees to lower rated jobs, some employees represented by Local 241 might suffer an actual decrease in wages.

The proposal of Respondent to the maintenance unit employees largely parallels its proposal to the bindery employees. No across-the-board increase was offered in maintenance, but neither were any proposed cuts in wages.

3. Respondent's evidence

Respondent's evidence with respect to its intentions in the negotiations with Local 241 was expressed largely through Rosenberg, Tabor, Goodwin, and Respondent's labor attorney, James Blue. Rosenberg testified that Respondent had lost money for the past several years, and as a result, Rosenberg instructed his bargaining committee to seek concessions so that Respondent could reduce operating costs, reflect a profit, and maintain a status of solvency. With respect to the maintenance unit, Rosenberg said that Respondent wanted a speedy resolution of the maintenance contract. According to Rosenberg, he did not foresee a strike in his discussions with Respondent's maintenance bargaining committee consisting at that time of Blake, Windham, and Tabor. That Respondent did seek an early resolution on the maintenance bargaining agreement is evidenced by a letter from Respondent's then attorney Blake dated 11 March 1985 to Poirier in which Blake observed that "if the Union insists on their position relative to certain reporting areas, such as overtime, call in and report pay sub-contracting and hours of work and any other areas which take away from management's rights, the goal of a quick contract must [be] secondary to the preservation of the Company's flexibility in running the machine shop."

Rosenberg further testified that he additionally wanted a quick agreement with maintenance because he did not wish to negotiate with three units in the fall. He denied he ever stated that he wanted a strike in either the bindery or maintenance units. He conceded that he needed concessions and if he could not get concessions, Respondent would be prepared to take a strike and told h;s negotiating team for all three units that if he could not get concessions to "let them go." According to Rosenberg, there were three management negotiations strategy sessions held in the fall prior to the expiration of the bindery and maintenance contracts. These were attended by Rosenberg, Blue, Goodwin, and Mrs. Rosenberg. The first such session took place in the early fall while the second took place in November with the third in December. The latter two sessions were attended by Rosenberg, Blue, Tabor, and Goodwin. Rosenberg said that he was encouraged at the prospects of reaching agreement by a proposal suggested by Blue referred to as "red circling" which would have the net effect of allowing employees in certain classifications to maintain their wages while in those classifications. Only new hires or transferred employees then would be affected by the lower rates Respondent was proposing. Rosenberg said he authorized a red circling plan as well as a "buy back" plan on dependent care coverage for health care costs restricted to current employees only.

Other than a demand on mandatory overtime, Rosenberg could recall no specific concessions he sought from the maintenance unit. Still Rosenberg insisted that he wanted a quick contract with the maintenance unit. With respect to the bindery unit, Rosenberg related that Respondent sought a reduction in dependent coverage cost (i.e., employees paying a larger share of such coverage), mandatory overtime, and a "right to man our equipment." Although Rosenberg said the same items were sought from the pressmen unit, he subsequently conceded that there were differences in the proposals but stated he did not know exactly what they were. Nevertheless, he maintained that there was a "continuity" in the packages.

Rosenberg did not specifically deny Windham's testimony regarding Spivey's layoff. However, Tabor testified that Rosenberg was not involved in the layoff decision, that Spivey's presidency in the Union played no part in his selection for layoff, and that while the selection of two out of the maintenance unit for layoff exceeded the 10-percent goal, it was because the maintenance unit represented a nonchargeable cost center (i.e., costs not directly chargeable to customers), and Respondent felt a greater than 10-percent reduction could be accomplished there. Tabor's testimony on the point was corroborated by the testimony of Goodwin who had been employed by Respondent in late May 1985 just prior to the layoff.

Regarding the hiring of a detective in the maintenance unit Goodwin and Tabor related that the purpose was to obtain evidence regarding possible thefts. Goodwin testified that Windham had related to him that he suspected Bowman of stealing, a contention Windham denied on rebuttal. Neither Goodwin nor Tabor advised the detective of the suspicions regarding Bowman. The detective was terminated after 3 to 4 weeks without finding evidence of theft by anyone.

Blue testified for Respondent that he was told by Tabor that the strategy in maintenance was to get a quick contract because the Company did not want negotiations to drag into the fall. The offer made to the maintenance unit reflected that strategy. However, contrary to Rosenberg, Blue related employee dependent coverage was not a reduction sought in the maintenance unit. Blue corroborated Rosenberg regarding the strategy sessions held in the fall, the first being in late September and related to all three bargaining units. That meeting was attended by Tabor, Goodwin, Windham, Rosenberg, and Mrs. Rosenberg. As a result of the meeting, Blue was instructed to get concessions in the negotiations, and there was a discussion about what concessions would be proposed. However, Rosenberg did not detail each of the areas in which concessions were to be sought. According to Blue, in mid-December it appeared that Respondent was not going to be able to reach an agreement with the bindery and maintenance units and therefore he began to make alternative proposals. One of the proposals in this regard was the "red circling" offer to the bindery unit, the effect of which was to obtain concessions from new hires without affecting the older employees. The Union found that unacceptable. In addition, the Union failed to move from its opposition to the Company's proposals on mandatory overtime, insurance, and management's rights. Blue testified Rosenberg never said anything about wanting a strike in any of the units. Rosenberg did say that if he did not get concessions, he did not care if there was a strike. Finally, Blue testified that he was aware of the Respondent's strike plan and had advised Respondent that they could not go into negotiations without a strike plan.

Tabor generally corroborated the testimony of Blue and Rosenberg regarding the general negotiation strategy. With respect to negotiations with the maintenance unit when Blake was representing Respondent, Tabor testified that in March there was a strategy session attended by himself, Blake, and Windham. The strategy determined was to get a quick contract with the maintenance unit, and to that end Respondent did not ask for concessions although they did insist on compulsory overtime, which Respondent was enforcing at that time. Asked if Windham ever questioned him about what would happen if the Union accepted the Company's proposals, Tabor testified only that he told Windham on one or more occasions and not necessarily in reference to the maintenance unit that it "didn't look very promising."

Although Goodwin testified, he was not questioned regarding the strategy sessions or the bindery bargaining sessions. Goodwin was instrumental in the development of Respondent's strike plan, but denied that the erection of a fence around Respondent's parking lot was related to a possible strike. Rather, according to Goodwin, the fence was put up because the parking lot was poorly lighted and women employees working on the night shift had safety concerns in view of the poor lighting. Nevertheless, it is undisputed that Goodwin in a memo accompanying a contractor's low bid on the fence installation enclosing the parking area observed, "This [the fence] is a must if we are going to control access to the shipping area of the plant. Obviously, this would also keep strikers an additional distance from the work area."

4. Contentions and conclusions

Crucial, of course, to the General Counsel's case that Respondent refused to bargain in good faith with Local 241 with the intention of provoking a strike is the testimony of Windham and the circumstantial evidence that the General Counsel contends corroborates Windham. This evidence, the General Counsel argues, is found in Respondent's implementation of the strike plan in the summer of 1985, the polling of supervisors regarding employee strike sympathies, the plan to use security guards with a suggested start up time of 1 October, the elimination of vacations for employees after 30 November because Respondent did not want striking employees to be receiving vacation pay, the erection of a fence around the plant in November, the uncontradicted testimony of Tidwell regarding Tabor's statement before negotiations even started that Respondent and Local 241 were so far apart in bindery negotiations he did not think they could reach an agreement, Tabor's caution to Tidwell about Local 193 merging with Local 241, and Respondent's preferential treatment in its proposals to the press unit as compared to the proposals presented to the bindery unit.

Respondent's disposition to "pack" the maintenance unit prior to the election as admitted by Windham and Rosenberg's attempt to subcontract janitorial work, the layoff of Spivey in the maintenance unit and the hiring of a detective to find a basis for discharging maintenance unit negotiator Bowman are also said to undermine Respondent's present contentions regarding its good faith in the negotiations in bindery and the maintenance units. The General Counsel further argues that Rosenberg's bargaining tactics in 1984 were also designed to provoke a strike, but such intentions were thwarted by his removal from negotiations by Sheldon Rosenberg. Conceding that Respondent may have initially had an intention to reach a quick agreement with the maintenance unit as asserted in Blake's letter to Poirier in March 1985, the General Counsel points out that that goal was established prior to Rosenberg's reacquisition of control of bargaining negotiations. Such reacquisition of control was made possible, according to the General Counsel, after Rosenberg had bought out his sister's shares of the business. The General Counsel further contends that Rosenberg's firing of Blake warrants the inference that Blake was fired because Rosenberg wanted to know how much it would cost Respondent if the Union filed charges concerning Respondent's bargaining conduct when the matter went through the Board and the courts.

Respondent's position is that although it bargained hard to achieve a contract with both units, it nevertheless bargained in good faith. Windham's testimony was attacked by Respondent as being inconsistent, contradicted by his own prior statement given to the Board, and unworthy of belief particularly when considered in light of Windham's status as a former employee "disgruntled" by his discharge in November. According to Respondent, Windham took the results of the 1985 negotiations and made that Respondent's plan, when in truth Respondent bargained to achieve contracts albeit ones that were favorable to Respondent with the concessions sought and designed to make Respondent profitable. In this connection, Respondent emphasizes that the General Counsel has not contested the fact that Respondent had lost money 4 out of the 5 years preceding the negotiations involved here. Finally, Respondent contends that its conduct within the bargaining sessions reflects its intent to reach, rather than to thwart, agreements with the Union.

As the General Counsel's brief points out a determination of whether an employer desires to reach an agreement with a union must be made on the "totality of circumstances" that are indicative of a mental state and not simply on the terms of contract proposals. Pittsburg-Des Moines Co. v. NLRB, 663 F.2d 956 (9th Cir. 1981). Parties to negotiations must bargain "in good faith" with a sincere desire to reach agreement. If an employer enters negotiations without "an open and fair mind, and a sincere purpose to find a basis for agreement," he cannot be said to have bargained in good faith. Globe Cotton Mills v. NLRB, 103 F.2d 91, 94 (5th Cir. 1939). But, a party to negotiations cannot be required to make a concession on any specific issue or to adopt a particular position. See Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600 (1984). On the other hand, the submission of predictably unacceptable proposals by a party in negotiations may provide a basis for the inference that the party offering the proposals does not wish to reach an agreement. See NLRB v. A-1 King Size Sandwiches, 732 F.2d 872, 877 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied 469 U.S. 1035 (1984). Nevertheless, the Board has more recently ruled that it will not sit in judgment on the substantative terms of bargaining proposals but rather will oversee the process of bargaining to ascertain that the parties have made a sincere effort to reach an agreement. Rescar, Inc., 274 NLRB 1, 2 (1985).

In examining the totality of the conduct of Respondent in this case, one must begin with the testimony of Windham. After carefully considering the demeanor of Windham, the content of his testimony and its context within the case as a whole, and all of the variant factors that a trier of fact must consider in resolving credibility, I conclude that Windham's testimony to the extent it impugned Respondent's intent in negotiations was based, at best, on conjecture, confusion, and faulty recall. Having been discharged by Respondent in November, Windham could not be regarded as unbiased in this case. Moreover, in demeanor, I found Windham unconvincing. His testimony at times was vague as reflected by the fact that he could not provide the approximate times when Rosenberg made the alleged damaging remarks regarding Respondent's intent with respect to the 1984 and 1985 negotiations. Moreover, Windham's inability to accurately relate the basis for the dispute between Rosenberg and Blake that resulted in Blake's discharge in the presence of Windham casts serious doubt on Windham's ability to accurately report other facts. This makes purely speculative the General Counsel's contention that Blake was fired because he was unable to provide Respondent with an estimated cost of defending Respondent on prospective refusal-to-bargain charges.

Contradictions between Windham's testimony and his prehearing statement to the Board also serve to undermine Windham's veracity. Thus, in his prehearing statement given to the Board, Windham stated that Rosenberg had said to the company negotiators during the 1984 negotiations that he wanted to offer the bindery local a contract that he knew they could not accept, so they would be forced to strike and he could get rid of the bindery local, the same position he attributes to Rosenberg in the 1985 negotiations. Nevertheless, in a subsequent portion of the same statement, Windham had related that Rosenberg "didn't care whether or not the bindery Local signed a contract." The General Counsel would excuse this inconsistency on the basis that Respondent did change its bargaining position in 1984 after steps were taken to remove any labor relations authority from Rosenberg. The General Counsel's argument has no appeal. The inconsistency remains, for Windham was not testifying regarding positions of Respondent but rather the specific position of Rosenberg.

There is also a contradiction between Windham's prehearing statement and his testimony before the Federal district court in connection with the General Counsel's unsuccessful attempt to obtain a 10(j) injunction in this case and his testimony here. In his prehearing statement to the Board, Windham related that in the fall of 1985 he, Tabor, Blue, and Goodwin represented Respondent in negotiations. Admittedly, at the hearing on the 10(j) petition, Windham testified that he attended four or five bindery unit bargaining sessions in September and October 1985. While he equivocated about the last date he attended a negotiating session, he was emphatic that he attended the bindery negotiations. At the hearing here, however, Windham conceded that he had not attended any bindery negotiations in 1985. He explained this contradiction as simply a mistake caused by his not having reviewed his notes and by the fact that the union committee on the maintenance negotiations contained some of the same people that he had dealt with the preceding year in the bindery negotiations. He named no one on the maintenance negotiating committee who had been on the previous bindery negotiations other than "he believed" Peggy Nichols. However, Nichols was not elected president of the Union and did not begin attending maintenance negotiations until August, a time after Windham ceased participating in maintenance negotiations. Accordingly, Windham's explanation does not withstand scrutiny, and only serves to further undermine his credibility.

Concerning the circumstantial evidence pointed out by the General Counsel to corroborate Windham's testimony, Respondent's establishment of a detailed strike plan, I conclude, is not inconsistent with its bargaining position. It is clear that Respondent was negotiating for concessions from Local 241. Unquestionably, Respondent was willing to endure a strike if it could not get concessions. Such a position is not in and of itself unlawful. See Hamady Bros. Food Markets, 275 NLRB 1335 (1985). A realistic assessment of the likelihood of a strike in light of Respondent's attempts to negotiate significant concessions would support the prudence of strike preparation and the development of a strike plan. Indeed, the Union's membership voted for strike authorization in August before bindery negotiations had even commenced. Such preparation for a strike cannot indicate the Union's intent to bargain in bad faith. Under these circumstances and given Respondent's disposition early on that it would seek concessions in the 1985 agreements just as it had initially determined to seek them in the 1984 negotiations, I conclude Respondent's early preparations for a strike did not reflect an intent to provoke a strike.

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent's removal of labor relations authority from Rosenberg in 1984 confirmed Respondent's recognition that Rosenberg's involvement in bargaining would result in a strike. Accepting the contention that Rosenberg may have been difficult to deal with and adamant on obtaining concessions does not dictate a conclusion that Rosenberg intended to cause a strike. And the argument that Blake was fired because he was unable or unwilling to give Rosenberg an estimate of the costs of contemplated unfair labor practice litigation flowing from any refusal to bargain appears to have no predicate in fact. Rosenberg maintained Blake was fired because of his failure to provide an estimate of costs regarding an arbitration matter. Windham's testimony on this point was too vague, although he was present at Blake's firing, to constitute a credible contradiction of Rosenberg's testimony on this issue.

Windham's claim that Rosenberg intended to drag out negotiations with the maintenance unit is refuted by Blake's 11 March letter to Poirier regarding the intent to reach a quick agreement. But hard and difficult bargaining does not preclude the existence of a desire to reach agreement. Nothing else substantiates Windham's claim and even Windham conceded in his testimony that he had no reason to believe Blake's letter was not an accurate statement of Respondent's goal in bargaining in the maintenance unit. Moreover, Windham admitted he could point to no specific conduct of Respondent in maintenance negotiations tending to show an intent to drag out the bargaining. Any difficulty in arranging meetings was attributable to both sides. And Respondent was not seeking concessions from the maintenance unit that would make agreement more difficult to achieve.[5] On the surface it would also appear that the Union had more to gain than Respondent by extending the maintenance negotiations, for by doing so, the smaller maintenance unit of seven or eight employees would have its strike effectiveness increased by support from the bindery unit employees after their contract expired in November.

The General Counsel asserts Respondent's failure to submit a complete contract proposal for maintenance to the Union substantiates the argument that Respondent intended to drag out negotiations. Tabor conceded that there had been no complete proposal submitted by Respondent to the maintenance unit prior to October.[6] Thereafter, it appears that the maintenance bargaining took a back seat to the bindery unit bargaining. The Union simply did not "push" independent maintenance bargaining. There is no evidence the Union even asked for a complete proposal. Under these circumstances, and because it is not clear that the absence of any "complete" company proposal constituted an obstacle to agreement, I can attach no evidentiary significance to the failure of Respondent to submit a complete proposal.

There is also evidence that Respondent's conduct at the bargaining table was inconsistent with a desire to avoid agreement in the bindery unit. While Respondent did seek concessions in the bindery negotiations in the course of bargaining, it softened its position on the impact of those concessions. Thus, with respect to insurance coverage for dependents of employees, Respondent initially sought to completely eliminate such coverage at its expense, but subsequently offered to pay current employees an hourly rate toward such coverage. Further, a major change in position involved the red circling proposal, which was a departure from Respondent's proposal regarding a reduction in wages for bindery employees. Rather, the plan allowed current employees to maintain their wages and personal premiums with cost reductions to be imposed only on new employees. Although the General Counsel contends the benefits of red circling were illusory because Respondent retained the right to make job assignments that could affect the rates of current employees, the proposal nevertheless has to be regarded as a material step toward agreement. Respondent also upgraded its proposals with regard to reporting pay, sick leave, disability pay, overtime, and mandatory overtime. These actions and proposals, I conclude, serve to show the absence of an intent of Respondent to force a strike by Local 241.

[5] The fact that Respondent was not seeking significant concessions in the maintenance negotiations undermines Windham's testimony, vague as to time, that Tabor once said in meetings regarding maintenance negotiations that there was no way maintenance people could accept Respondent's contract. Accordingly, I do not credit Windham's testimony in this regard.

[6] On the other hand, Blue's bargaining notes of the 9 July maintenance bargaining suggest that the Union had all of management's proposals. This apparent contradiction of Tabor's testimony is not explained on the record.

The evidence reveals, as the General Counsel contends, that there were differences in the proposals submitted by Respondent to Locals 241 and 193. Thus, on pensions prior employer contributions in both units had been 6 percent of wages with employees contributing 3 percent. In both units Respondent had proposed to reverse those rates, and maintained that proposal for Local 241 while ultimately agreeing with Local 193 for a 4-percent employee contribution. Other differences between what was proposed by Respondent to Local 241 and what it and Local 193 agreed to can be found in the management rights provision, the overtime and workweek provisions, disability pay, sick leave, vacation leave, and, as already related, wage rates. To be sure, these comparisons do suggest a "preference" accorded to Local 193, which tends to support the General Counsel's argument that Respondent intended to avoid agreement with Local 241 while reaching agreement with Local 193. However, it is not clear that the apparently better terms achieved by Local 193 were not a genuine product of the collective-bargaining process. The record reveals that Local 193 did make some concessions sought by Respondent that Local 241 was unwilling to make. Thus, Local 193 agreed to a lower starting rate for new employees, mandatory overtime, a lower employer pension contribution than it previously enjoyed, a lower percentage rate on disability pay, employee pick-up of dependent insurance coverage at essentially the same 35-cent-per-hour rate proposed to Local 241, and the elimination of vision care. On the other hand, based on Blue's uncontradicted and otherwise credible testimony Local 241 refused to accept any form of mandatory overtime, or any change in the employee pension contribution rate. It further refused to accept Respondent's proposal on dependent insurance coverage, and it did not offer a counterproposal on the point except to a very limited and predictably unacceptable extent. Under these circumstances, and keeping in mind that negotiations between Local 193 and Respondent continued after Local 241's strike began, I am unable to, and do not, attach any significance to the difference in terms reached between Respondent and Local 193 and those offered Local 241. I find that such differences do not evidence bad-faith bargaining on Respondent's part in its negotiations with Local 241.

The fact that the agreement with Local 193 was reached after Local 241 went on strike also dispels the existence of a plan by Respondent, as urged by the General Counsel based on Windham's testimony, to reach agreement with Local 193 while provoking a strike by Local 241. If there had been such a plan, its effectuation could be assured only if agreement with Local 193 was reached before Local 241's strike. Although Respondent and Local 193 had initially extended their agreement after 30 November, Respondent on 7 January advised Local 193 it was terminating the agreement as of 6 February because that Local had rejected Respondent's final offer. The new agreement with Local 193 was apparently reached just prior to 6 February and was made effective from 7 February. Therefore, both before and after Local 241 went on strike, there was a period when Respondent could not assure itself that it would not also be struck by Local 193.

Another element supporting Respondent's contention that it did not intend to provoke a strike by Local 241 is Rosenberg's letter to bindery employees dated 17 January. In that letter, Rosenberg explained that Respondent had two goals in negotiation, to increase efficiency at reduced operation costs and to do this with minimum impact on current employees. He further explained Respondent's proposals in the primary areas of concern and related that Respondent's position was dictated by its prior loss of money. He urged the employees to review Respondent's proposal, give it "serious consideration," and let their union representatives know if they found it unacceptable. The letter is admittedly self-serving, but if Respondent desired to avoid agreement with the Union altogether as opposed to an agreement favorable to Respondent, the letter would not likely have been written.

The other evidence relied on by the General Counsel occurring more than 6 months prior to the filing of the first charge and bearing on Respondent's attempt to "pack" the maintenance unit is, I find, immaterial. Accepting as true Charles Rosenberg's efforts to pack the maintenance unit prior to the election, the undisputed fact remains that following the election Respondent made no attempts procedurally to delay the Union's certification or the commencement of bargaining. Instead, as Blake's letter indicates, Respondent sought to reach a "quick agreement" with the Union.

With respect to Spivey's layoff, I find Windham's testimony incredible when weighed against the testimony of Tabor whose manner of testifying was straightforward and generally unequivocal. I find Tabor's explanation, supported by Goodwin, of the circumstances of Spivey's layoff plausible and credible. While the layoff in maintenance exceeded 10 percent, Tabor's testimony that the layoff in the prepress department also exceeded the 10-percent figure was not contradicted. That Respondent had a 20-percent drop in sales in June was not disputed. A corresponding 10-percent layoff under these circumstances does not appear unreasonable. Moreover, the reduction of two people in maintenance appears to have been justified because there is no showing the reduction had an adverse impact on production. Further, if Respondent's motivation had been to rid itself of a union officer, a layoff at best could only be a temporary measure. The record reflects that the junior maintenance employee laid off with Spivey was subsequently offered a recall to work thus warranting the inference that Spivey would have received that recall offer had he not in the meantime resigned. Equally credible was Tabor's testimony, supported by Goodwin, that they did not know which employees would be affected until after the number from each unit to be laid off was ascertained. Tabor's testimony that Spivey's union office played no part in the decision regarding his layoff, I found convincing, as well as his assertion that Rosenberg was not involved in the layoff decision.

Contrary to the General Counsel's arguments, I am unable to attach material significance to the comments attributed to Tabor by Tidwell, which Tabor failed to contradict. Tabor's remark to Tidwell that Respondent and Local 241 were so far apart he did not think they could reach agreement, even before negotiations with Local 241 had started, appears to be an expression of opinion not offered as a statement of fact. Moreover, Tabor had explained his remark by saying he felt better able to talk with Local 193. Indeed, Tabor was willing to negotiate with Local 193 without attorney participation. Similarily, Tabor's remarks to Tidwell regarding the merger of the two unions impressed me as innocuous and far short of a "successful attempt to prevent a merger of the two unions" argued by the General Counsel. Tabor's observation that if the two unions merged Local 193 would have Local 241's problems would appear to be nothing more than a vague offhand remark to a union officer that can in no way be regarded as an attempt to preclude the merger.

Without Windham's testimony, which I have refused to credit, I find little to sustain any conclusion that Respondent intended to avoid agreement in the bindery or maintenance negotiations. Respondent's concession bargaining was obviously very hard bargaining and Respondent intended it to be so. However, overall examination of Respondent's proposals and counterproposals, considered in light of the Union's responses or lack of response, does not reflect that Respondent was making an insincere effort to reach agreement. Accordingly, I find and conclude that the General Counsel has failed to establish by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Respondent intended to delay the bargaining process and not reach agreement with Local 241 in either the bindery or maintenance units. I therefore find Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in this regard.

C. Additional Allegations Concerning Respondent's Bad-Faith Bargaining

1. Unilateral changes in the bindery unit

The complaint, as amended, alleges that Respondent about 20 January implemented its last bargaining offer to the Union in the bindery unit and changed the terms and conditions of bindery unit employees in the specified respects. That Respondent did implement its last bindery proposal is not disputed. A comparison of Respondent's last proposal with the expired agreement between Respondent and the Union confirms, and Respondent does not dispute, the changes specified in the complaint.[7]

The General Counsel does not contest the existence of an impasse in bargaining at the time of Respondent's implementation of its proposal. However, the argument is made that the impasse was the product of Respondent's bad-faith bargaining and therefore not reached in good faith. I have concluded above that Respondent's overall bargaining on the contractual issues was done in good faith. I therefore conclude that the impasse reached was a legitimate one, and that Respondent was entitled to implement its last proposal. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 745 (1962). Accordingly, I find no violation of Section 8(a)(5) in Respondent's 20 January changes in the bindery unit.

2. Unilateral imposition of compulsory employee use of vacation time for Christmas shutdown

The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent, without prior bargaining with the Union, announced to employees on 16 October that employees would be charged any accumulated vacation time for the plant's Christmas shutdown rather than being granted leave without pay. The facts on the issue are not in significant dispute. On 16 October, Respondent posted a notice to employees stating that the plant would be closed during the Christmas holiday period and that employees would be charged any accumulated vacation time up to 5 days for the shutdown period. Employees with less than 5 days of accumulated vacation leave were to be charged with whatever vacation days they had accrued and not paid for any remaining days during the shutdown period. Local 241 was not advised of this announcement beforehand and there had been no bargaining on the subject.

Respondent had undergone one prior Christmas shutdown in 1984. In August 1984 Respondent had announced the shutdown, and, as in the 1985 announcement, had stated employees would be required to use their accumulated vacations during the shutdown, which was for a 4-workday period. On that occasion, however, the Union persuaded Respondent to allow employees to voluntarily use vacation time during the shutdown rather than taking it compulsory. During a 1 November negotiating session Local 241 protested Respondent's latest requirement of vacation use during the shutdown claiming it was not in accord with the practice the preceding year. Respondent's negotiators, Blue, Tabor, and Goodwin, who were not employed by Respondent the preceding year, stated they would have to check it out. Subsequently, however, during a bargaining session on 6 November, Respondent reasserted its intention to charge employees vacation time during the shutdown[8] but pro-

[7] Such changes related to call-in pay, funeral leave, health and welfare provisions, hours of work and overtime, holidays, seniority, vacations, pension plan, wage scale, and manning. While the General Counsel in his brief alluded to a change in the provision on jury duty, a comparison of Respondent's offer with the prior contract fails to disclose any change.

[8] Blue in his testimony conceded that Respondent's negotiators had checked with Windham who reported that employee use of vacations during the 1984 shutdown had been voluntary to his recollection. How-posed that for the 1986 Christmas shutdown Respondent would be willing to apply three 1986 holidays to the shutdown with any remaining shutdown time to be charged to employees' accrued vacations. Apparently, the Union neither accepted nor rejected the proposal.

At the 7 November negotiation meeting, Respondent stated its final position on the matter in the absence of any counterproposal from the Union. That position was that vacation time would be charged to employees during the shutdown. On 8 November the Union filed a grievance on Respondent's "Forced use of vacation time at Christmas," and requested as a remedy that vacation use be voluntary as in the past. The grievance was denied by Respondent. Peggy Powers, the Union's bindery head steward, testified that Goodwin stated that the Union would not be able to take the grievance to arbitration because the shutdown would occur after the contract expired. In view of that statement, Powers said the Union did not seek arbitration. It did file the charge in Case 12-CA-11819 complaining of Respondent's "unilateral change." As a result, Respondent on 18 December announced that the issue on use of accrued vacation pay during the shutdown had not been resolved and stated that if any employee did not wish to use their accrued vacation during the shutdown they were to let their supervisors know. The announcement further stated that depending on final resolution "by the Labor Board and if the Labor Board so orders, by an arbitrator," employees would either receive their vacation pay or be permitted to schedule their vacation in the future.

a. Contentions

The General Counsel argues that the requirement of use of accrued vacation time constituted a change in working conditions about which Respondent was obligated to bargain citing Mountaineer Excavating Co., 241 NLRB 414 (1979), enfd. 618 F.2d 102 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 449 U.S. 835 (1980). Respondent's subsequent discussions in negotiations with the Union on this subject did not "cure" its prior unilateral action because such discussions reflected no real willingness to reconsider its action. Thus, the unilateral action remained a violation of Section 8(a)(5). The General Counsel further argues that because employee rights to vacation time grew out of the collective-bargaining agreement the grievance filed by the Union was arguably grounded in the contract, and because Respondent announced its decision on the vacation use within the contract period and the grievance was filed by the Union during that period Respondent, under Nolde Brothers, Inc. v. Local 358 Bakery & Confectionary Workers, 430 U.S. 243 (1977), had a duty to arbitrate the grievance.

Respondent's brief argues that there was negotiation with the Union on the involuntary vacation use and that after an impasse was reached it was free to implement its preimpasse offer to the union. In this position Respondent relies on the testimony of union negotiator and steward Peggy Powers who answered affirmatively when asked on cross-examination whether the Company and Union had bargained concerning the Christmas shutdown for 1985. Moreover, Respondent asserts that as a result of the negotiations and in order to keep the issue from becoming moot, it preserved the position of the parties by its 18 December announcement regarding the shutdown and vacation use. With respect to the failure to arbitrate the issue, Respondent contends the Union never formally requested arbitration and thus waived its right to arbitration. Further, Respondent asserts that because the Union's grievance involved a dispute arising after the contract's expiration date (i.e., the Christmas shutdown did not take place until after the 30 November contract expiration, the dispute could not be arbitrable under the expired contract. In this respect, Respondent would distinguish the instant case from the facts in American Sink Top & Cabinet Co., 242 NLRB 408 (1979), referred to at the hearing by the General Counsel.

b. Conclusions

In agreement with the General Counsel's argument, I conclude the scheduling of employee vacations was a term and condition of employment. Vacations were provided for by the collective-bargaining agreement, and only in the case of vacations in excess of 2 weeks did Respondent reserve the right to designate when the employee could schedule the vacation (G.C. Exh. 2, p. 9). Thus, Respondent's announcement of 16 October was not specifically authorized by the bargaining agreement, and Respondent therefore had a duty to bargain with the Union on the matter. It had not done so prior to the announcement. Notwithstanding Powers' testimony, which I view only as a concession that the parties discussed the Christmas shutdown during negotiations, there was no change of position by either side on the point. While Respondent made a counterproposal regarding the handling of vacations during the 1986 Christmas shutdown, it made no similar proposal with respect to the 1985 shutdown. Respondent failed to deviate from its initial position even after admittedly ascertaining that its position was probably contrary to what had been done during the 1984 Christmas shutdown. Respondent advanced no particular reason or explanation for its position and there was no explanation of why adhering to the plan utilized in 1984 as urged by the Union was unacceptable.

Because Respondent's announcement did constitute a departure from what had been done the preceding year one can only conclude that the purpose of Respondent's action was to insure employee use of as much vacation time as possible in order to preclude the possibility of paying accrued vacation to employees during any subsequent strike. After all, in his strike plan memo, Goodwin had observed, "Rose does not want striking employees to be receiving vacation pay." There was, I conclude, no true bargaining on the subject by Respondent, only a reaffirmation of the position it had already announced without any expression of justification. There was thus no true impasse. Under these circumstances and even though the Union had proffered no counterproposal to the use of vacation time during the shutdown relying in-ever, Blue testified that because Windham had not made the final decision on the subject and because Blue was uncertain about the matter, Respondent maintained its position on the involuntary use of vacation for the 1985 shutdown.

stead on past practice to substantiate its position, I find Respondent in its "discussions" with the Union did not "cure" its initial act of bad faith in its unilateral action. I find therefore Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in this regard as alleged.

I find no merit in Respondent's contention that its refusal to arbitrate the grievance on the vacation pay during the shutdown was warranted because the Union had not formally requested arbitration. There is no dispute that Goodwin had stated that Respondent would not arbitrate the grievance because of the expiration of the bargaining agreement prior to the implementation of Respondent's plan. The law does not require the performance of a useless act and clearly a subsequent formal request to arbitrate would have been denied on the same grounds announced by Goodwin and argued presently in this case.

Respondent's defense that there was no obligation to arbitrate because since the implementation of its proposal would take place beyond the contract expiration date requires examination of the arbitration provision itself. That provision, article 16, section 1, is rather broad and makes arbitration available "should a difference arise between the Employer and the Union or any of the employees as to the meaning of and application of the provisions of this Agreement . . . ." Because the contract specifically provided for vacations for employees, with Respondent reserving the right to schedule those vacation days only in excess of 2 weeks, it appears that the Union's grievance is arguably bottomed on the contract. In addition, there appears to be no evidence in the case from which I could conclude that the parties had not intended the arbitration provision not to end with the contract's term. In this respect then, I find American Sink Top, supra, and Digmor Equipment & Engineering Co., 261 NLRB 1175 (1982), controlling. In the former case, the Board held that where parties to a collective-bargaining agreement had agreed therein to grievance and arbitration procedures, the parties' duty to arbitrate survived the termination of the contract where the dispute arising subsequent to the contract termination date was one that concerned an obligation arguably created by the expired contract. The latter case applied American Sink Top to find unlawful an employer's refusals to arbitrate a grievance filed after the bargaining agreement expired concerning the postcontract discharge of an employee for conduct occurring before the contract expired. I can perceive no basis for the distinction Respondent would draw between the two cited cases and the instant one based on the fact that Respondent's announced compulsory use of vacation time was not to take effect until after the contract's expiration date. The dispute arose during the contract term and arguably involves rights created by the contract even though Respondent's plan was not to be implemented until after the contract expired. Clearly the right to accrued vacation survived the termination of the bargaining agreement, and the dispute concerning the involuntary scheduling of that vacation arose during the term of the contract. Not having been resolved by good-faith bargaining to impasse, as I have found above, the dispute was fully subject to the grievance procedure including arbitration. See Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908, 922 (1981). Respondent's refusal to arbitrate the grievances, I find, constituted a breach of its bargaining obligation and a violation of Section 8(a)(5) as alleged.

3. Withdrawal of union recognition in maintenance unit and imposition of changes

a. The General Counsel's evidence

The consolidated complaint, as amended, alleges that Respondent through Personnel Manager Goodwin in February and March unlawfully directed employees to initiate and circulate a petition among its maintenance employees to decertify the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, and on 5 March unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in that unit. To establish these complaint allegations, the General Counsel relies solely on the testimony of George Hayson, an electrician employed in the maintenance unit on 18 September. Hayson, who had sustained a back injury on 9 April resulting in his receipt of workmen's compensation and an extensive absence from work beginning 28 April and continuing through the hearing, testified in great detail about the involvement of Respondent's representatives in Hayson's preparation and circulation of a petition among the maintenance employees rejecting the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Hayson had been employed by Respondent on 18 September, had never joined the Union, and had not participated in the strike that began in January. Hayson testified that in February, Goodwin approached Hayson in the plant and asked Hayson to do him a favor. He then asked Hayson to come to his office where they could talk in private. On the way to Goodwin's office they passed the office of Plant Manager Tabor and Goodwin remarked to Tabor as he passed that they were going to "make the call." In Goodwin's office, Goodwin said he wanted Hayson to make one phone call and explained that Respondent could not give the maintenance employees any increase in benefits without having the Union decertified because Respondent was legally bound to negotiate with the strikers. Goodwin then asked Hayson to call the "company's attorney," and produced a business card of an Orlando, Florida attorney saying the attorney would provide him with a word-for-word description of how to file a decertification petition.[9] Hayson inquired why Goodwin could not do "this" and Goodwin replied he was a member of management. When Hayson responded that he was not a member of the Union, Goodwin remarked that Hayson was eligible to be in the Union. Hayson picked up the phone and dialed the number unsuccessfully. Goodwin then dialed the number for Hayson and handed him the phone. Hayson learned that Brown was out but would be back later that afternoon. Hayson said he would call back and thereupon left Goodwin's office.

[9] Hayson could not recall the name of the attorney supplied by Goodwin. Based on the testimony of Dorothy Greene, an associate attorney in the firm of Richson and Brown, the attorney who Hayson had attempted to call was Jim Brown, a partner in the firm.

It appears that Hayson made no additional attempt to reach Brown that day. The following day Goodwin inquired of Hayson whether he had called Brown back. Hayson replied he had become preoccupied and had not called back. Goodwin stated it was a priority matter that had to be taken care of and again took Hayson to Goodwin's office, again passing Tabor and again telling him they were going to make "the call." Hayson did not have Brown's business card previously given him by Goodwin so Goodwin again supplied Hayson the phone number. Further, Goodwin placed the call for Hayson, and gave him the phone. However, again Brown was not in.

On following days Goodwin made repeated inquiries of Hayson about calling the attorney, but Hayson "stalled" him. On 3 March after lunch Hayson was approached by Goodwin with Hayson's supervisor, Al Patterson. Goodwin told Hayson to leave his tools and come to Goodwin's office explaining that they had to make the call that day and that Tabor had sent Goodwin to get him. Goodwin and Hayson passed Tabor in the hallway and Tabor asked if they were going to take care of "this." Goodwin said they were and Tabor noted that they might need Ethel Friend, executive secretary to Rosenberg, Tabor, and Goodwin. Goodwin summoned Friend and she and Hayson sat in Goodwin's office while Goodwin went to confer with Tabor. Tabor returned, dialed Brown's number for Hayson, and handed him the phone instructing him to get a word-for-word description of what to do repeating it aloud so Hayson and Friend could both take notes on what had to be done. This time Hayson talked to attorney Dorothy Greene who told him how to file a decertification petition, what the wording had to be, the percentage of people needed to support the petition, and where to file the petition. Further, Greene had said that the petition had to be notarized in the presence of all who signed it.

After the call was completed a dispute arose whether Friend, a notary public, would go out into the plant to watch the individual employees sign the petition. Goodwin summoned Tabor into the office, and Tabor stated that Friend would not go into the plant adding that she could notarize the petition after Hayson returned with the signatures. Goodwin noted that the bindery petition[10] he had received that morning was not notarized, and he suggested using the bindery petition language, which he secured from a filing cabinet. Hayson then copied the bindery language on his own petition. He thereafter set about getting signatures of the maintenance employees but not before Goodwin gave him instructions as to exactly who was in the maintenance unit and arguments to be used to encourage employees to sign the petition. Thus, Goodwin told Hayson to talk to each maintenance employee privately, and when Hayson expressed concern that the employees might fear a reduction in benefits if they signed in light of the reduction of benefits earlier in the bindery department, Goodwin told Hayson not to use Goodwin's name but assure them that signing the petition would not affect their benefits package. Hayson asked what to do about the "hard sales" and Goodwin directed Hayson to tell them that if they did not sign the petition the strikers would be back and they would be out of work.

It took Hayson about 30 minutes to secure the signatures of the five other working maintenance employees. He returned the petition to Goodwin and Friend notarized it. Goodwin then made copies and directed that they put a "disclosure" statement on the bottom of the petition saying Hayson had given the petition to Goodwin. Hayson hesitated asking what would happen if he did not. Goodwin replied "something to the effect" that he felt a printing house in Quincy, Florida, was hiring.[11] It is undisputed that Hayson thereupon wrote on the copy, "Given to David Goodwin on March 3rd, 1986 by George W. Hayson." Goodwin supplied a stamped envelope to Hayson for mailing the petition. Hayson addressed the envelope to the Board's Region 12, using the address supplied by Greene, and mailed the petition.

Hayson subsequently received a call from a staff member of the Regional Office who related the petition could not be processed in the form submitted and advised Hayson that a completed and correct form (Form NLRB-502) would be sent to him for signature.[12] Hayson later received the petition but did not execute it or return it to the Regional Office.

On several later occasions, Goodwin asked Hayson if he had heard from the original petition, and Hayson answered that he had not. At one time Goodwin asked if he was sure he had sent the original petition and Hayson replied that he had. Goodwin remarked that Hayson better have because they were counting on it.

Hayson subsequently reported to Goodwin and Tabor that the original petition had not been accepted by the Board. Tabor responded that he should not worry about it, that Respondent's attorney was taking care of the matter, but added that it would not hurt to sign the petition and send it back anyway. Several times thereafter Goodwin inquired whether he had returned the correct petition to the Labor Board.

It is undisputed that Respondent by letter to the Union dated 5 March withdrew recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit based on Hayson's petition. There is no contention by the General Counsel that the employees signing the petition did not constitute a majority of the maintenance employees. It is further undisputed and the complaint alleges that about 5 March Respondent instituted changes affecting the maintenance unit employees including the elimination of double time pay for Sunday work, the elimination of an eyeglass program, an increase in employee contributions to insurance coverage, a reduction in minimum "call back" pay, and the institution of changes in sick leave and vacations.

[10] As will be detailed infra, Goodwin in the morning of the same day received a petition from the bindery employees saying they no longer wanted the Union to be their collective-bargaining representative.

[11] This statement attributed to Goodwin is also alleged in the complaint as an unlawful threat of discharge in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[12] It is clear that Hayson's petition was inadequate under the requirements for decertification petitions set forth in Sec. 102.61 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

b. Respondent's evidence

Six witnesses were arrayed against various aspects of Hayson's testimony by Respondent. First, Tabor specifically denied any involvement in Hayson's petition and even any knowledge of Hayson's intent to circulate one. He denied being told Hayson was going to make a "call" regarding decertification information, denied that he discussed Friend's notarization of Hayson's petition, and denied that he had ever instructed Goodwin to summon Hayson to make any phone calls regarding decertification.

Similarly, Goodwin denied the conduct attributed to him by Hayson. Thus, Goodwin testified that Hayson initiated discussions with Goodwin about getting rid of the Union in early January and then on two occasions after the strike started. The last occasion was in mid-February when Hayson also complained that he and other maintenance employees were sick of having to go out and change employees' flat tires during the strike. Hayson specifically asked if there was something employees could do to get rid of these people. Goodwin said he would check in to it and thereafter supplied Hayson with the phone number of attorney Jim Brown. The next time the matter came up was on 3 March during lunch when Hayson saw Goodwin in the plant and asked if he could use Goodwin's telephone. Goodwin replied affirmatively. Later, after Goodwin returned to his office Hayson came in and initiated the call. Only then did Goodwin realize who Hayson was calling. Goodwin then left the office to call Friend in. After the call was completed, Hayson told Goodwin he had the language for a decertification petition but would need it notarized. Thereafter, Friend and Hayson left Goodwin's office. Goodwin denied that he discussed the notarization process. He further denied Tabor was even aware of what was going on. He specifically denied showing Hayson the bindery petition, and when Hayson brought the maintenance petition in and said it had to be notarized, Goodwin got Friend to do it. Goodwin also denied asking Hayson to write anything on the copy retained by Goodwin and likewise denied any threatening reference to Hayson about job openings in Quincy.

Friend testified she was called into Goodwin's office on 3 March after Hayson was already on the phone. She said she did not take any notes but after Hayson completed his call she discussed with Hayson her notarizing a petition. She left the office when Hayson left, and she testified there was no discussion regarding the names of unit employees between Hayson and Goodwin when she was present. She also denied that Goodwin had shown Hayson a copy of the bindery petition. Finally, when she subsequently came back to Goodwin's office to notarize Hayson's petition, nothing was said about Hayson signing the petition as being given to Goodwin and she corroborated Goodwin's denial of any threatening reference to available jobs in Quincy.

Al Patterson, maintenance engineer and Hayson's supervisor, in his testimony denied ever being present during any discussions between Goodwin on the Union and denied seeing them leave the plant floor to go to Goodwin's office, thereby implicitly corroborating Goodwin's testimony that Goodwin did not "get" Hayson to make the call on 3 March.

Attorney Dorothy Greene testified that on 3 March she had returned Hayson's calls to Jim Brown at Brown's request. Her testimony that she contacted Hayson that morning was supported by telephone bills from her office. She testified that Hayson discussed decertifying the Union with her briefly but indicated he had wanted to call her back after lunch. He did so and at that time she further explained to him the information regarding the filing of a decertification petition as set out in Section 102.60 of the Board's Rules.

Finally, to contradict Hayson's contention that he had not initiated the decertification discussions with Goodwin, Respondent presented maintenance employee Mike King who testified that on four or five occasions prior to Hayson's circulation of the decertification petition Hayson had talked about getting up such a petition to get the Union out of the Company. Hayson never mentioned anyone in management, and specifically Goodwin, supporting or promoting such a move. After the petition was signed by the maintenance employees and their benefits were subsequently cut, the maintenance employees were angry with Hayson, and, according to King, Hayson was "doing good" just to get the other employees to talk to him. King further testified that Hayson circulated another petition saying that by signing the petition the benefits would be restored.

C. Conclusion

From the foregoing it is apparent that Hayson's testimony cannot be reconciled with that of Respondent's witnesses. There is little room for misinterpretation or misunderstanding between the versions of the facts related by each side. A credibility resolution is therefore necessitated and if Hayson is credited, it must be concluded that Respondent flagrantly violated the Act. Demeanor is normally a significant consideration in resolving credibility. In assessing credibility here, one is compelled to initially note that Hayson was clearly an uneasy witness. Such uneasiness, however, could well be due to a back injury for which he was receiving treatment and which caused him to express some discomfort while testifying. The injury served to mask any discomfort with the content of his testimony and made less reliable the perception of deception. On the whole, however, I found Hayson no more convincing in demeanor than Respondent's witnesses, Goodwin, Tabor, Friend, and Patterson.

In assessing Hayson's testimony in light of all the record evidence, one must first start from the premise that he was an employee of Respondent at the time of the hearing, albeit absent due to his back injury, and that his employee status put him at risk as a result of his testimony adverse to Respondent. This factor tends to support his credibility. (See, e.g., Pittsburgh Press Co., 252 NLRB 500, 504 (1980); Georgia Rug Mill, 131 NLRB 1304, fn. 2 (1961).) On the other hand, Hayson had a clear and substantial motive for testifying against Respondent, for, based on the uncontradicted and credible testimony of Mike King, the other maintenance employees were angry with Hayson for circulation of the petition that enabled Respondent ultimately to cut their benefits. Hayson's testimony herein would serve to restore the benefits both to himself and the other maintenance employees and assuage their anger. Accordingly, Hayson can in no respect be considered as disinterested, and his testimony must be weighed with this in mind.

Greene's testimony provides the initial contradiction of Hayson concerning the events of 3 March. Not only did Greene impress me as more credible than Hayson, she had no monetary or job interests in the outcome of the proceeding and was less likely to be biased. Moreover, her testimony was substantiated by her office telephone bills. And, finally, Hayson did not specifically deny Greene's testimony that on the morning of 3 March he told her he would call her back later in the day. Hayson simply professed a lack of recall on this point. Such lack of recall was uncharacteristic for him in light of his other detailed testimony. Crediting Greene's testimony, I must conclude that Hayson's testimony about Goodwin coming to get him and taking him to the office after lunch on 3 March is improbable and it is more likely that Hayson, as Goodwin contends, approached Goodwin during lunch that day requesting use of Goodwin's phone. Accordingly, I do not credit Hayson on this point, and find Goodwin's contrary testimony to be more credible. Moreover, based on King's credible testimony that Hayson on several occasions, without reference to Goodwin, had talked to King about getting up a petition against the Union, I find reasonable Goodwin's claim that Hayson had originally broached the idea of getting rid of the Union to Goodwin. I therefore credit Goodwin over Hayson on this point also and find that Goodwin's supplying of the name and number of attorney Brown was in response to Hayson's inquiries. Such action by Goodwin under these circumstances did not in itself constitute unlawful assistance in the decertification process. See Amer-Cal Industries, 274 NLRB 1046 (1985).

There are other portions of Hayson's testimony that cannot be so easily discredited. His contention that he copied the bindery petition shown to him by Goodwin while contradicted by Goodwin and Friend appears to be supported by the fact that the language on the two petitions is identical. It is true that the petition language was short and simple stating: "We the undersigned employees of Rose Printing, no longer wish to be represented by G.C.I.U., Local 241-B for the purpose of collective bargaining." Nevertheless, chance duplication by unsophisticated employees would appear to be unlikely. However, Hayson in what appears to be a contradiction of his own claim about the source of the language conceded that Greene had given him "the actual wording of how it [the petition] had to be." Greene confirmed that she had given Hayson "basically the contents" of a petition including an allegation that the employees "no longer wished to be represented by the particular union." In view of this, I conclude that the identical language on the petitions is not conclusive and find more convincing the denials of Goodwin and Friend that the bindery petition was shown to Hayson. On the other hand, I do believe that Goodwin told Hayson that the bindery petition was not notarized. Otherwise, Hayson had no way of knowing that undisputed fact. Further, a canvass of the record discloses no specific denial by Goodwin that he told Hayson this.

I also find convincing the mutually corroborative testimony of Goodwin, Friend, and Tabor that Tabor was not involved in any way with Hayson's petition and the events that transpired in Goodwin's office on 3 March. Tabor's denials in particular appeared to be forthright, emphatic, and sincere.

I further credit Goodwin and Friend regarding the absence of any requirement that Hayson indicate on the copy of the petition he gave Goodwin that it was voluntarily "given" to Goodwin, and the absence of any threat to Hayson to make him surrender a copy of the petition. There was no similar language on the bindery unit petition, and no reason appears why Goodwin would find it unnecessary on that petition while requiring it on Hayson's petition. I also note that Hayson's testimony on this issue was somewhat contradictory and was far from being emphatic. Thus, he claimed that Goodwin asked him to use the words "voluntarily given" but Hayson only wrote "given" to suggest he was not doing it voluntarily. In his prehearing statement to the Board investigator, Hayson made the specific claim that he had couched his release of the document to Goodwin in language that would indicate to someone reading it that it had not been surrendered voluntarily. Obviously, it falls far short of accomplishing this purpose, and on the contrary casts serious doubt on Hayson's contention. Moreover, no basis for any reluctance by Hayson to give Goodwin a copy of the petition was explained on the record. Finally, it must also be noted that the threat Hayson attributed to Goodwin to reflect on the petition that it was "given" to Goodwin was prefaced in Hayson's testimony by the equivocal words "to the effect" indicating, at best, Hayson's equivocation and uncertainty if not an attempt to prevaricate. Accordingly, I conclude there was no unlawful threat violative of Section 8(a)(1) issued to Hayson on this point and shall recommend that the complaint allegation regarding such threat be dismissed.

Hayson's contention that following 3 March, Goodwin made repeated inquiries about the status of Hayson's petition with the Board and stated that Respondent was counting on it impresses me as patently incredible. A single inquiry by Goodwin might be credible since Goodwin was well aware that Hayson intended to file the petition with the Board, but repeated inquiries and a statement that Goodwin or Respondent was counting on it just does not square with other facts. Respondent quickly withdrew recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit based on the petition copy provided by Hayson. In view of this it would be illogical for Respondent to urge Hayson to proceed in any manner with the petition. For the same reason, I find incredible Hayson's testimony that Tabor said to go ahead and file with the Board the later petition, corrected as to form and supplied by a Board agent to Hayson. Moreover, Hayson never filed the corrected petition, a fact that lends credence to the absence of any encouragement from Goodwin or Tabor to do so.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the record shows some subtle assistance accorded Hayson in his preparation and circulation of the petition. Thus, Goodwin allowed Hayson to use his office telephone to make a long distance telephone call to discuss the petition with Greene. The Board has found action such as this to be supportive of a finding of unlawful assistance. See Cummins Component Plant, 259 NLRB 456, 461 (1981). And Hayson's testimony that Goodwin gave him a stamped envelope in which to send the original petition to the Board was not contradicted. In the absence of such contradiction, I credit Hayson on this point.[13] An employer's provision of a stamped envelope in similar circumstances has also been regarded by the Board as evidence of unlawful interference. Id. Hayson's testimony that Goodwin supplied him with certain names of unit employees so that he could obtain their signatures was also not specifically denied by Goodwin and is credited. While the supplying of such names in itself may not be unlawful, Montgomery Ward & Co., 187 NLRB 956 (1971), it is clearly a factor for consideration in determining the existence of unlawful assistance.

In addition, it must have been obvious to Goodwin that Hayson was going to secure, and in fact did secure, employee signatures on the petition during worktime. After all, by Goodwin's testimony, Hayson asked to use Goodwin's phone after lunch and came to Goodwin's office around 1 p.m. Hayson subsequently left with his petition and brought it back with signatures at 2:15 p.m. according to a notation on Respondent's copy of the petition. Since according to Hayson it took him about 30 minutes to obtain the signatures, he must have circulated the petition to Goodwin's knowledge on worktime. Yet, there was no admonition by Goodwin beforehand against circulating it on worktime and no reprimand after Hayson returned the petition. Permitting an employee during worktime to circulate antiunion petitions has been held to constitute unlawful assistance. See Daisy's Originals, Inc., 187 NLRB 251 (1970).

Even Friend's presence in Goodwin's office during the Hayson call to Greene appears to have been intended to provide assistance. While Friend, contrary to Hayson, asserted she took no notes, there is no other explanation on the record for her presence than to provide assistance. And, Friend did in fact assist Hayson by providing notarization services with Respondent's condonation, apparently free of charge.

Finally, a search of the record reveals no specific denials by Goodwin of Hayson's testimony that Goodwin told him what to tell "hard sale" employees as well as those who might be concerned about a loss of benefits if the Union were decertified. To be sure, Friend's testimony suggests Goodwin gave Hayson no unit employee names while she was present, but it is to be noted that Hayson and Goodwin were together prior to the time Friend ever came into the room. And while I would be inclined to discredit Hayson where contradicted, it appears to me that his testimony in this instance was not all fabrication. In view of the undisputed acts of assistance set forth above, I find it not unlikely that Goodwin did supply Hayson with arguments to be used on the maintenance employees. Accordingly, and in light of the absence of specific contradiction, I credit Hayson on this point.[14]

"[A]n employer's solicitation, support, or assistance in the initiation, signing, or filing of an employee decertification petition interferes with the employees' Section 7 rights." Placke Toyota, 251 NLRB 395 (1974). I conclude that the sum of Respondent's conduct here constituted unlawful assistance to Hayson in the preparation and circulation of the decertification petition. Such conduct of Respondent includes allowing Hayson to use its phone for long distance purposes, its allowing Hayson to circulate the petition on worktime, providing Hayson with a stamped envelope for mailing the petition to the Board, providing him with notarization services at no apparent cost, and giving instructions to Hayson by Goodwin of what to tell employees in securing their signatures on the petition. Accordingly, I find Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in this regard as the consolidated complaint alleges.

Since the petition was a product of unlawful assistance, Respondent was not entitled to rely on the petition as valid grounds for doubting the Union's continued majority status. Respondent was therefore under a continuing obligation to bargain collectively with the Union as the representative of the maintenance employees and its withdrawal of recognition of the Union on 5 March and subsequent refusal to recognize the Union violated Section 8(a)(5) as alleged. Architectural Woodwork Corp., 280 NLRB 930 (1986); Daisy's Originals, supra. It further follows that the changes in employee benefits instituted by Respondent in the maintenance unit after the unlawful withdrawal recognition from the Union constituted unilateral changes at a time Respondent was still obligated to deal with the Union. I find such changes violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as alleged.

4. Withdrawal of recognition in bindery unit

a. November conduct of Foreman Capps

The complaint alleged that Respondent through Supervisor Johnny Capps, foreman in Respondent's folding and stitching department, in November urged its employees to circulate a petition seeking to decertify the Union as bargaining representative of the bindery employees. Evidence on the issue is found in the testimony of bindery employee David Shivar who related that in the fall of 1985, feeling that he was being "harassed" by the Union, he had asked Capps how he "could get the Union from harassing me." Capps responded that he did not know but would find out. Subsequently, Capps returned and told Shivar that if he wanted the Union to stop harassing him he could pass around a decertification petition. Shivar told Capps he did not know about the wording for such a petition. Capps again responded by saying he would get back with him on that. Sometime thereafter Capps gave Shivar the name and number of an attorney[15] to call, and Shivar called the attorney from Capps office, although it is not clear whether Capps was present at the time. The attorney, whose name Shivar could not recall, told Shivar the necessary steps to take in connection with the petition, and later, Shivar prepared and attempted to circulate a petition. However, only about eight people signed the petition and Shivar dropped any further action on it.

---

[13] It is clear and not uncommon that a trier of fact where warranted may believe some but not all of what a witness says. See, e.g., Enterprise Products Co., 265 NLRB 544, 546, fn. 2 (1982).

[14] In reaching this conclusion, I also note that Goodwin was vague regarding any discussions with Hayson after Hayson finished his phone conversation with Greene. He testified as follows:

> Q. What happened after he hung up the phone?
> A. He told me that he had the wording for a decertification petition and that he would need to have it notarized.
> Q. Okay. Give me the whole conversation in your office.
> A. Basically that was the end of the conversation.

Such testimony even omits the discussion regarding the notarization process that Friend admits took place.

Arguments and conclusions

Capps did not testify Shivar's testimony was uncontradicted. Such testimony is credited.

The General counsel argues that Capps implanted the idea of decertification in Shivar's mind and therefore went beyond mere "ministerial assistance." The argument is bottomed on the fact that Shivar had inquired about stopping certain unspecified harassment by the Union, not decertification. Respondent in its defense viewed Shivar's testimony as presenting Capps with a request for information on "getting rid of the Union," and asserts Capps did nothing more than give him the name and number of an attorney.

An employer "does not violate the Act by referring an employee to the Board in response to a request for advice relative to removing the union as bargaining representative." Placke Toyota, supra. The same can apparently be said when the employer refers the employee to an attorney, rather than the Board, if the attorney is unconnected to the employer as in the case sub judice. On the other hand, any solicitation, support, or assistance by an employer in the initiation, signing, or filing of a decertification petition is unlawful and violates the Act. Id. However, an employer's providing information regarding a decertification petition in direct response to requests by an employee for such information does not violate the Act. See Amer-Cal Industries, supra.

The initiation of a decertification petition may result from nothing more than an idea implanted in an employee's mind by the employer. See Weisser Optical Co., 274 NLRB 961 (1985). Here the evidence shows that Shivar complained to Capps about unspecified harassment. Capps' response was to tell Shivar he could pass around a decertification petition, and then provided Shivar with a source for further information. Although decertification may perhaps constitute a "remedy" for certain union "harassment," it could well constitute "overkill" for any immediate and legitimate concerns by Shivar of harassment that could be entirely unrelated to a desire not to have the Union represent him or other employees. On the evidence here, there is no basis for a conclusion that Capps' referral to a decertification petition in his reply to Shivar's question was an appropriate response. Rather, and without more, Capps' reference to a decertification petition, in my opinion, amounted to an unsolicited suggestion that decertification was the only alternative available for Shivar's concerns, whatever they were. Under these circumstances, I conclude Capps effectively implanted the idea of decertification in Shivar's mind. In this regard, I conclude, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

b. The petition circulated by Rogers

Carrie Rogers, a 17-year employee of Respondent who worked in the bindery department and who did not join in the Union's strike, testified that she circulated a petition among Respondent's bindery employees on 28 February and 3 March stating they no longer wished the Union to represent them. Rogers, who contended that she had resigned from the Union in October, secured a majority of the unit employees' signatures on the petition. She testified that she gave the petition to Goodwin at 8:15 a.m. on 3 March.

The General Counsel does not contest the facts surrounding Rogers' circulation of the petition asserting only that Rogers' testimony raises "doubts about how she went about circulating the petition." Nevertheless, the General Counsel's position is that Rogers' petition was invalid because it arose in the context of Respondent's unfair labor practices, and that Respondent therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when it withdrew recognition from the Union based on Rogers' petition.

As Respondent's brief notes, an employer may refuse to bargain with a union if it has a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. Generally, a petition rejecting the Union signed by a majority of unit employees would provide a good-faith doubt warranting withdrawal of recognition in the absence of unfair labor practices on the part of the employer. (See, e.g., Hemet Casting Co., 260 NLRB 437 (1982). However, not all unfair labor practices will serve to preclude an otherwise valid petition from being a legal basis for withdrawal of recognition. (See, e.g., Carolina American Textiles, 219 NLRB 457 (1975); Vernon Mfg. Co., 219 NLRB 622 (1975).) I have previously found that Respondent violated the Act in November in implanting the idea of a decertification petition in the mind of employee Shivar. However, Shivar's petition was dropped more than 3 months prior to Rogers' petition and there is no evidence that Rogers had ever been aware of Shivar's petition. It is therefore impossible to conclude that Rogers' petition flowed from, or was in any way related to, Shivar's petition. And there is no evidence that Rogers' petition was a product of independent unlawful suggestion, encouragement or assistance. And it was completed prior to Hayson's petition, discussed supra, which I concluded resulted from unlawful assistance.

As to the occurrence of Roger's petition in the context of other unfair labor practices, I previously found, supra, that Respondent did not lawfully bargain with regard to the compulsory use of vacation time during the Christmas shutdown. It is to be noted, however, Respondent did at least preserve the issue of compulsory use of vacation time so that employees would not be adversely affected until after the Board had ruled on the matter. Respondent's unlawful act in this regard which also occurred at least 2 months prior to Rogers' petition could hardly have influenced the initiation or circulation of the petition and there was no direct evidence connecting the two events. It follows, and I conclude, that Rogers' petition was not unlawfully tainted by the unfair labor practices previously found. Accordingly, and because it is not disputed that Rogers' petition was signed by a majority of unit employees, I find that the petition provided a legitimate basis for doubt as to the Union's majority status, and that Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union in the bindery unit did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[15] Respondent's attorney Blue admittedly advised Tabor and Goodwin that during negotiations employees might be displeased with the Union and seek to decertify it. Blue further advised them that it supervisors were asked about decertification they should not talk about it. Blue gave them a number of the law firm of Richson and Brown in Orlando, Florida, unrelated to Blue's firm, to provide employees information on decertification.

D. Respondent's Actions Against Hayson

1. The facts claimed by Hayson

The complaint, as amended, alleges that Respondent on 8 April imposed more onerous and rigorous terms of employment on Hayson by transferring him from the day to night shift on 11 April and issued a written warning to him all because of his union or other protected concerted activities. It also alleged that Respondent on 26 April, through Goodwin, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals because employees had given testimony under the Act.

To support the allegation, Hayson testified that on 7 April he was switched from his day shift, which ended at 4:15 p.m., to the night shift starting at 11:15 p.m. as a result of Respondent's increase in work volume flowing from the start up of the new state legislative session. Supervisor Patterson advised him of the change and when Hayson pointed out to Patterson that there was a new electrician with less seniority, Patterson simply replied that seniority did not mean anything and he had been told to tell Hayson of the change. Hayson further protested to Patterson that no electrician had previously been assigned the night shift but Patterson answered that it was company policy.

On 11 April, Hayson received a written reprimand from Patterson which Patterson had left in Hayson's locker. The reprimand complained of insubordination by Hayson in failing to comply with instructions regarding (a) preparing circuit boards for shipment for repair, (b) supplying power to the prep department light table, and (c) placing locks on certain cabinets. The reprimand noted that Hayson had a history of not willingly following orders and concluded with the warning that any further insubordination would result in discharge.

Hayson testified that he telephoned Patterson about the reprimand and Patterson stated that Tabor had told him to write Hayson up. Hayson complained that the basis for the reprimand was fictitious and Patterson responded that Hayson had the "higher ups pissed off" at him. Hayson asked Patterson if he thought it had anything to do with the petition, and Patterson answered that he thought it did.

The following day Hayson telephoned Tabor and asked him about the matter. Tabor professed ignorance of the warning, claimed he had never said anything to Patterson about it, but said he would speak to Patterson. Subsequently, according to Hayson, Patterson, about 13 April, called Hayson and inquired about his injured back and then told Hayson that Patterson had "his ass chewed out about the reprimand issued Hayson." Patterson added that Tabor had told him that no disciplinary action was to be taken without Tabor's approval. When Hayson pointed out that Patterson had initially told Hayson that the reprimand was at Tabor's direction, Patterson answered that Tabor was just lying or trying to weasel out of it or "something—to that effect.

Hayson in his testimony denied that he was guilty of the conduct complained of in the reprimand. Specifically, he contended he had been told to repair the circuit boards, not send them in for repair, that he was unable to install the locks without hasps which he had requisitioned, and that he had received no order to supply power to the light table.

Finally, in connection with the alleged threat by Goodwin, Hayson testified that subsequent to 28 April when he was ill at home with his back injury he was telephoned by Goodwin. Goodwin inquired about Hayson's back and then inquired if Hayson had seen the article appearing in a local newspaper on 25 April regarding Respondent's possible violations of the Act. The article referred to comments of a spokesman of the NLRB in the Jacksonville resident office noting that the Board had evidence supporting "the union's charges that [Respondent] had broken labor rules when non-striking workers voted to reject the union after the strike." Hayson acknowledged that he had seen the article and expressed to Goodwin his "wonder at what went wrong." Goodwin replied, still according to Hayson, "Oh, we knew what went wrong and we knew who the traitor is," and "we're taking care of it.

Contrary to Hayson's testimony, Patterson testified that he was told to put an electrician on the night shift by Tabor during the legislative session and would have assigned the junior electrician, Buffo, to the shift except that Hayson volunteered to take the night shift. The advantage to the night shift, Patterson pointed out, was that it paid a shift premium and employees on the shift worked 6 days a week and consequently got 8 hours of overtime. However, Hayson was on the shift a week when he wanted off. Patterson advised him if he came back to day shift, he would have to help out with the "sewing machine." Hayson said he did not want to do mechanical work and opted to stay on the third shift.

Patterson conceded that he had issued the written reprimand to Hayson but insisted the reprimand was warranted. Specifically Hayson had refused to follow orders about preparing circuit boards for shipment, an item of some concern to Tabor who made repeated inquiries to Patterson about the circuit boards. Patterson insisted he had told Hayson for three nights to supply power to a light table, and Hayson had failed to do it. Finally, regarding the installation of locks, Patterson related that Hayson had told him that two could not be installed.

Eight others could be but Hayson failed to install them. Patterson denied that anyone told him to give the warning to Hayson and maintained that neither Tabor nor Goodwin knew about it beforehand. When Tabor learned of the warning he told Patterson he wanted prior notification of all reprimands and issued a memorandum to all department heads to this effect.[16] Patterson specifically denied telling Hayson that the reprimand was directed by Tabor, that management was "pissed off" at Hayson, or that Tabor was trying to weasel out of responsibility for the reprimand.

Tabor's testimony was in full accord with Patterson's. He acknowledged Hayson called him about the reprimand from Patterson but emphatically stated he was not aware of the reprimand beforehand and denied he had told Patterson to issue it. He said the issuance of a reprimand without Tabor's knowledge was contrary to policy, and he so advised Patterson. Tabor added, without contradiction, that after the reprimand he called Patterson and Hayson to his office and told them that each had skills Respondent needed and admonished them to try to get along and work together but also told Hayson that he would have to follow Patterson's instructions.

Goodwin denied in his testimony calling Hayson at his home and making the remark concerning the traitor that Hayson attributed to him. Further, Goodwin testified he had never called Hayson at his home to talk about the Union or anything dealing with unions, and while he acknowledged calling Hayson at his home about the hiring of maintenance employee Mike King,[17] he specifically and emphatically denied calling Hayson at his home after his back injury.

2. Conclusion

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the Board held that in all 8(a)(3) or 8(a)(1) cases turning on employer motivation, the General Counsel must establish a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's action, and, afterwards once a prima facie case is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of protected conduct. Here, I am persuaded the General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case that any action taken against Hayson was discriminatory. Clearly, Hayson was not engaged in union activity. And while he may well have been engaged in protected conduct in connection with his decertification petition activity, there is absolutely no evidence to establish Respondent was unhappy with his actions in that regard. Further, at the time of the shift change and the reprimand Hayson had not even been contacted by the Board investigators regarding the Union's charge.[18] Under these circumstances, there was no basis for Respondent to be motivated to take action against Hayson for his protected conduct and thus no basis for concluding protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the alleged discriminatory action against Hayson.

Even assuming that Hayson's testimony established a prima facie case, I would not find the violations alleged because I do not credit Hayson's testimony. Patterson's testimony impressed me as reasonable and his demeanor during his testimony conveyed the impression of honesty and conviction. Weighed against the testimony of Hayson, I find Patterson decidedly more credible. Moreover, it is difficult to perceive how a transfer to a shift which would allow Hayson to make significantly more money, would nevertheless be discriminatory, particularly in the absence of evidence that the work was more arduous or rigorous or that Hayson would encounter transportation or other personal problems that to Respondent's knowledge would make it more difficult for him to man the shift. I find under all these circumstances, it was more likely, as Patterson testified, that Hayson volunteered for the shift and only later decided he wanted to return to the day shift.

I also credit Patterson's testimony supported by Tabor regarding the reprimand of Hayson. Again there appeared to be no logical basis for Respondent's unhappiness with Hayson for union or protected activities or any basis other than those items specified in Patterson's reprimand. Patterson may well have alluded to Tabor's concerns about the circuit boards in his discussion with Hayson, since Tabor admits expressing concern to Patterson and directing him to get the boards shipped. However, Patterson's telling Hayson of this does not establish that Tabor directed issuance of the reprimand. It is more likely that he did not, for, otherwise, it would have been unnecessary for Tabor to subsequently admonish Patterson not to issue reprimands without his knowledge. In addition, Tabor's subsequent issuance of a memo to department heads not to issue reprimands without his knowledge would constitute a rather drastic step for one who is simply trying to "weasel out" of responsibility for Hayson's reprimand. Accordingly, crediting Patterson and Tabor's testimony, which was mutually supportive and entirely plausible and credible, I conclude that the reprimand issued to Hayson was not discriminatorily motivated and that neither Hayson's transfer to the night shift nor his reprimand was violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

I do not credit Hayson's testimony over that of Goodwin attributing to Goodwin a reference to Respondent's knowing who the "traitor" was. Goodwin's denial of the remark was emphatic and persuasively delivered. I therefore find Goodwin did not make the remark Hayson attributed to Goodwin and Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in this regard.

[16] Patterson conceded that he had given prior reprimands to employees in the maintenance department without incident, but he was not aware whether Tabor knew of such warnings.

[17] Hayson had been instrumental in King's obtaining employment with Respondent.

[18] It appears Hayson gave his first statement to the Board investigators on 16 April. Even then there is no evidence Respondent was aware of his having given a statement.

E. Nature of the Strike

The General Counsel argues as the complaint alleges that the strike that began about 22 January by the bindery unit and the maintenance unit employees was caused by the unfair labor practices of Respondent. It is urged that the bindery employees as well as the maintenance employees struck to protest Respondent's bargaining conduct, which amounted to a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Respondent, on the other hand, argues that it committed no violation of the Act so the strike could only be regarded as an economic strike.

It is horn book labor law that a strike caused in whole or in part by an employer's unfair labor practices constitutes an unfair labor practice strike. NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938). Conversely, an economic strike is one not caused by an employer's unfair labor practices. NLRB v. Pecheur Lozenge Co., 209 F.2d 393 (2d Cir. 1953), cert. denied 347 U.S. 953 (1954). Unfair labor practice strikers are entitled to reinstatement on their unconditional offer to return to work. Economic strikers are entitled to reinstatement if they have not been permanently replaced at the time of their offer to return to work, and even if replaced, remain employees entitled to reinstatement on departure of replacements. Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

In establishing the existence of an unfair labor practice strike, a causal connection must be shown between the employer's unfair labor practices and the strike. Robbins Co., 233 NLRB 549 (1977); Winter Garden Citrus Products Cooperative v. NLRB, 238 F.2d 128 (5th Cir. 1956). A strike that begins as an economic strike may be converted to an unfair labor practice strike notwithstanding the continuation of the economic issues that constituted the original basis for the strike. See Giustina Bros. Lumber Co., 116 NLRB 700 at 731 (1956). In the case sub judice, I have found that Respondent did not refuse to bargain in good faith in the bindery negotiations. And while I have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) in its unilateral action regarding the compulsory use of accrued vacation time by employees for the Christmas shutdown and its refusal to bargain on the matter and arbitrate the issue, there is no evidence of a causal connection between such action and the strike. Further, as already noted, Respondent preserved the issue on the compulsory use of vacation time by allowing the employees to advise it of their desire not to use accrued vacation prior to the shutdown so that the matter could be subsequently resolved by the Board or an arbitrator. The record reflects that only one bindery employee, Peggy Powers, advised Respondent that she did not want to use her vacation time during the Christmas shutdown. Employee concern over the issue, therefore, appears not to have been of great magnitude.

That the Union did not consider Respondent's action on the compulsory vacation use to be a cause of the strike is demonstrated by the fact that although the Union filed a charge on the employer's unilateral action, in Case 12-CA-11819 on 18 November and even though it filed a subsequent charge and amended charge in Case 12-CA-1191-3 on 18 February and 27 March, respectively, it made no contention regarding the unfair labor practice status of its strike until the filing of the second amended charge in Case 12-CA-11912-3 on 17 April. Further, minutes of the union meeting at which the strike vote was taken were received in evidence. Those minutes do not refer to the compulsory vacation time use as an issue or concern. Moreover, the minutes refer to no unfair labor practice claims regarding Respondent's bargaining conduct, and, on the contrary, by reference to Respondent's right to hire permanent replacements during the strike, the minutes reveal the Union's contemplation of the strike as a wholly economic one. Although the Union's telegram to Respondent on 22 January advising Respondent of the strike did refer to the strike being based on Respondent's unfair labor practices, it did not specify what actions it contended were unlawful. Under these circumstances and in the absence of direct evidence of the causation of the strike, I cannot infer or otherwise conclude that Respondent's violation of the Act regarding the compulsory use of vacation time for employees during the Christmas shutdown was a cause of the strike.

The above reasoning also applies to Respondent's violation of the Act in suggesting the decertification petition to Shivar. In fact, the record does not show that any members of the Union or union officials were even aware of Shivar's petition prior to the strike. Absent such knowledge, it can hardly constitute a cause for the strike.

Considering the foregoing, I find that the strike at its inception was not an unfair labor practice strike. This does not, however, preclude its later conversion to such a strike. Respondent was not found responsible for any unlawful action between the beginning of the strike and the unlawful assistance accorded Hayson with the maintenance petition on 3 March. There is no direct evidence that Respondent's unlawful conduct with respect to the Hayson petition converted the strike to one based on unfair labor practices. Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union, however, based on Hayson's unlawfully assisted petition could only have tended to prolong the strike since it deprived the striking employees of services of their representatives in negotiating either an end to the strike or a bargaining agreement in the maintenance unit acceptable to the striking employees. See Wilder Construction, 276 NLRB 977 (1985); Whisper Soft Mills, 267 NLRB 813 (1983); Pennco, Inc., 242 NLRB 467, 469 (1979). Accordingly, I conclude that the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on 5 March when Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition of the Union in the maintenance unit. After that date, I conclude, all of the strikers became unfair labor practice strikers.

F. Refusal to Reinstate the Strikers

The complaint alleges that Respondent about 6 May refused to reinstate certain strikers set forth in appendices to the consolidated complaint. It is undisputed that the Union on 5 May sent an unconditional offer on behalf of all strikers to return to work "effective immediately." Respondent by letter from Tabor dated 6 May advised the Union that the striking employees "are now on a preferential recall list," and would be recalled to best copy available

work consistent with the law applicable to economic strikers. Further, Respondent in its answer to the consolidated complaint raised the affirmative defense that certain of the strikers named in the strike voluntarily resigned their employment during the strike and were no longer entitled to reinstatement. Because I have found that the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on 5 March, those strikers named in Appendices A and B to this decision and not otherwise specifically treated in this decision who were unreplaced as of 5 March are entitled to reinstatement. The remaining strikers are entitled to be placed on a preferential hiring list to be hired in accordance with seniority or other nondiscriminatory basis. See Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, 268 NLRB 552 (1984).

At the hearing, Goodwin testified that seven employees named in the complaint, Brad Bowman, Richard J. Frauenthal, W. E. Posey, Mike Segler, Lester Posey, Jackie Lane, and Richard Heburn Jr. had resigned during the strike or prior to the hearing. The parties litigated the effectiveness of the resignation for reinstatement purposes of all these employees with the exception of Lane.[19] Bowman resigned on 12 February executing a resignation saying that he was terminating his employment effective immediately, the reason being that during the strike his job was replaced by another employee. His letter requested pay for his unused vacation and for his contributions to the retirement fund. Similar letters were executed by Lester Posey on 18 February and Segler on 19 March. W. E. Posey admittedly resigned on 12 February after being told his job had been filled. His written resignation does not contain a specific request for his retirement contributions but a notation on the resignation reflects he received such contributions. Frauenthal's written resignation is not in evidence but he admittedly resigned on 29 May. All five of these strikers testified they resigned in order to obtain their retirement contributions to alleviate their financial hardships resulting from the strike.[20] All except W. E. Posey, who was not asked, specifically testified they would return to their former positions with Respondent if such positions were offered.

The General Counsel asserting that Respondent has the burden of rebutting the presumption that the strikers have a continuing interest in their jobs claims Respondent has not affirmatively established that the five strikers named above who resigned intended to permanently abandon their former positions. See Harowe Servo Controls, 250 NLRB 958, 964 (1980). The execution of the resignations during the strike, according to the General Counsel, citing P.B.R. Co., 216 NLRB 602, 604 (1975), and S & M Mfg. Co., 165 NLRB 663 (1967), did not, without more, reflect a permanent abandonment of employment. Respondent argues the contrary, citing Beverage-Air Co., 185 NLRB 168 (1970).

The Board has held in strike situations that to preclude a finding that a striker has permanently severed his employment by a direct communication to the employer of his intention to quit there must be a showing of some reservation or qualification in the quitting or a showing of continued interest by the striker. See Drug Research, Inc., 233 NLRB 253 (1977); Roylyn, Inc., 178 NLRB 197 (1969); Dalton Sheet Metal Co., 207 NLRB 188, 191–192 (1973); P.B.R., supra. In the instant case, it is clear that no reservations or qualifications were expressed to Respondent by the strikers in their respective resignations. However, Respondent has acknowledged here that termination of employment was the only way strikers could obtain their retirement contributions. All of the strikers indicated that this was their purpose in resigning. Further, there was no showing that at the time of the execution of these resignations, the strikers had employment elsewhere. Nor was there any evidence that the strikers abandoned the strike following their resignations, although Bowman did find other employment shortly after his resignation and possibly as a result of his having resigned. The fact that the strikers did not have jobs at the time of their resignations nor had they expressed to Respondent any immediate prospects of having a job at the time of their resignations are factors that serve to distinguish the instant case from Beverage-Air relied on by Respondent. Under these circumstances and because of the existing economic need expressed by the strikers, I conclude that the execution of the resignations did not reflect an intent on the part of the strikers to permanently abandon their jobs. Accordingly, they shall not be stricken from the reinstatement order recommended here.

With respect to Heburn, the uncontradicted evidence shows that shortly after the Union's offer to return the strikers to work, Goodwin telephoned Heburn offering him a job at $7 per hour. When Heburn reported for work, he found that the job was the same one he held prior to the strike at a higher rate of pay. There is no dispute that the $7 rate was the rate proposed by Respondent and imposed on impasse. Heburn rejected the job explaining to the foreman that he could not take the job for less than he was making before the strike. Moreover, he testified he told the foreman that he had learned from the Union that another employee was making $9 per hour on the same job. Respondent conceded that a retired part-time employee who was not covered by the Union's collective-bargaining agreement and who received no fringe benefits had been paid the higher rate for about 12 hours of work over a 2-week period. Notwithstanding his earlier rejection of the job, Goodwin wrote Heburn on 14 May saying that no regular full-time employee in the folding area earned more than $7 per hour and offered the job again to Heburn telling him to report for work on 19 May. Heburn never responded.

The General Counsel's position on Heburn appeared to be that because the wage reduction of Heburn's job flowed from Respondent's unlawful refusal to bargain, the offer made to Heburn to return to work at the lower rate was invalid and Heburn's rejection of the job under these circumstances did not amount to an unequivocal resolve to not accept reinstatement. Because I have found, however, that Respondent did not bargain in bad faith in the bindery unit negotiations, and because the rate imposed by Respondent was consistently rejected by the Union and imposed after impasse, the new rate offered Heburn was not unlawful. The offer to reinstate Heburn was accordingly valid and his rejection of the offer twice reveals an unequivocal resolve not to accept reinstatement. Accordingly, I shall not include him in the reinstatement order provided.

[19] Because the circumstances of Lane's alleged resignation are not set forth, any entitlement of Lane under the recommended Order here issued shall be left to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

[20] The parties stipulated that under the terms of Respondent's retirement plan, employees could obtain the money vested therein by severing their employment relationship through termination, involuntary or voluntary, or by retirement.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Rose Printing Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Graphic Communications Union, Local 241-B, Graphic Communications Union, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute separate units appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> (a) All employees of Respondent's bindery operation at the meaning of section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
> (b) All regular and full time maintenance employees, including maintenance mechanics, plant clericals, baler operator and janitor employed by Respondent at its Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, bindery and press room employees and operators, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. The Union has been the duly recognized collective-bargaining representative of all employees in bindery unit described above at all relevant times prior to 4 March 1986.

5. The Union has been, and is now, the certified and exclusive collective-bargaining representative for all employees in the maintenance unit described above.

6. By announcing on or about 16 October 1985 and by implementing its decision to require compulsory vacation use by unit employees for the 1985 Christmas shutdown without notice to or bargaining with the union and by unilaterally disavowing the continuing operation of the prevailing arbitration provision by refusing to arbitrate a grievance on this action, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. By encouraging and assisting employees employed in its maintenance unit in the circulation of a petition to decertify the Union, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. By withdrawing recognition from the Union about 5 March 1985 and thereafter refusing to bargain collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of its maintenance employees, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

9. By unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of employees in the maintenance unit about 5 March 1985 without notice to or bargaining with the Union, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

10. Respondent's violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act referred to paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 above converted the economic strike that began on 22 January 1986 into an unfair labor practice strike on 5 March 1986.

11. By refusing to reinstate strikers listed in Appendices B and C to this decision following the unconditional request of the Union on behalf of the striking employees made on 5 May 1986 and by treating such strikers as economic strikers, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

12. The unfair labor practices set forth above in paragraphs 6 through 11 affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

13. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act through the transfer of employee George Hayson to the night shift on 7 April 1986 or in issuing a written warning to him on 11 April 1986.

14. Respondent did not violate the Act by implementing its last offer to the Union in the bindery unit about 20 January 1986, by withdrawing recognition from the bindery unit about 4 March 1986 or in any other manner alleged in the consolidated complaint as amended.

THE REMEDY

Having concluded that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally announcing and implementing its decision to impose on employees the compulsory use of accrued vacation time for the 1985 Christmas shutdown, it will be ordered that Respondent rescind its unilateral action and restore accrued vacation leave to those compelled to utilize such leave for the 1985 plant shutdown. Inasmuch as this recommended action renders the Union's grievance on the matter moot, an affirmative order requiring further processing of the grievance to include arbitration becomes unnecessary. However, Respondent's unilateral disavowal of the effect of the arbitration provision in the then existing agreement with the Union warrants remedial action and a notice provision.

Because Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union in the maintenance unit, it will be ordered that Respondent recognize the Union, and on request, bargain with it collectively as exclusive representative of all employees in the maintenance unit, and if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. In view of Respondent's unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of the maintenance employees about 5 March, Respondent will be required to restore the status quo ante by restoring the employee working conditions as they existed prior to the unilateral changes and to make employees whole for any losses in pay or benefits suffered by them as a consequence of Respondent's unlawful action. This make whole remedy shall include interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[21]

Because the employees named in Appendices B and C to this decision who participated in the economic strike beginning on 22 January 1986 and converted to an unfair labor practice strike by Respondent's violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act on 5 March 1986 requested unconditional reinstatement on 5 May 1986, Respondent shall immediately reinstate them to their former or substantially equivalent positions without impairment of their seniority rights and other privileges. In order to make room for them, Respondent shall dismiss, if necessary, all persons hired after 5 March 1986. If after such dismissals there are insufficient positions available for the remaining former strikers, any available positions shall be accorded the strikers on a nondiscriminatory basis in accordance with seniority or other nondiscriminatory criteria. Former strikers who were permanently replaced prior to the conversion of the strike and for whom no positions are immediately available shall be placed on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory basis, and they shall be reinstated before any other persons are hired or upon the departure of their preconversion replacements. See Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, supra.

Those former striking employees entitled to immediate reinstatement shall be made whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's refusal to reinstate them in accordance with their unconditional request to be reinstated. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., supra.

The General Counsel in the complaint in this matter sought a "visitorial clause" authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States Court of Appeals enforcing an order in this case. The Board authorized such a clause in Hilton Inn North, 279 NLRB 45 fn. 3 (1986), in view of the possible complexity of computing the make whole remedy in that case. The instant case also presents a possibility of complex computations in the make whole remedy provided. Accordingly, I find a "visitorial clause" appropriate here.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

Respondent, Rose Printing Company, Inc., Tallahassee, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with Graphic Communications Union Local 214-B, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following unit:

> All regular and full time maintenance employees, including maintenance mechanics, plant clericals, baler operator and janitor employed by Respondent at its Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, bindery and press room employees and operators, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Changing the terms and conditions of employment of its employees in the maintenance unit represented by a duly recognized collective-bargaining representative without the consent of that representative or without a valid impasse and bargaining having been reached by that representative.

(c) Disavowing the continuing operation of the arbitration provision in the bindery collective-bargaining agreement by refusing to arbitrate disputes arising prior to the expiration of that agreement.

(d) Refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work.

(e) Unlawfully encouraging and assisting employees to circulate petitions to decertify the Union.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following unit:

> All regular and full time maintenance employees, including maintenance mechanics, plant clericals, baler operator and janitor employed by Respondent at its Tallahassee, Florida facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, bindery and press room employees and operators, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Rescind the unilateral imposition of compulsory use by employees of accrued vacation time for Christmas shutdown and restore to employees any accrued vacation leave involuntarily used by them as a result of Respondent's unilateral action.

(c) Restore the maintenance unit employees terms and conditions of employment in existence prior to 5 March 1986 and continue them in effect until an agreement on any changes thereon is reached with the Union or a bona fide impasse exists.

[21] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Make employees whole, with interest, for any loss suffered by them as a result of the unilateral changes in the maintenance unit on 5 March 1986.

(e) Immediately and fully reinstate its employees who participated in the strike that began on 22 January 1986 and who unconditionally reapplied for reinstatement on 5 May 1986 to their former or substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any replacements hired in their former jobs on or after 5 March 1986. Make whole these employees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the Remedy section above. Place the remaining former strikers on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory basis and offer them employment before any other persons are hired or on the departure of any replacements hired before 5 March 1986.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze Respondent's obligation to reimburse employees for benefits and wages lost as a result of the above-described unfair labor practices.

(g) Post at its Tallahassee, Florida facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[23] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 12, after being signed by Respodent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicious places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this Order, the Board, or any of its duly authorized representatives, may obtain discovery from Respondent, its officers, agents, successors, or assigns, or any other person having knowledge concerning the compliance matter, in the manner provided by the Federal Rules of the Civil Procedure. Such discovery shall be conducted under supervision of the United States Court of Appeals enforcing this Order and may be had upon any matter reasonably related to compliance with this Order, as enforced by the court.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the act not specifically found.

[23] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Amoco Oil Corporation and Brenda L. Shaw, Petitioner and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, Local 7-776 AFL-CIO. Case 14-RD-1190

June 21, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered a determinative challenge in an election held January 5, 1988, and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of it. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows five for and five against the Petitioner, with one challenged ballot, a sufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, and adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendation as modified. The Employer challenged Thomas J. Dixon's ballot, contending that Dixon was no longer employed on the day of the election. The Employer contends that Dixon, whose name was on the Excelsior list, was an eligible voter during the payroll period of eligibility ending December 4, 1987, but that his eligibility ended when he ceased working on December 31 pursuant to a November 3 notice of retirement. The Union contends that Dixon was on vacation the month of January 1988 and that his voting eligibility continued until the effective date of his resignation, February 1, 1988. The Regional Director found that Dixon was ineligible to vote because he was not actively employed on the date of the election. We reverse.

Under the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, employees with more than 30 years of service are entitled to 6 weeks' vacation, but the employee must be on active status the 31st day of the preceding calendar year in order to take advantage of the benefit. Dixon, whose service to the Company exceeded 30 years, advised the Employer, who administers the vacation plan, that he intended to use 4 of his 6 weeks of accrued vacation during the month of January 1988 and that his retirement would be effective February 1, 1988. Dixon's last day of active service was December 31, 1987.

In concluding that Dixon was not eligible to vote after December 31, the Regional Director relied on Roy N. Lotspeich Publishing Co., 204 NLRB 517 (1973), which held that an employee must be employed and working on both the payroll ending date for eligibility and the date of the election. However, as also acknowledged in the Regional Director's report, the Lotspeich requirements are limited by four exceptions, including an exception for employees on vacation on either of the critical dates:

> It is well settled that, in order to be eligible to vote, an individual must be employed and working on the established eligibility date, unless absent for one of the reasons set out in the Direction of Election i.e., illness, vacation, temporary layoff, or economic striker status. 204 NLRB 517 (1973) (first emphasis in original; second emphasis added).

Notwithstanding the fact that Dixon's absence falls squarely within the vacation exception, the Regional Director found the "operative fact" to be that Dixon was not on active status on the date of the election, noting that prior to the election date he had tendered his retirement notice, applied for retirement benefits, trained his replacement, ceased working, had his retirement party, was presented with his retirement gift, and had his exit interview. Although these facts bear on whether Dixon had a reasonable expectancy to return to work when he completed his last day of work on December 31, the "reasonable expectancy of employment test" applies only to eligibility determinations involving laid-off employees—not employees on vacation leave.[1] Dixon unambiguously requested vacation benefits for the month of January 1988 in his retirement notice, and it is undisputed that those benefits were granted. Finally, Dixon's retirement was not effective until February 1, 1988, weeks after the election.

In reversing the Regional Director, we thus rely on the fact that Dixon's effective date of retirement was after the election and the finding that Dixon retained his employee status through the date of the election as an employee on vacation. Accordingly, we find, contrary to the Regional Director, that Dixon was on vacation leave on the day of the election, that he was therefore eligible to vote, and that his ballot should be opened and counted.

DIRECTION

IT IS DIRECTED that the Regional Director for Region 14 shall, within 10 days of this Decision and Direction, open and count the ballot of Thomas J. Dixon, prepare a revised tally of ballots, and have it served on the parties. Thereafter, the Regional Director shall issue the appropriate certification.

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 103 and Comm-Tract Corp. and Communications Workers of America, AFL-CIO. Case 1-CD-822

June 21, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed December 14, 1987, by Comm-Tract Corp. (the Employer) alleging that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 103, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Communications Workers of America, AFL-CIO (CWA). The hearing was held February 24, 1988, before Hearing Officer John T. Downs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Massachusetts corporation, is engaged in the business of the installation of telephone and data system equipment, including the installation of the cabling and connections associated with that equipment, with its principal place of business in Natick, Massachusetts. During the past year, the Employer purchased and received at its Natick, Massachusetts location goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, directly from suppliers located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Local 103 and CWA are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[1]

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

In December 1987, pursuant to a subcontract with Laantech Inc., the Employer began an installation job with CWA-represented employees at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute, 44 Binney Street, Boston, Massachusetts (jobsite). The employees performing the installation work are covered by a collective-bargaining agreement between CWA and the Employer effective November 8, 1987.

The Employer's project manager, Roland Blair, testified that in response to rumors that Local 103 employees working at the jobsite would walk off the job and picket if the Employer's CWA-represented employees performed the work in dispute, on December 11, 1987, he telephoned Local 103 business agent Charles Monahan. Blair testified that he identified himself by name and told Monahan that he worked for the Employer. Blair further testified that he told Monahan that he "understood that IBEW said that if we came on the jobsite they would walk off the job and picket." According to Blair's testimony, he asked Monahan if that was true and Monahan responded in the affirmative. When Blair asked if there was anything they could do to resolve this matter between themselves, Monahan allegedly responded that "the only thing that [Blair] could do was send [Monahan] a list of IBEW contractors." Monahan denied ever speaking to Blair or receiving a telephone call from him.

The Employer's chief executive officer, John Polmonari, testified that because of rumors of potential jobsite problems he telephoned Monahan and Monahan told him that Local 103 would picket the job if Comm-Tract performed the work with its CWA-represented employees. Polmonari testified that Monahan did speak about community standards during the conversation and a meeting was arranged. There is conflicting testimony concerning what occurred at this meeting. Polmonari claimed that at the meeting Monahan repeated the threat to picket. Monahan testified that the purpose of the meeting was to determine if Comm-Tract was a community standard contractor. Monahan further testified that after reviewing the collective-bargaining agreement, pension program, and health plan, he found the Employer met community standards and indicated to Polmonari that as far as he was concerned there were no problems with Comm-Tract. Monahan claims that he told Polmonari that he would review the matter with his boss and that if in fact there were any problems, Polmonari would hear from Monahan.

As of the hearing date, there had been no work disruption or picketing activity at the jobsite.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the installation of telephone and data systems equipment, including installation of the cabling and connections associated with the equipment, at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute, 44 Binney Street, Boston, Massachusetts.[2]

---

[1] CWA did not appear or otherwise participate at the hearing.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the testimony of Blair and Polmonari and Local 103's conduct establishes that the actions of Local 103 had an object of compelling the assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by Local 103 rather than CWA. The Employer further contends that the statements by Local 103 witnesses at the hearing in this case that, after review of the Employer's contract with the CWA, they concluded the Employer meets community standards, do not constitute a disclaimer of interest in the disputed work. The Employer also contends that the work should be assigned to the CWA-represented employees, arguing that the collective-bargaining agreement with CWA, economy and efficiency of operations, the skills and work involved, employer and industry practice, job impact, and employer assignment and preference all favor such a result. The Employer asserts that because similar disputes involving the disputed work are likely to recur, the Board should remand this case for further hearing to take evidence to determine whether the jurisdictional award should be expanded to apply throughout the jurisdiction of Local 103 wherever employees of the Employer represented by CWA perform the work in dispute.

Local 103 contends that no jurisdictional dispute exists and that no threat to the Employer was made in violation of the Act. Local 103 contends that it sought information from the Employer to ascertain whether the Employer adhered to community standards and, on its determination that the Employer was a community standard contractor, advised the Employer that it was in conformity with community standards and would have no trouble with Local 103.[3]

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of a dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be established both that reasonable cause exist to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of their dispute. Regarding the latter point, the record reveals no agreed-upon method among the parties for the resolution of the dispute.

Testimony was presented in this case that Local 103 threatened to walk off the jobsite and picket if the Employer's CWA-represented employees performed the work in dispute. Conflicting testimony was presented by Local 103 witnesses, but it is unnecessary to resolve the question of credibility in order to proceed to a determination of the dispute. In a 10(k) proceeding the Board is not required to find that the unfair labor practice alleged has occurred, but need only find that reasonable cause exists to believe that there has been a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D). The Board may consider contradicted testimony in finding reasonable cause.[4]

On the basis of the entire record, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

There was no evidence that the CWA or Local 103 had been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the Employer's employees. The Employer does not have a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 103. The Employer and CWA have a current collective-bargaining agreement which encompasses the work in dispute.[5] Accordingly, we find that the factor of the collective-bargaining agreements favors an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by CWA.

[2] The amended charge in this case, filed on December 30, 1987, described the work in dispute as "the installation of telephone and communications equipment at the Dana Farber Institute." The notice of hearing in this case, dated January 28, 1988, described the work in dispute as "the installation of telephone and data cables." At the hearing the Employer moved to amend the description of the work in dispute to include the above-described work. Counsel for Local 103 had been notified prior to the hearing of the Employer's proposed amendment. The Employer excepted to the hearing officer's denial of the motion to amend the description of the work in dispute. We find merit to this exception noting that the record supports such a description of the work in dispute and that Local 103 was not surprised by the amendment at the hearing and had adequate time to prepare its case with respect to the amended language.

[3] Local 103 excepted to the admission of hearsay testimony of Blair as evidence of an alleged threat. Blair testified that the construction manager on the jobsite, McCoy, had informed him that during a visit to jobsite Monahan told McCoy that if the Employer's CWA-represented employees worked on the job, the Local 103-represented employees who were also on the jobsite would walk off the job and picket. In determining whether there is reasonable cause to believe that Local 103 violated the Act, we do not rely on this hearsay testimony, but on the nonhearsay testimony of Blair and Polmonari regarding their resepective conversations with Monahan.

[4] Carpenters Local 1485 (C. J. Reinke & Sons), 254 NLRB 1091 (1981).

2. Employer preference

The record indicates that the Employer would prefer to have the work in dispute which began in December 1987 completed by the employees represented by the CWA because they are specifically trained in this work, are performing the work at an acceptable level of quality, and can more efficiently perform the postinstallation warranty service provided by the Employer. We find that this factor favors the award of the disputed work to the employees represented by CWA.

3. Area and industry practice

The Employer's chief executive officer John Polmonari testified that he was aware of at least seven other companies in the area who are in the same business as the Employer whose installation employes are represented by CWA. Although the record indicates that Local 103-represented employees and CWA-represented employees work side by side on some jobsites, and Local 103 has an industrywide contract with employers in the telecommunications field, Local 103 failed to introduce any evidence that this contract covers the same type of work as the work in dispute or that employees represented by Local 103 have performed the same type of work as the work in dispute. Accordingly, while industry practice is inconclusive, the factor of area practice favors the employees represented by GWA.

4. Relative skills

The record indicates that the Employer trains its employees in the use of its own equipment and in the work in dispute. The record further indicates that the Employer's employees are capable of performing all aspects of the installation work and have performed the work to the Employer's satisfaction. Local 103 presented no evidence that employees it represents have the specific skills that apply to the work in dispute. Rather, the record merely indicates that Local 103-represented employees attend a formal education program certified by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in the telecommunications field. The subjects taught in this program include math, electronics, blueprint reading, telegraphy, data, alarm signal, sound, cable television, and microwave. Accordingly, this factor tends to favor an award of the disputed work to the Employer's employees represented by CWA.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

The Employer presented evidence that it is more economical and efficient to assign the work in dispute to its own employees who are represented by CWA than to employees represented by Local 103. By continuing to use its own employees, the Employer can assign the same person who installed the system to perform postinstallation warranty maintenance and service work. The individuals performing the initial installation work know the location of cable routes, how the cable is run, and have general knowledge of the job which can be useful for performing postinstallation warranty service. Accordingly, we conclude that this factor favors the employees represented by CWA.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by CWA are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying in particular on the factors of the Employer's collective-bargaining agreement, the Employer's preference, area practice, relative skills, and the economy and efficiency of the Employer's operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by CWA, but not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.[6]

[5] Art. 16 of that agreement entitled "WAGES AND OTHER BENEFITS" specifies the duties of the various job classification as including, inter alia, "running cable," "reading blueprints with knowledge on how to install, test, and repair terminal and station equipment" and "ability to maintain, update and resolve problems with communication systems."

[6] The Employer requests that this case be remanded for further hearing to take evidence to determine whether this award should be expanded to apply throughout the jurisdiction of Local 103 whenever employees of the Employer represented by the CWA perform the work in dispute. At the hearing the Employer attempted to introduce evidence that Local 103's conduct in violation of Sec. 8(b)(4)(D) at the Dana Farber site in December 1987 was part of a broad pattern of such activity in other worksites in the Boston area. Specifically, the Employer made an offer of proof and alleged that Local 103 engaged in similar activity against the Employer at the Boston University Medical Center site in Boston in 1986 which resulted in actual picketing and was currently engaging in similar illegal activity at another worksite in Boston involving the Employer, the Rowe's Wharf project. The Board has previously held that it will restrict the scope of its determination to a specific jobsite unless there is evidence that similar disputes may occur in the future. Painters Local 636 (Plaza Glass), 214 NLRB 912, 915 (1974). The Board has not previously determined jurisdictional disputes involving the Employer and Local 103. Furthermore, there is no evidence that Local 103 has claimed similar work to be performed by the Employer in the future. Accordingly, even assuming arguendo that the hearing officer should have received the testimony that was the subject of the Employer's offer of proof, we find the evidence insufficient to show that the dispute is a regularly recurring one and that Local 103 has a propensity to engage in

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Comm-Tract, Inc., who are represented by Communications Workers of America, AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform the installation of telephone and data systems equipment, including installation of the cabling and connections associated with the equipment, at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute, 44 Binney Street, Boston, Massachusetts jobsite.

2. Local 103, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Comm-Tract, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Local 103, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 1 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

Construction and General Laborers Local 721, Laborers International Union of North America (J. L. Marshall & Sons, Inc.) and United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 624. Case 1–CD–811

June 21, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed July 17, 1987, by Carpenters Local 624, alleging that the Respondent, Laborers Local 721, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer, J. L. Marshall & Sons, Inc., to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by the Carpenters. The hearing was held September 11, 1987, before Hearing Officer John T. Downs.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Rhode Island corporation with its principal place of business in Pawtucket, Rhode Island, is engaged in the general construction business, principally in New England. During the construction of its Carver High School project in Carver, Massachusetts, the Employer purchased directly from points outside Massachusetts building materials valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Carpenters and Laborers are signatories to collective-bargaining agreements with the Employer. We find that the Carpenters and the Laborers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the distribution of wooden doors from a stockpile to their point of installation at the Employer's Carver High School jobsite.

B. Background and Facts of the Dispute

The Employer's Carver High School construction job included the installation of approximately 270 wooden doors. The doors were delivered to the jobsite by tractor-trailer in May 1987.[2] They were individually wrapped in polyethylene and stacked, in bundles of 40, on pallets. A forklift operator (represented by a Union not involed in this dispute) unloaded the doors[3] and stockpiled them on the floor of the school gymnasium.

In early July, Laborers' business manager Louis Palavanchi and steward Manuel Miranda visted the jobsite and demanded that Joseph Silveira Jr., the Employer's project superintendent, assign the work of transporting the doors to the Laborers-represented employees. Silveira replied, "Well, we've already discussed this. They're going to be assigned to the Carpenters." After more discussion, and a telephone conversation between Palavanchi and Robert Niles, the Employer's general superintendent, Silveira, heard Palavanchi say to steward Miranda, "If the Carpenters are going to move it, you grab a hammer and damage any door they move."

On a Friday in mid-July, Silveira instructed acting Carpenter Foremen David Delgrande to select two of his men to begin the job of moving the doors out of the gym. Delgrande went over the building plans with carpenters Clifford Leaf and Dale Anderson, and directed them to prepare a list showing each door's point of installation by matching the number on the door with the corresponding number on the floor plans. Shortly after Leaf and Anderson began preparing the list, they noticed that about 10 employees represented by the Laborers were sitting on the doors, preventing them from being moved.

Delgrande reported the incident to Silveira. Silveira thereupon entered the gymnasium and observed some laborers sitting on the doors. He told Delgrande to assign the two carpenters to another job, and ordered the laborers to return to the other trades' work to which they had previously been assigned.

The following Monday, the Employer made a new composite work assignment to avoid a work stoppage or damage to the doors. The composite work assignment required that each door be carried by a laborer and carpenter working together. The carpenters assigned to carry doors with labor-

The Carpenters' business representative testified that there is no agreed-on method for adjusting the dispute and so he filed the instant unfair labor practice charge.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the work of carrying prefinished doors properly belongs to carpenters who are responsible for their installation and who possess the skills to exercise greater care in moving and not damaging them.

The Laborers states, in the September 9 letter which advised of its refusal to participate in this proceeding, that it has a contractual claim to the work in dispute, but that it acquiesced in the Employer's composite assignment, unlike the Carpenters who engaged in a 2-day strike in protest.

The Carpenters took the position at the hearing that the Employer's initial work assignment is supported by its members' skills, abilities, and the existing contract, and the area practice, economy, and efficiency of operations. The Carpenters contends that the Employer's subsequent composite work assignments should not be given any weight in the Board's determination because they stemmed from the Laborers' illegal threats and coercion.

The Carpenters' brief to the Board urges an award to the carpenters which is broad enough to encompass the mutual geographic jurisdiction of both Unions. Its request for a broad award is based on evidence of the Laborers having engaged in identical conduct to obtain exactly the same work from employees represented by the Carpenters on a different employer's job. That conduct precipitated the filing of an 8(b)(4)(D) charge, which was withdrawn on the eve of the scheduled 10(k) hearing when the Laborers disclaimed the work. Subsequently, the Laborers threatened a "sit down strike" to obtain the same work in the next phase of that project.

D. Applicability of the Statute

As noted, when the Laborers' business manager learned from the Employer of its decision to assign the disputed work to employees represented by the Carpenters, he openly instructed his steward to "grab a hammer and damage any door they moved." Thereafter, employees represented by the Laborers sat on the doors and prevented them from being moved.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there is no agreed method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

There is no evidence of either Union having been certified as bargaining representative of any of the Employer's employees. However, both Unions are signatories to contracts with the Employer through the latter's membership in the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts, Inc. The Carpenters' collective-bargaining agreement has been submitted in evidence; the Laborers, who did not participate in the proceeding, quoted in its letter of September 9 relevant portions of its collective-bargaining agreement. As the Employer notes in its brief, however, neither contract specifically provides for work jurisdiction over this particular work. Accordingly, we find that this factor favors neither group of employees.

2. Company preference and past practice

The Employer prefers assigning the distribution of prefinished doors to carpenters who have the responsibility for installing them and because they exercise the skills and meet the Employer's expected standard of care.[4] The testimony further reveals that the Employer's assignment is consistent with its practice over approximately the past 20 years. These factors support an award of the work to the Employer's employees represented by the Carpenters.

---

[4] We find merit in the Employer's contention that the coerced composite work assignment made by the Employer is immaterial to our determination of the dispute.

3. Area and industry practice

No evidence was adduced concerning the general practice in the industry. The Carpenters' witnesses who testified specified 14 area projects in which the work in issue was performed by members of the Carpenters Union. We accordingly find that consideration of the factor of area practice favors Carpenters-represented employees.

4. Relative skills

As indicated the disputed work consists merely of picking up prefinished and prewrapped doors and carrying them to the point of installation. The record shows that if the doors are not handled carefully, they can be dented or chipped, thus requiring costly repairs. Although the Employer asserts that carpenters who install doors would be more likely to handle them with greater skill and care, no evidence was presented to show that the laborers cannot carefully transport the doors without causing them damage, or that they have inflicted damage in the past by performing such work. Accordingly, we find the evidence with respect to this factor to be speculative and inconclusive in arriving at our determination.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

Testimony at the hearing disclosed that the work of carrying a prefinished wooden door from the stockpile to point of installation can be done by the same carpenter who installs the door, that only one carpenter is necessary to perform both these functions, and that assistance by a laborer would be unnecessary and wasteful. There is no testimony to the contrary. Thus, it appears that economy and efficiency is gained by having an employee with the skills to install a wooden door also transport that door from a stockpile to the point of installation. Accordingly, we find that these factors support the Employer's award to employees represented by the Carpenters.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Carpenters Local 624 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the Employer's preference and past practice, area practice, and economy and efficiency of the Employer's operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 624, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.[8]

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of J. L. Marshall & Sons, Inc., represented by United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 624, are entitled to perform the work involving the distribution of wooden doors from a stockpile to their point of installation at the Carver High School, Carver, Massachusetts.

2. Construction and General Laborers Local 721, Laborers International Union of North America is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force J. L. Marshall & Sons, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Construction and General Laborers Local 721, Laborers International Union of North America shall notify the Regional Director for Region 1 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

[8] We deny the Carpenters' request for a broad award to cover all jobs within its mutual geographical jurisdiction with the Laborers. In Laborers Local 22 (AGC of Massachusetts), 283 NLRB 605, 608 (1987), the Board restated the standard for issuing such broad awards:

> [T]here are two prerequisites for a broad, areawide award. First, there must be evidence that the disputed work has been a continuous source of controversy in the relevant geographic area and that similar disputes may recur. Second, there must be evidence demonstrating that the charged party has a proclivity to engage in unlawful conduct in order to obtain work similar to the work in dispute. [Emphasis in original, citations omitted.]

Here, the evidence shows only that there was a single similar incident between the two Unions at a different employer's jobsite, and that, after disclaiming the work in dispute, the Laborers made a threat to engage in conduct similar to that which it engaged in here when that construction project resumes. There was no determination of dispute made in that case, however, and the Carpenters have presented no other basis to support their request for a broad award. In such circumstance, we find no warrant for granting a broad award.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 4, 1988, Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge. On February 25, 1988, I conducted a hearing at Las Vegas, Nevada, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on November 27, 1987, based on a charge filed on March 31, 1987, by Local 501.

The complaint alleged the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to bargain collectively with Local 501 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of an appropriate unit of the Respondent's employees. The Respondent admitted the refusal, but denied it violated the Act.

The General Counsel, Local 501, and the Respondent appeared by counsel and were afforded opportunity to adduce evidence and produce, examine, and cross-examine witnesses.

After introduction into evidence of the formal documents, counsel for the General Counsel announced he was unable to produce evidence supporting the complaint allegations because his principal witness (the Respondent's manager) had not appeared in response to his subpoena and requested a continuance to a later date. The Respondent's counsel denied the manager was ever served with process. In response to my inquiry, counsel for the General Counsel was unable to produce any evidence of service of the alleged subpoena on the missing witness.

Counsel for Local 501 supported the motion for a continuance.

Counsel for the Respondent noted he was appearing ready for trial, opposed the continuance, and moved to dismiss the complaint.

Noting counsel for the General Counsel had ample opportunity to perfect service on the missing witness, had no evidence of such service, and that all parties were present and prepared for trial, I deny the motion for a continuance, grant the motion to dismiss, and order the hearing closed, subject to reopening only on production of evidence the missing witness was properly served by subpoena prior to the hearing, accompanied by a representation counsel for the General Counsel is pursuing an action in the United States district court to compel the missing witness to appear and testify in response to that subpoena.

[1] We grant the Respondent's unopposed motion to correct the transcript.

[2] We note that the judge recommended granting the motion to dismiss and ordered the hearing closed subject to the General Counsel's meeting two conditions and the General Counsel has not asserted in her exceptions to the Board that the conditions set forth in the Order have been met.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 23, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed limited exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an exception.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Remedy[1] and Order as modified.[2]

AMENDED REMEDY

Insert the following as the last paragraph in the remedy section of the judge's decision.[3]

"Having found that the Respondent unlawfully discontinued contractually required contributions into the Union's health care plan since about January 1986, we shall order it to pay into the health care plan all contributions which have not been paid and which would have been paid absent the Respondent's unlawful discontinuance of such contributions. We shall also provide for interest on backpay owing the employees under the judge's limited monetary remedy for the Respondent's failure to bargain with the Union over the effects of the termination of its Oakland operations."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Chassis Maintenance, Inc., Oakland, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Pay with interest the unit employees on the payroll when the Respondent terminated its Oakland operation in the manner set forth in the remedy portion of this decision."

2. Add the following as paragraph 2(c) and renumber the remaining paragraphs.

"(c) Pay in to the Union's health care plan those contributions it has failed to pay as required by the September 1, 1985, to August 31, 1986 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to bargain collectively with Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 355 of Northern California concerning the effects on the employees in the appropriate unit below of our decision to close our operation in Oakland, California. The unit is:

> All production, warehouse, maintenance, material handling, and truck-driver employees at our operation in Oakland, California, excluding office clerical employees, timekeepers, administrative and professional employees, technical employees, guards, and supervisors.

[1] Any reference to "this decision" in the remedy section of the judge's decision should be interpreted as referring to the "Board's decision."

[2] The General Counsel requests a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] Any interest or other additional amounts with respect to these contributions shall be calculated in the manner set forth in Merriweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

Although in the remedy section of his decision the judge does not discuss the Respondent's withholding of required health care plan contributions or the unlawful layoffs of employee Miguel Dimas, he has provided appropriate provisions for remedying those violations in his recommended Order. In adopting those portions of the judge's recommended Order, backpay owing any employees as a result of the Respondent's failure to make contributions to the health care plan shall be computed in the manner prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), while the backpay owing to Dimas shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950).

289 NLRB No. 35

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse, during the term of a collective-bargaining contract between us and the Union covering employees in the above unit, to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of those employees, to honor the terms of such contract (including those requiring contributions to the Sheet Metal Workers' of Northern California Health Care Plan and prescribing procedures to be followed when hiring and laying off employees), and to enter into the negotiation of a successor contract when timely requested by the Union to do so.

WE WILL NOT make inducements to employees to withdraw their support of a labor organization with whom we have a collective-bargaining contract by telling them that we do not want another contract and that their benefits will be the same without a contract or without a union.

WE WILL NOT tell employees we will give them more work only if they achieve the withdrawal of unfair labor practice charges against us that have been filed on their behalf with the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with the Union concerning the effects on the employees in the above unit of our decision to close our operation in Oakland, California, and WE WILL reduce to writing any agreement resulting from such bargaining.

WE WILL pay, with interest, the unit employees on the payroll when we terminated our Oakland operation in the manner required by the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL pay into the Union's health care plan those contributions we have failed to pay as required by the collective-bargaining agreement covering our unit employees.

WE WILL make whole our unit employees, with interest, for any monetary loss occasioned by our unlawful withholding of contributions to the above health care plan.

WE WILL make Miguel Dimas whole, with interest, for any losses of wages and benefits he suffered because of our disregard of his seniority and other contractually bestowed rights in connection with our two layoffs of him in August 1986.

CHASSIS MAINTENANCE, INC.

Elaine Climpson, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Mark Santos, Business Manager, of Oakland, California, for the Union.[1]

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated matter was tried in Oakland, California, on 15 September 1987.[2] The consolidated complaint in Cases 32-CA-8370 and 32-CA-8526, based on charges filed by Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 355 of Northern California (Union)[3] alleges that Chassis Maintenance, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act as follows.[4]

(a) In March 1986, ceasing to make fringe benefit contributions as required by its contract with the Union.

(b) Since about 16 June 1986, ignoring the Union's requests that they undertake the negotiation of a successor contract.

(c) In July 1986, failing to submit a "report of hire" form to the Union as prescribed by the contract.

(d) In August 1986, twice laying off unit employee Miguel Dimas without observing contractually specified procedures; and its conduct in totality, withdrawing recognition from the Union.

The same complaint alleges that Respondent additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) by the following:

(a) In June, July, and/or August 1986, through Operation Manager Hisidro Carralez, telling an employee that it would not negotiate or sign a new contract with the Union, and that it would maintain existing benefits without need for the Union.

(b) In November or December 1986, through Hisidro Carralez, threatening to deny work to an employee because the Union had filed an unfair labor practice charge on his behalf.

The complaint in Case 32-CA-8723, also based on a charge filed by the Union,[5] alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by the following.

---

[1] Respondent, although formally answering the two complaints, did not appear at the trial. Attorney David Rosenfeld, of San Francisco, California, entered an appearance for the Union after the hearing.

[2] This manner of setting forth dates comports with the wishes of the Board.

[3] The charge in Case 32-CA-8370 was filed on 10 September 1986. The charge in Case 32-CA-8526 was filed on 17 November 1986 and amended on 21 January 1987. The consolidated complaint issued on 27 January 1987.

[4] Sec. 8(a)(5) prohibits an employer from "refus[ing] to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 9(a)." Sec. 9(a) states in relevant part:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment . . . .

Sec. 8(a)(1) prohibits an employer from "interfer[ing] with, restrain[ing], or coerc[ing] employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7" of the Act. Sec. 7 guarantees employees "the right to self-organization, to form, join or assist labor organizations, . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ."

[5] The charge in Case 32-CA-8723 was filed on 19 February 1987 and the complaint issued on 24 March. An order consolidating all matters for trial also issued on 24 March.

(a) In November or December 1986, terminating its Oakland operation without notifying the Union and giving it an opportunity to negotiate concerning the effects of that action on unit employees.

(b) Since about 12 February 1987, ignoring the Union's request that they bargain over those effects.

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a California corporation, maintains and repairs oceangoing equipment, chassis, and containers. One of its facilities, until late 1986, was in Oakland. In 1986, it admittedly realized revenues exceeding $50,000 from customers meeting the Board's direct inflow or outflow jurisdictional standards.

I conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent admits in one answer and denies in the other that the Union is a labor organization within Section 2(5) of the Act.

The record establishes that the Union is an organization in which employees participate and which deals with employers concerning the terms and conditions of employment of employees it represents. I conclude, therefore, that it is a labor organization under Section 2(5).

III. THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT

A. Background

Respondent came into existence in the summer of 1985. On 9 September of that year it and the Union entered into a labor contract to run from 1 September through 31 August 1986. The unit, as defined in the contract, included "all production, warehouse, maintenance, material handling and truck-driver employees," and excluded "office clerical employees, timekeepers, administrative and professional employees, technical employees, guards and supervisors."[6]

B. The Incidents in Issue

1. Facts

a. The allegedly unlawful cessation of contributions

Article XIII of the contract required that Respondent "pay the sum of one dollar nine cents ($1.09) per hour for each hour worked into the Sheet Metal Workers' of Northern California Health Care Plan." The contributions were due "on or before the tenth (10th) day of the month following the month in which the work was performed," and were deemed delinquent "if not paid by the twenty-fifth (25th) day of the month."

After complying with the contract for hours worked through December 1985, Respondent stopped making contributions. Mark Santos, the Union's business manager, called Respondent President John Carralez about this in early 1986. Admitting the delinquency, Carralez said Respondent was "having some financial problems, but it [the delinquency] would be taken care of." Respondent, however, never did cure the delinquency or resume compliance.

Respondent's answer to this allegation admits that it stopped making contributions before the contract expiration date.

b. The allegedly unlawful disregard of the Union's requests to negotiate

Anticipating the 31 August expiration of the contract, Santos informed Respondent by letter dated 16 June 1986 that the Union "wish[ed] to reopen [the] agreement in its entirety for negotiations" and would be contacting Respondent "in the near future in regard to setting up a meeting for the purpose of entering into negotiations."

Santos thereafter attempted to reach John Carralez by telephone several times. He was told in each instance by Respondent's secretary, Julie,[7] that Carralez was not "in." Santos left word that he wished to "set up negotiations meetings" and asked that Carralez call him back.

On 6 August, none of his calls having been returned, Santos hand-delivered to Julie a copy of the Union's proposals, together with a proposed agreement "to extend the current bargaining agreement thru September 14, 1986." Santos told Julie at the time that he "would like to have John [Carralez] call [him], because [he] wanted to set up some negotiations," and she said she would pass on the materials and that message.

On 8 August, still receiving no word from Respondent, Santos hand-delivered this letter to Carralez:

> Dear John:
>
> I am presenting the following dates to you for the upcoming negotiations. August 13th, 14th, 15th, 20th and 21st, at your convenience, I will meet at any time with you.
> If you have any questions, please feel free to call.

On delivering the letter, Santos spoke with Carralez' brother Hisidro, Respondent's operation manager. Hisidro reported that John would be out of town until 11 August. Santos said he would "appreciate" John's calling on his return "so we can line up some of those negotiation sessions." Hisidro replied that he would convey the message.

On 13 and 14 August, after still no word from John, Santos tried twice to telephone him. Julie told him both times that John was not in, and Santos asked that she "have John call [him] back to set up some meetings." Santos also said in the second call that he was about to go to Chicago for a convention, and that Carralez should call Arnold Sales, another union representative, in his absence.

On 21 or 22 August, Santos called Sales from Chicago. When told that Carralez had not called, Santos directed

---

[6] The complaints allege, the answers admit, and I conclude that this is an appropriate unit.

[7] Julie is John Carralez' daughter.

Sales to refer the matter to the Union's attorney, who filed the first of the charges on 10 September.

Neither Carralez nor anyone else on behalf of Respondent ever responded to Santos' efforts to initiate negotiations.

Respondent's answer to this allegation admits that it has refused to bargain with the Union since about 16 June 1986. The same answer admits that Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union.

c. The allegedly unlawful failure to submit a "Report of Hire" form

Article III, section 3, of the contract stated in part:

> In order for the parties to complete their obligations under the agreement, the employer shall direct the new employee to the office of the Union with a REPORT OF HIRE FORM. The Union will then dispatch the employee with two (2) copies of an INTRODUCTORY CARD, one (1) copy going to the Company and the other to the Shop Steward having jurisdiction.

In the summer of 1986, Respondent hired Larry Field to perform unit work without complying with this provision. Santos, when first seeing Field on the job, told Hisidro Carralez to have him "go down to the union hall and clear." Carralez did not comply.

Field apparently was the only unit employee hired during the contract's 1-year term.[8]

d. The allegedly unlawful failure to observe contractually prescribed procedures anent the layoffs of Miguel Dimas

Article XVI, section 1(b)(1), of the contract stated: "In the event that work becomes slack and the Company deems it necessary to reduce the working force, the last employee hired shall be the first employee laid off . . . ."

Section 1(b)(2)(B) of the same article stated: "Employees will have to option to [accept] the lower classification (rate of pay) or take layoff until they are called back at that classification."

Section 3 of this article stated: "When employees are laid off for lack of work, the Union shall be notified in writing of the names of all employees laid off and the date such layoff occurred."

In early August 1986, returning to his job after a week's illness, unit employee Miguel Dimas was told by Hisidro Carralez that work was "slow" and that he should stay home "for another week." Field and Mark Bocage, both less senior than Dimas, worked during his resulting layoff.

About 2 weeks later, Dimas was laid off again. Hisidro explained to him this time that work was slow; that "it wasn't good for the Company to have to pay [Dimas] $10 per hour just to be connecting lights in the chassis"; and that Respondent was "going to let Mark [Bocage] work, because he was only getting paid $5." Field also stayed on.

Beyond laying Dimas off out of seniority, Respondent failed to give him the option of accepting a lower rate of pay in lieu of layoff. It also failed to notify the Union of the layoffs.

e. The allegedly unlawful remarks by Hisidro Carralez in the summer of 1986

Hisidro Carralez, as mentioned, was operation manager at Respondent's Oakland facility. The answer to the complaint containing this allegation admits that he was a supervisor and an agent of Respondent at relevant times.

Carralez had several conversations with Dimas in May–June 1986 regarding the Union. Carralez stated variously: (a) That the union contract was soon to expire and John Carralez "doesn't want to have another contract with the Union"; (b) that "it would be okay even without a contract, because the benefits would be the same, just as if the Union was there"; and (c) that John Carralez' reason for not wanting to negotiate with the Union was that "the Union promised a lot of things and then didn't carry them out."

f. The allegedly unlawful remarks by Hisidro Carralez in November–December 1986

The charge in Case 32–CA–8526 alleges that Respondent "discriminated in regard to . . . Dimas' tenure of employment . . . ." Shortly after the 17 November filing of this charge, Hisisdro Carralez made a telephone call to Dimas, telling him that Respondent "wouldn't give [him] any more work" if he was "fighting with" Respondent. Carralez explained that he had "a letter" from the NLRB with Dimas' name on it, then declared that Respondent "would give [him] more work" if he "went to the Union and they withdrew all the charges," but otherwise "would not give [him] more work."

Dimas was not on the payroll at the time, having been laid off in August.

g. The allegedly unlawful failure to give the Union an opportunity to negotiate concerning the effects on unit employees of the termination of the Oakland operation

About the end of 1986, Santos heard from Dimas' wife, an employee of the Union, that Respondent had closed its Oakland facility. Santos consequently visited the site early January 1987, finding that the trailer office and all the equipment were gone and, indeed, that only the sign remained. Santos thereupon sent this letter, dated 12 February, to John Carralez at Respondent's address in Long Beach, California:

> We request that you sit down and negotiate the effects of the plant closure located at 1170 5th Street, Oakland, CA 94607.
> I will be waiting for your reply.

Respondent did not reply. Nor did it ever communicate with the Union concerning the termination of the Oakland operation.

[8] Two other unit employees, Miguel Dimas and Mark Bocage, had been hired previously.

Respondent's answer to this allegation admits that it terminated its Oakland operation in November or December 1986 "without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain . . . concerning . . . the effects of such acts and conduct." The answer further admits, by its silence, that Respondent "has failed and refused to meet and bargain . . . with regard to the effects of" that termination since 12 February 1987.

2. Conclusions

a. The alleged violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1)

The foregoing recitation of facts, in combination with the noted admissions by Respondent in its answers, establishes beyond doubt that it quietly and unilaterally repudiated its bargaining obligation and underlying contract months before contract expiration; and that, as a concomitant of that repuidation, it:

(a) Stopped making contributions to the Sheet Metal Workers' of Northern California Health Care Plan as prescribed by the contract.

(b) Flouted the Union's entreaties that it enter into the negotiation of a successor contract.

(c) Failed to direct new hire Field to the Union with a report of hire form as required by the contract.

(d) Ignored seniority and otherwise overlooked contractually mandated procedures in connection with the layoffs of Dimas in August 1986.

(e) Failed to give the Union an opportunity to negotitate over the effects on unit employees of its termination of the Oakland operation.

I conclude that, by its repudiation of its bargaining obligation and underlying contract without any stated, let alone proper, justification, and by each of the itemized concomitants thereof, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

b. The alleged additional violations of Section 8(a)(1)

I conclude that Respondent made an improper inducement to Dimas to discard the Union, violating Section 8(a)(1), when Hisidro Carralez told him in May or June 1986 that Respondent did not "want another contract with the Union" and that, even without a contract, his benefits "would be the same, just as if the Union was there."

I conclude that Respondent, by Hisidro Carralez, also violated Section 8(a)(1) in November or December 1986 by telling Dimas that Respondent "would give [him] more work" only if he "went to the Union and they withdrew all the charges," thus conditioning employment on the surrender of rights under the Act.

IV. REMEDY

I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist from that conduct found to be unlawful, and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Regarding Respondent's unlawful failure to give the Union an opportunity to bargain over the effects of its termination of the Oakland operation, a bargaining order alone would not provide an adequate remedy. To impart to Respondent some incentive to enter into meaningful bargaining, and to make the affected employees whole for losses they may have suffered as a result of its prior failure to do so, I will impose a limited monetary sanction along lines of St. Marys Foundry Co., 284 NLRB 221 (1987); Garwood-Detroit Truck Equipment, 274 NLRB 113, 116 (1985); and Transmarine Corp., 170 NLRB 389, 390 (1968).

Thus, Respondent shall pay a wage equivalent to each unit employee on the payroll when operations ceased, based on his/her normal pay rates at the time of cessation, from 5 days after the date of this decision until the occurrence of the earliest of the following conditions: (1) the date Respondent bargains to agreement with Union on those subjects pertaining to the effects of the cessation on its unit employees; (2) a bona fide impasse in bargaining; (3) the failure of the Union to request bargaining within 5 days of this decision, or to commence negotiations within 5 days of Respondent's notice of its readiness to bargain; or (4) the subsequent failure of the Union to bargain in good faith. In no event, however, shall any employee's entitlement exceed the amount he/she would have earned as wages from the date of cessation to the time the employee secured equivalent employment elsewhere, or the date on which Respondent should offer to bargain, whichever occurs first; provided further that in no event shall that entitlement be less than the employee would have earned for a 2-week period at the aforesaid normal pay rate when last in Respondent's employ.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[9]

ORDER

The Respondent, Chassis Maintenance, Inc., Oakland, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain collectively with Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 355 of Northern California (Union) concerning the effects on the employees in the appropriate unit below of its decision to close its operation in Oakland, California. The unit is:

> All production, warehouse, maintenance, material handling, and truck-driver employees at Respondent's operation in Oakland, California, exlcuding office clerical employees, timekeepers, administrative and professional employees, technical employees, guards, and supervisors.

(b) Failing and refusing, during the term of a collective-bargaining contract between it and the Union covering employees in the above unit, to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of those employees, to honor the terms of such contract (including those requiring contributions to the Sheet Metal Workers' of Northern California Health Care Plan and prescribing procedures to be followed when hiring and laying off employees), and to enter into the negotiation of a successor contract when timely requested by the Union to do so.

[9] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Making inducements to employees to withdraw their support of labor organization with whom it has a collective-bargaining contract by telling them that Respondent does not want another contract and that their benefits will be the same without a contract or without a union.

(d) Telling employees it will give them more work only if they achieve the withdrawal of unfair labor practice charges against Respondent that have been filed on their behalf with the National Labor Relations Board.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with the Union concerning the effects on the employees in the above unit of Respondent's decision to close its operation in Oakland, California; and reduce to writing any agreement resulting from such bargaining.

(b) Pay the unit employees on the payroll when Respondent terminated its Oakland operation in the manner set forth in the Remedy portion of this decision.

(c) Make the unit employees whole, with interest, for any monetary loss occasioned by Respondent's unlawful withholding of contributions to the above health care plan.[10]

(d) Make Miguel Dimas whole, with interest, for any loss of wages and benefits he suffered because of Respondent's disregard of his seniority and other contractually bestowed rights in connection with his two layoffs in August 1986.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary or useful to analyze the amounts owing under the terms of this Order.

(f) Mail copies of the attached notice, marked "Appendix,"[11] in both English and Spanish, to the Union, to Miguel Dimas, and to all unit employees on the payroll when Respondent terminated its Oakland operation. Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being duly singed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be mailed immediately upon receipt thereof as herein directed.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps it has taken to comply.

[10] Interest, where specified, shall be computed in accordance with New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

June 22, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 23, 1982, Administratve Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Larsen Supply Co., Inc., Santa Fe Springs, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent's showing of objective considerations was insufficient to establish a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, we have considered the cumulative impact of the factors advanced by the Respondent. In this connection, we find that, even assuming arguendo the judge should have received the testimony of one of the Respondent owners, Ray Larsen, to the effect that eight or nine employees told him that other employees did not desire union representation, such "unverified assertions of disenchantment conveyed to Respondent secondhand" are insufficient to establish a reasonable good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. Cornell of California, 222 NLRB 303, 306 (1976), enfd. 577 F.2d 513 (9th Cir. 1978). Further, we agree with the judge's reliance on Arkay Packaging Corp., 227 NLRB 397 (1976), but only for the limited proposition for which he cited that case.

Lana Hill Parke, Esq., for the General Counsel.

A. Patrick Nagel and David McVey, Esqs., of Newport Beach, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

FREDERICK C. HERZOG, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed by General Warehousemen, Local No. 598, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union) that Larsen Suply Co., Inc. (the Respondent) has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, a complaint was issued on October 31, 1981, by the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board.

Accordingly, this case was tried before me at Los Angeles, California, on June 17, 1982. At the trial all parties were afforded the right to participate, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence in support of their positions. All parties were also afforded the right to make oral argument and to file briefs at the conclusion of the trial. The General Counsel chose to argue orally on the record, but waived the filing of a brief.

Based on the record, plus my consideration of the brief filed by the Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent is a corporation engaged in warehousing and distrubuting plumbing supplies at its facility located in Santa Fe Springs, California. In the course and conduct of its business it annually purchases and receives goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

The Respondent is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is now, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Fact

On June 21, 1979, the Board conducted a secret-ballot election among the Respondent's employees based on a petition filed by the Union in a unit described as follows:

> All warehousemen, including order fillers, packers, stockmen, checkers, and truckdrivers employed by Respondent at its facility located at 12055 Slauson Avenue, Santa Fe Springs, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Of 32 eligible votes, 28 cast ballots, with 14 voting in favor of representation by the Union, 12 voting against the Union, and 2 ballots being challenged. While the details are unclear, it is conceded that one or both of the challeged ballots were resolved[1] and that the Union won the election. As a result, and apparently with no objections to conduct affecting the results of the election being filed, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above on August 6, 1979.

Following the Union's certification the parties met in negotiating sessions on December 1, 1980, and January 13, 16, and 26, March 3 and 12, April 7, and May 18, 1981. They failed to reach a collective-bargaining agreement. Jerry Stephens, a business agent and organizer for the Union, testified that he became involved with the Respondent's employees in November 1980, over a year after the election and certification. The first negotiating session came about only a month or so later. According to Stephens, negotiations continued until May 18, 1981, at which time the Respondent's attorney, Nagel, promised to submit the Respondent's "final proposals" within a week or two thereafter. Stephens went on to state that the Union's repeated efforts since then to secure such proposals from the Respondent have proven fruitless.

[1] As speculated by Respndent's counsel at the trial, perhaps by the Union withdrawing its challenge to the one ballot it had challenged.

289 NLRB No. 41

Instead of a proposal for a contract, the Union received a letter from the respondent's attorney on August 28, 1981. The letter read as follows:

> My client, Larsen Supply Co., has just advised me that only 11 employees out of a total of 42 currently in the bargaining unit were employed at the time of the NLRB election in June, 1979. I am further informed by Larsen Supply that it has strong good faith doubt that your union currently represents that majority of the 42 employees in the bargaining unit. Based on the conviction that Teamsters Local 598 does not represent the majority of Larsen Supply's employees in the unit, Larsen Supply cannot as a matter of law engage in any further collective bargaining with you.

At the trial the Respondent offered to prove that it met and bargained with the Union after the certification, but that it was continually frustrated by what it regarded as the Union's ineptness, such as repeated attempts to cause the Respondent to agree to a standard form of agreement used in the area, by changes in the Union's negotiating team, and by the Union's lack of preparation for negotiating sessions, etc. Moreover, the Respondent asserted that on December 19, 1979, it announced that it would not meet again with the Union until the Union responded to prior proposals by the Respondent, and stopped treating each negotiating session as an opportunity to begin negotiations anew, with the Union's standard area contract being used as a starting point for the bargaining. The Respondent also offered to prove that the Union was advised at the last bargaining session, on May 18, 1981, that the Respondent would await the Union's submission of "bottom line proposals" before the Respondent would make a "last and final offer."

Finally, one of the Respondent's owners, Ray Larsen, testified that prior to August 28, 1981, he was approached individually and at various times by eight or nine unit employees,[2] and that each of them told him they "did not want the Union in there," and that they had "had enough of it" at the time the Union started its organizing campaign. The Respondent offered, but was not allowed, to prove that the eight or nine employees mentioned above had been told by other employees that they did not desire the Union's representation.

At no time did the Respondent file a charge with the Board concerning its perception that the Union's conduct in negotiations amounted to bad-faith bargaining. Nor was a decertification petition ever placed on file.

B. Conclusion

For many years it has been the law that a certified union enjoys an irrebuttable presumption of continuing majority status for 1 year after its certification. Ray Brooks v. NLRB, 384 U.S. 96, 98–102, 104 (1954). In the interests of stability in labor relations, the presumption of majority representative status continues after the first year (or, in the case of a voluntarily recognized union, after a "reasonable time") until it is rebutted by the employer's proof that (1) at the time it withdrew recognition the union, in fact, no longer enjoyed majority status, or (2) that the employer's refusal to bargain further was predicated on a reasonably grounded doubt as to the Union's continued majority status asserted in good faith, based on objective considerations, and raised in a context free of employer unfair labor practices. See U.S. Gypsum Co., 157 NLRB 65 (1966); Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480 (1969).

It is clear that the Respondent has neither succeeded nor offered to demonstrate that its asserted "strong good faith doubt" was based on the sort of objective considerations that should be recognized by the Board or the courts as valid excuses for refusing to bargain further.

The evidence presented or proffered by the Respondent fails completely to reach the question of whether the Union had lost majority support as of the date that recognition was withdrawn. That eight or nine employees told their employer that they remained firm in their conviction that they opposed union representation serves the Employer not at all. Assuming for the sake of argument that as many as nine[3] unit employees in fact came to Larsen and told him that they opposed the Union it remains true that these eight or nine constituted scarcely 22 percent of the employee complement. And even had their numbers been greater, it must be remembered that Larsen never testified that these employees told him that they had changed their minds, or that they no longer supported the Union. Instead, so he testified, they said they adhered to the same views they had held about the Union since before the election. Under these circumstances, it seems most probable that the 8 or 9 employees who spoke to Larsen were among the 12 employees who voted against union representation. Thus, their views, as recounted by Larsen, create no doubt at all, good faith or otherwise.[4]

The Respondent argues that the question of an employer's "good faith" in asserting a doubt is not to be determined solely on the evidence available to the employer at the time it asserts that a doubt exists. Indeed, the Respondent's brief goes so far as to claim that the fact that "actual knowledge" was not in existence until subsequent to August 28, 1981, is immaterial. However, as has been stated, "when the Board makes this determination [as to the basis of the employer's doubt] it is not controlled, or even guided, by the later ascertained facts of union adherence or non-adherence. It is father the quesiton of fact whether the company had a reasonable basis at the time of its refusal to bargain for believing that majority support of the bargaining union no longer existed." Bartenders Assn. of Pocatello, 213 NLRB 651, 653 (1974), citing and quoting Gulfmont Hotel, 362 F.2d 588, 589 (5th Cir. 1966); Holiday Inn of Dayton, 212 NLRB 553 (1974), on remand from NLRB v. Holiday Inn of Dayton, 474 F.2d 328 (6th Cir. 1973); Arkay Packaging Corp., 227 NLRB 397 (1976).

[2] Only three of whose names he recalled fully, though he also did recall a fourth employee's first name.

[3] Given Larsen's inability to recall more than three or four names, I find this a large assumption indeed.

[4] Golden State Habilitation Convalescent Center, 224 NLRB 1618, 1619 (1976), enf. denied 568 F.2d 77 (1st Cir. 1977).

It is obvious that progress in negotiations has been, to say the least, less than reasonable people might hope for. But the precise cause of the lack of progress is not so clear. Whether it was due to some failing of the Union's negotiators or to intransigence on the part of the Respondent's negotiator seems largely irrelevant to the question of whether the Respondent acted lawfully on August 28, 1981, in withdrawing recognition. For, even if there has been established a sudden change in the Union's bargaining posture, it is settled law that vagaries in a union's tactics do not constitute "objective considersations" sufficient to justify withdrawing from bargaining. Peoples' Gas System, 238 NLRB 1008 (1978).

Finally, while I doubt the adequacy of this record to support a finding that "turnover" in the employee complement has occurred, I am, for the sake of argument, assuming to be true the statement asserted in the August 28, 1981, letter, i.e., that only 11 of the 42 then employed were employed there at the time of the election. Nonetheless, I find this inadequate to justify the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition. In this, I rely on the presumption that newly added employees support the Union in the same proportion as was shown by the election. Laystrom Mfg. Co., 151 NLRB 1482 (1965); Peoples' Gas System, supra.

In sum, I conclude that, "[I]n refusing to bargain because of an alleged decline in union adherents, the employer is acting as a vicarious champion of its employees, a role no one has asked it to assume." Sahara-Tahoe Corp. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 553 (9th Cir. 1980), enf. denied 241 NLRB 106 (1979). By such actions the Respondent failed and refused to bargain collectively in good faith, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All warehousemen, including order fillers, packers, stockmen, checkers, and truckdrivers employed by Respondent at its facility located at 12055 Slauson Avenue, Santa Fe Springs, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times since June 21, 1979, the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive representative of employees in the unit described above in paragraph 3 for the purpose of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union on August 28, 1981, and, thereafter, failing and refusing to bargain collectively in good faith.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Larsen Supply Co., Inc., Santa Fe Springs, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with General Warehousemen, Local No. 598, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described below, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment:

> All warehousemen, including order fillers, packers, stockmen, checkers, and truckdrivers employed by Respondent at its facility located at 12055 Slauson Avenue, Santa Fe Springs, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with the above-named Union, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the unit described above, concerning rates of pay, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post the attached notice marked "Appendix" at its Santa Fe Springs, California place of business.[6] Copies of this notice, on forms to be provided the Regional Director for Region 21, after being duly signed by Respondent or an authorized representative, shall be conspicuously posted immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days thereafter in all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes. All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order are denied.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT do anything that intereferes with these rights. More specifically.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain collectively with General Warehousemen, Local No. 598, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described below, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment. The bargaining unit is:

> All warehousemen, including order fillers, packers, stockmen, checkers, and truckdrivers employed by the Respondent at its 12055 Slauson Avenue, Santa Fe Springs, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL bargain collectively, on request, with the above-named Union, as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees in the unit described above, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

LARSEN SUPPLY CO., INC.

Canonie Transportation Company and District 2-Marine Engineers Beneficial Association-Associated Maritime Officers, AFL-CIO, Petitioner. Case 7-RC-18255

June 22, 1988

DECISION AND DIRECTION

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to and determinative challenges in a mail ballot election held from Febraury 13 until March 17, 1987, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows seven votes for the Petitioner and eight votes for the Intervenor, Local 486, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO. There were two determinative challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has adopted the hearing officer's findings[1] and recommendations as modified by this Decision and Direction.

The hearing officer recommended overruling the Employer's challenges to the ballots of Paul Brown and Mark Mather. The Employer alleged that Brown and Mather were ineligible to vote because, before the election, each spent a regular and substantial portion of his working time substituting as a temporary relief captain, a supervisory position.[2] The hearing officer recommended overruling the challenges on the ground that neither Brown nor Mather spent 50 percent of his working time as a supervisor during the year preceding the election.[3]

For the reasons stated below, we agree with the hearing officer that the challenge to Brown's ballot should be overruled. Contrary to the hearing officer, however, we find that the challenge to Mather's ballot should be sustained.

289 NLRB No. 44

The Employer provides tugboat and barge inland waterway services within the Great Lakes. The Employer's season commences in April and ends in December. A tugboat crew consists of a captain, first mate, engineer, assistant engineer, and deckhands. The crew is split so that crewmembers alternate 6-hour shifts, 24 hours a day. The captain and first mate alternate assuming command of vessel. The Employer has also instituted a relief program whereby crews are rotated off a tugboat and replaced by a relief crew.

The relief captain assumes command of a vessel in the absence of a full-time captain.

The hearing officer found that Brown and Mather were hired as first mates in 1983.[4] Brown did not sail as relief captain in either 1983 or 1984. In 1985, Brown worked less than 50 percent of his time as relief captain and spent less than 80 hours as relief captain in 1986.[5] Mather was a relief captain for approximately 7 weeks in 1984 and was not a relief captain in 1985. In 1986, Mather spent less than 50 percent of his working time as a relief captain.

The hearing officer found that Brown and Mather possessed supervisory authority only when acting as relief captain and this authority was sharply demarcated from their rank-and-file duties. Additionally, Brown's and Mather's time spent as relief captain was measurable and continuous with a sharp distinction from nonsupervisory time. Relying on Great Western Sugar Co., 137 NLRB 551 (1962); and Westinghouse Electric Corp., 163 NLRB 723 (1967), affd. 171 NLRB 1239 (1968), enfd. 424 F.2d 1151 (7th Cir. 1970), cert. denied 400 U.S. 831 (1970), the hearing officer held that Brown and Mather were not statutory supervisors at the time of the election because they spent less than 50 percent of their working time performing supervisory duties. The hearing officer found that Great Western and Westinghouse are applicable to situations where, as here, employees fulfill distinct supervisory duties during portions of the year and these duties are sharply demarcated in function and time from rank-and-file responsibilities.

We disagree with the hearing officer's application of the "50 percent" rule in determining the supervisory status of both Brown and Mather. Examination of subsequent cases reveal that Great Western and Westinghouse are not applicable to the instant situation.

[1] The employer has excepted to some of the hearing officer's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find no basis for reversing the findings.

We also find no merit in the Employer's contention that it was unable to properly cross-examine Board Agent Chet Byerly concerning any written documentation of his conversation with employee William Yager. The record indicates that neither the hearing officer nor counsel for the Region restricted the cross-examination. We also agree with the hearing officer's finding that the Employer did not make a clear request for any written documentation of the Byerly conversation with Yager.

[2] The hearing officer found that a relief captain performs supervisory duties. No party excepted to his finding and the record fully supports the hearing officer's determination.

[3] The hearing officer specified that a prevailing union would only represent Brown and Mather concerning their rank-and-file duties.

[4] The unit consists of mates, chief engineers, assistant engineers, and deckhands employed at the Employer's Muskegon, Michigan facility.

[5] The record shows that Brown broke his arm in the fall of 1986 and performed nonunit dispatcher duties for the remainder of the year. The record also indicates that the time Brown spent in 1986 as relief captain before the injury covered approximately 11 days.

In Great Western, the Board held that employees in seasonal industries who perform supervisory duties for a portion of the year and unit functions for the remainder of the year may be represented with respect to their rank-and-file duties. The Board noted that seasonal supervisors may be represented because their supervisory and unit responsibilities are clearly demarcated and are performed during different periods of the year. The Board, however, did not indicate whether the seasonal supervisors in Great Western supervised other unit employees or nonunit personnel.

In Westinghouse, the Board, citing Great Western, held that the employees who spend at least 50 percent of their working time performing nonsupervisory duties would be eligible to vote. In Westinghouse, a group of engineers was assigned to specific projects located on customer sites away from the workplace. Some of the engineers had supervisory authority, but only for particular projects. The period of time when these engineers possessed supervisory authority was measurable and clearly demarcated. However, the Board specifically noted that their supervisory authority extended only to nonprofessional craft employees hired for the project; no supervisory authority was exercised over the unit employees.

In Doctor's Hospital of Modesto, 183 NLRB 950, 951 (1970), affd. 193 NLRB 833 (1971), enfd. 489 F.2d 772 (9th Cir. 1973), the Board placed certain limits on the application of the "50 percent ' rule. Specifically, the Board stated:

> The . . . eligibility criteria enunicated in Westinghouse do not apply to circumstances . . . wherein the disputed individuals are performing both their allegedly supervisory and nonsupervisory jobs during the same workweek, in the same department with essentially the same complement of employees.

Subsequenlty, in Aladdin Hotel, 270 NLRB 838, 839-840 (1984), the Board held that Westinghouse is inapplicable to situations in which temporary supervisors exercise authority over unit employees and perform both supervisory and nonsupervisory duties during the same work period. The Board stated that in these circumstances the appropriate test is whether the part-time supervisors spend a regular and substantial portion of their working time performing supervisory tasks or whether such substitution is merely sporadic and insignificant.

We agree with the hearing officer's finding that there is a clear demarcation between Brown's and Mather's supervisory duties and their rank-and-file duties. We also agree that the time Brown and Mather spent as relief captain is measurable and continuous with a sharp distinction from nonsupervisory time. Unlike the engineers in Westinghouse, however, and like the individuals in issue in Aladdin Hotel, relief captains here exercise supervisory authority over fellow unit employees in the same workplace where they perform rank-and-file duties.[6] Accordingly, we conclude that the "50 percent" rule is inapplicable to the present case.

In applying the "regular and substantial" test to the instant case, we find, contrary to the Employer's assertions, that Brown's fewer than 80 hours served as relief captain in 1986 did not constitute spending a regular and substantial portion of his time working as a relief captain in the year preceding the election. The Employer in its exceptions argues that Brown would have spent approximately 2 to 3 months as relief captain had he not broken his arm. Such an assertion, however, is merely speculative and cannot support a finding of supervisory status. We also reject the Employer's argument that because Brown spent time in a nonunit desk position during his injury, his ballot should not be counted. The record indicates that his dispatcher duties were temporary due to injuries. Accordingly, Brown shares a sufficient community of interest with the other unit employees and his ballot will be counted.

We find, however, that Mather spent a regular and substantial portion of his working time as a relief captain in 1986. Mather credibly testified that he spent approximately 17 weeks as relief captain from April through December 1986,[7] a substantial period of time. Although there are no specific patterns to the entire 17-week period,[8] the Employer's uncontroverted testimony shows that any irregularity was not caused by the Employer's scheduling, but rather from the variability of the workflow in the tugboat service industry.[9] Accordingly, we sustain the Employer's challenge to Mather's ballot.

DIRECTION

IT IS DIRECTED that the Regional Director for Region 7 shall, within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Direction, open and count the ballot of Paul Brown. The Regional Director shall then serve on the parties a revised tally of ballots and issue the appropriate certification.

---

[6] We note that Mather's testimony, which was generally credited by the hearing officer, indicates that he worked as relief captain and mate on each of two tugboats during separate assignments.

[7] We find that Mather's hours worked as relief captain during those 17 weeks ranged from 8 to 40 hours per week.

[8] Mather did testify, however, that he regularly rotated approximately every 2 weeks as relief captain and mate from July until December 1986.

[9] It is undisputed that the Employer produces a regular relief schedule before a season commences, but the schedule changes due to circumstances beyond the Employer's control.

Westvaco Corporation and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Local Union 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO. Case 11-CA-11872

June 22, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 29, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Lawrence W. Cullen issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party and the General Counsel filed briefs in response, and the Charging Party filed a cross-exception with a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

289 NLRB No. 45

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Westvaco Corporation, North Charleston, South Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Ann B. Wall, Esq., for the General Counsel.
George P. Smith, Esq. (Constangy, Brooks & Smith), of Atlanta, Georgia, for the Respondent.
Robert D. Kurnick, Esq. (Sherman, Dunn, Cohen, Leifer & Counts), of Washington, D.C., for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LAWRENCE W. CULLEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Charleston, South Carolina, on 28 April 1986. The original charge was filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Local Union 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO (the Unions or the Charging Parties or designated separately as the International or Local 1753) on 23 December 1985 against Respondent Westvaco Corporation (Westvaco or the Respondent) and the complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 11 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) in this case on 3 February 1986 and alleged that Westvaco had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by, since on or about 23 June 1985, refusing to bargain collectively with the Union by insisting to impasse over its maintenance and operator performance improvement plan (MOPIP) and has further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by, since on or about 18 November 1985, unilaterally without notification or consultation with Local 1753, implementing its MOPIP. Respondent by its answer filed on 18 February 1986 has denied the commission of any violations of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT[1]

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, Respondent Westvaco Corporation admits, and I find that it has been at all times material a New York corporation with a facility located at North Charleston, South Carolina, where it is engaged in the manufacture of pulp, paper, and by-products, that during the 12 months prior to the filing of the complaint, which period is representative of all times material, Respondent received at its North Charleston, South Carolina facility goods and raw materials valued in excess of

---

[1] In sec. IV of his decision the judge inadvertently stated the abbreviation for the United Paperworkers International Union as "I.P.I.U." instead of "U.P.I.U."

[2] The Respondent excepts to the judge's conclusion that it was clear that the International president of the IBEW had the right to approve or reject the proposed contract which the members of Local Union 1753 had ratified. This proposed contract basically copied the parties' 1982 labor contract, but with certain modifications. Those modifications, however, did not make any change in the provision "Parties to Agreement," which states, in part: "This agreement is to become effective when signed by the Company and the Union and approved by the International President of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers." The Respondent argues that any requirement that the International approve the contract was waived because no such approval was required in previous years. However, the evidence regarding the parties' previous labor contracts shows that the International uniformly either approved the contract or in fact signed as a party to the contract. The International president rejected the proposed 1985 contract, and thus the contract, by its own terms, never became effective.

The Respondent also argues that the Union is estopped or barred by laches from asserting that the proposed 1985 contract did not become effective. The Respondent failed, however, to submit evidence sufficient to warrant such a finding. There was no evidence on the parties' past practice regarding the time between membership ratification of a proposed contract and the International's approval of the contract. Thus we cannot say, based on past practice, that the 2-1/2 months between membership ratification of the proposed 1985 contract and the International's rejection of the contract was an unreasonable period of time. Nor can we say that this was such a long period of time that the International must be deemed to have unreasonably delayed its decision, regardless of the parties' past practice. Futhermore, we note that there was no evidence that the Respondent made any effort to learn whether the International had approved or rejected the contract while the matter was pending before the International. Accordingly, we cannot agree that the Union is either estopped or barred by laches from asserting that the proposed 1985 contract did not become effective. In any event, we note our further agreement with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent had unlawfully bargained to impasse as of November 4, 1985, and implemented its proposals on November 21 or 22, 1985, only 10 days after the proposed contract was sent to the International for its approval.

Finally, in adopting the findings and conclusions of the judge, we rely on Boise Cascade Corp., 283 NLRB 462 (1987).

$50,000 directly from points outside the State of South Carolina, and shipped from its North Charleston, South Carolina facility products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of South Carolina, and that it is now and has at all times material been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the International and Local 1753 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE BARGAINING UNIT

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

> All electricians, power and boiler house employees, and instrument department employees of the Employer at its Charleston, South Carolina plant, excluding electrician leadmen and shift engineers, all other production and maintenance employees, office clerical employees, plant clerical employees, professional employees, technical employees, guards, watchmen, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The facts in this case are essentially undisputed. The Respondent operates a paper and pulp manufacturing plant with the end products of various cardboard wrappings and other products and also operates as part of the same facility, a small chemical operation. The plant is approximately 50 years of age. Respondent, according to the unrebutted testimony of its Industrial Relations Manager Jack Flynn, became concerned over a period of years of its disadvantages in competing with other newer and more efficient plants that require fewer man-hours per unit of product. One of the problems perceived by management was the organization of the work force along "strict craft lines." There are approximately 800 to 900 hourly employees and a similar number of salaried employees. The hourly workers are represented by four unions, including two locals of the United Paperworkers International Union (IPIU), one of which represents employees in the pulp mill operation and the other of which represents employees in the paper mill. The International Association of Machinists (IAM) represents employees generally referred to as maintenance mechanics. Local 1753 represents the electrical workers composed of employees set out in the appropriate unit, supra. Local 1753 represents approximately 125 employees including 60 electricians who install conduit, wire, and cable, and test and maintain pole lines and fixtures, lighting circuits and equipment, power feeders, motors, generators, alternators, and other electrical equipment and devices. Local 1753 also represents 18 instrument technicians who install, repair, and calibrate process control instruments, and 39 powerhouse operators who operate boilers and 11 powerhouse repairmen who repair boilers and turbines.

Over a period of the prior several years, Respondent had designated a committee of its management employees who were assigned to study operations of other pulp and paper mills in the United States and in other countries to determine how to improve the efficiency of its operations in order to effectively compete with other pulp and paper mills, many of which were of relatively recent vintage with modern equipment. One of the central conclusions of the committee was that it would be necessary to eliminate strict adherence to craft lines among the hourly employees in order to facilitate workflow and efficiently operate the plant by permitting employees of one craft (represented by one union) to perform the work of other crafts (represented by other unions) on an as-needed basis in order to avoid delays and downtime in the large plant operation.

The collective-bargaining agreement between Local 1753 and the Respondent was effective on 1 July 1982 and continued through 30 July 1985 and contained a 60-day notice provision for modification and also contained a provision that it would remain in force and effect after the expiration date until either party gave the other a notice of its intent to terminate the agreement in not less than 10 days beyond the date of the notice. In the fall of 1984 the Respondent made an unsuccessful attempt at early negotiations with all the unions at the premises by presenting a comprehensive proposal of work rule changes that would eliminate craft line barriers to assignment of work. This attempt was abandoned prior to the close of 1984.

The contracts of all the unions on the premises were to be negotiated in 1985 and the Respondent made a comprehensive proposal to the unions' MOPIP, which it introduced into its negotiations with the four unions in 1985. The plan would eliminate the contractually designated craft lines by training members of one craft represented by one union in a skill of another craft represented by another union and permit them to perform the work previously performed by the other craft as required by management. In the case of the IBEW group, employees who were not covered by the IBEW agreement would be trained in the field of electricity and would perform work previously performed exclusively by the electricians. Employees in the IBEW group would be trained to perform work previously performed exclusively by the other crafts (i.e., welding or maintenance and repair work). These changes would also require that the second paragraph of article I, Recognition, be removed from the agreement. That paragraph stated:

> The Company will not habitually assign work normally performed by employees in the established unit to employees outside the unit as long as employees in the unit are available, either on the job or from the overtime roster, and qualified to do the work involved. Employees are available if they are on the job even though they may be otherwise occupied, provided they can be released, or if they can be called in from the overtime roster.

Under MOPIP the employees' job classifications would also be changed with electricians and instrument technicians becoming I/E mechanics, powerhouse repairmen becoming general mechanics. Several other classifications of other unions would also be designated as general mechanics. The powerhouse operators would be designated as operators. Under MOPIP each union would continue to represent the same percentage of general mechanics as they had prior to its implementation, and newly hired employees would be assigned to one of the bargaining units as required to maintain appropriate percentages of employees.

The negotiations to replace the collective-bargaining agreement commenced on 7 May. Local 1753 was represented by IBEW International Representative E. H. Massey Jr., who served as chief spokesman, Local 1753 President Allen Wall, and other members of the Local's bargaining committee. Respondent was represented by Industrial Relations Manager Jack Flynn, Supervisor Julius Guerard, and others. Massey testified as follows: At the 7 May meeting, the parties exchanged proposals but MOPIP, although included as a proposal, was not discussed because a joint meeting had been set for 17 June to enable Respondent to address all four unions concerning MOPIP and to answer their questions. Massey testified that although the parties met on 3 and 4 June, there was little progress as Respondent held off on discussions of most areas contending they would be discussed or resolved by MOPIP. Respondent met with all four unions on 17–20 June and explained the MOPIP program. The meeting was commenced by Respondent's industrial relations manager, Flynn, who told the Unions' representatives that Respondent expected to have an agreement by 30 June, that they would make a presentation of MOPIP, listen to the Unions' concerns, and address what areas they could, and then give the Unions their final positions as to what MOPIP would entail. On the second day Respondent's representatives responded to questions and told Local 1753 representatives that it was important to it that the employees of other bargaining units perform work on energized lines, and that they would not change their position on this although each of the Unions indicated opposition to crossing the energized lines. The Respondent responded "that they had to have that issue," according to the unrebutted testimony of Massey. During the joint meeting the Respondent committed that members of Local 1753 would continue to have responsibility for voltages of above 440.[2] Massey testified further that on 17 June Flynn informed the representatives of the four unions that responses would be made to the matters raised by the Unions on 18 June and that these responses would be encompassed into a single package as part of the 17 June offer and this would be the Respondent's offer. The Respondent's proposal remained the same on 20 June as on 17 June with minor modifications according to the testimony of Massey. No agreement was reached on MOPIP at this series of meetings. Local 1753 informed the Respondent it was willing to cross lines between its own instrument technicians and electricians, but was unwilling to cross the craft lines of other unions to perform other crafts' work or to have them perform its work. After the Respondent's final offer following the 20 June meeting, Massey wrote Flynn on 25 June and indicated those areas of MOPIP Local 1753 would and could not accept. After the 20 June meeting, Respondent entered into negotiations with the Paperworkers local unions and Local 1753 was unable to set up another meeting until at the request of Local 1753 the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service mediator was able to set up a meeting for 19 July. At that meeting Respondent maintained that MOPIP had to be settled or Local 1753 must accept it in order to obtain an agreement. The Respondent caucused at this meeting and then presented another proposal through the mediator dated 25 June, which was essentially the same proposal as that presented previously by Respondent during the 17–20 June meetings. The Local 1753 committee caucused and reviewed this offer and did not accept it. Massey advised Flynn of this by letter and also requested a meeting on 4 September to resume negotiations. Flynn responded to this letter and stated in his letter response that MOPIP must be resolved to reach an agreement and agreed to the 4 September meeting date. The parties met on 4 and 5 September and Local 1753 withdrew a number of its bargaining demands but according to Massey, Respondent remained firm on most items and made it clear that MOPIP would remain on the table.

Massey testified further that the parties met again on 7 October and at that meeting Respondent advised Local 1753 that the Paperworkers locals had ratified their labor agreements and that Respondent was willing to go through all outstanding items and give the Union its final position, but that there were no changes in the Respondent's proposal on MOPIP. The next day Flynn presented Respondent's typed offer, which still contained the MOPIP proposal. The Union's committee was not satisfied with the proposal and did not present it to the membership. On 31 October the Respondent gave the Union a 10-day notice as provided in the agreement to terminate the agreement effective 9 November and forwarded a copy to Massey and also sent a letter to the employees. Massey was contacted by the Federal mediator to meet on 31 October with the Union. At that meeting the parties examined various outstanding items such as the mill provision, vacation sellbacks, refusals of temporary or permanent promotions, and MOPIP. Respondent was not agreeable to any of the Union's proposals except the refusal-to-promote proposal. At the 31 October meeting the Union offered to leave the existing meal allowance as it was and permit employees to sign meal tickets at the cafeteria to eliminate Respondent's cash-flow problem. On vacation sellback, the Union proposed that an employee could sell back only 2 weeks of his vacation. The Union accepted the Respondent's proposal on freezing of promotions. The Respondent offered a $750 lump-sum payment in the second year of the contract, and the Union proposed a 3-percent general wage increase. The Union asked the Company to agree to the Union's letter proposal of 25 June, and the Respondent rejected this offer and restated its 8 October offer to be effective the first Monday following ratification. At no point in the negotiations did Respondent make changes in its written proposals with respect to what voltages of electricity employees could be assigned to work on, but maintained that any voltages 440 or under could be worked on by any employee at the supervisor's discretion. It did commit that voltages over 440 would continue to be worked on only by I/Es and other crafts would not be assigned this work. At this meeting Respondent also stated that article XXII[3] of the existing labor agreement must be eliminated to comply with MOPIP.

[2] Ninety percent of the electrical work performed by Local 1753 bargaining unit members involved voltages of 440 or below according to the subsequent testimony at the hearing of Local 1753 Business Manager Allen Wall.

On 4 November the parties met again and Massey presented a longhand proposal to Respondent to resolve all issues except MOPIP and to put MOPIP on hold to let the Board decide whether it was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining as the Union had filed a charge with the Board alleging that Respondent was insisting to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining and was awaiting the answer of the Board. This was one of several similar charges filed by the Union against the Respondent during the course of negotiations. The Respondent rejected the offer of the Union and negotiations were concluded on that date. The union negotiation committee decided to submit the Company's proposal to the membership in view of the termination date of 9 November pursuant to the 10-day notice sent to the Union by the Respondent. The members voted on 8 November to accept the Respondent's proposal. Wall informed the Respondent of the result. Subsequently the Region informed Massey that he should withdraw the charge as the Respondent had not implemented the proposal as yet. Massey withdrew the charge on 20 or 21 November. On 25 November Massey was informed by Wall that MOPIP was being implemented and filed the charge on 29 November, which is the basis for this complaint. This labor agreement provides as have others in the past that it is subject to approval by the International. Massey was informed on 23 January 1986 by the International's vice president that the International would not approve the agreement and this was confirmed in writing by the International's letter of 27 January 1986. Massey called Guerard in Flynn's absence on 24 January 1986 and informed him of the International's decision to refuse to approve the agreement and that "it looked like we needed to get back to the table." Flynn called Massey the following Tuesday and told Massey to submit any further communications in writing to the Respondent.

Massey testified further that the Union objected to MOPIP as it was certified to represent electricians, instrument, powerhouse operators, and instrument repairmen, and the unit would lose its identity under MOPIP. Additionally, under the Respondent's proposal the Union's members designated as general mechanics were not assured of any proportional number of their members being retained to perform work that could be performed by members of other crafts in the bargaining units under MOPIP. Safety was a concern as the members were concerned about inadequately trained personnel handling energized electrical equipment. Money was also a factor in the Union's reluctance to agree to MOPIP. The members also objected to doing other crafts' work.

Massey testified further that on several occasions during the course of negotiations Respondent through its spokesman Flynn stated it had made its final offer on MOPIP. Initially at the 19 or 20 June meeting, Flynn informed the union representatives, "We've gone through it all, we've answered all your questions and we're ready to put together our final offer on MOPIP. "In every proposal made by Respondent, MOPIP was a part. Throughout the course of negotiations Respondent insisted that MOPIP was essential to reaching an agreement. Massey testified there were no meetings between the Union and the Respondent between 7 and 31 October as the Union was awaiting a decision from the Board on its charge filed against the Respondent concerning MOPIP. Massey acknowledged that the International had been apprised by him that the local committee disapproved of MOPIP and that the International acted to disapprove the contract at the request of the local committee. On 31 October four items in addition to MOPIP were still unresolved. They were vacation sellbacks, freezing of promotions, wages, and meal allowances.

Local 1753 Union President Allen Wall testified that on 29 October the Union's bargaining committee was called into a meeting with Dr. Thomas, Respondent's president, and Flynn, and given the 10-day notice. Wall testified that the Union was not striking and were concerned about a possible lockout by Respondent. The parties met again on 31 October and the meeting broke up with Respondent giving the Union its final offer in writing. The parties met again on 1 November and the Respondent told the Union that the recognition clause must be eliminated as a result of MOPIP. He asked Flynn whether it was true if the Respondent locked out the employees, no employee could cross the line, and Flynn told him this was correct. Wall testified further that on 8 October when the Respondent had given the Union until 18 October to finalize the agreement, Massey had inquired whether there was any significance to the 10-day notice and Flynn replied, "No, I'm not locking you out. I'm giving you a 10 day notice." At the 29 October meeting with Dr. Thomas, Wall told Flynn, "I was under the impression you weren't going to give us a 10 day notice with the intentions of . . . putting pressure on us to lock us out," and that Flynn responded, "That was on that offer." The membership ratified the agreement on 8 November and Wall notified Massey and Flynn of this. The agreement was signed on 11 November and a copy was provided to Massey for the International for approval. Shortly after the International disapproved the agreement, Wall was to meet with Julius Guerard concerning some grievances, and Guerard told him he (Guerard) understood that the International had disapproved the agreement, and Wall told Guerard he could not respond as he had not seen anything in writing on it. Subsequently, a month before the instant hearing he met informally with Guerard on a few matters and told Guerard that Respondent should save its money and not print up the agreement since the International had disapproved it, but Guerard said the Respondent was going to go ahead and get it ready. MOPIP was implemented on 21 or 22 November when Respondent assigned powerhouse repairmen to welding classes and on 6 January the employees received wage adjustments for unrestricted flexibility. On 7 January, Respondent commenced training the I/E group of employees. Since that time members of the bargaining unit have been assigned to work with members of other bargaining units such as pipefitters and outside machinists and to perform the work traditionally performed by the other crafts.

[3] This article sets out requirements for two electricians or one journeyman electrician and one apprentice electrician to work on jobs involving 440 and above voltages. It also provides that the Union's work will not be habitually assigned to other than bargaining unit members.

On 1 November Wall had a second meeting with Flynn who had called him to his office to tell him that Respondent was firm on MOPIP and the 10-day notice and to give him a copy of the letter sent to the membership, which urged the membership to vote for the labor agreement including MOPIP and which stated in part:

> Lastly, and this is very important, the action taken in giving the Union a 10-day notice is of the utmost seriousness. The Company's intent is to bring the parties together and focus on settlement before 8:00 a.m., November 9, 1985. That remains our intent but you must recognize that if this does not occur, the contract terminates at that time. In that event there are three possibilities:
> 1 The Company extends the ten-day notice
> 2 Local 1753, IBEW strikes
> 3 The Company locks out employees represented by Local 1753, IBEW.

Wall testified that Flynn told him at this meeting that Respondent would not let the Union stand in the way of MOPIP and that they did not want to lock the Union out but said, "If you think this is going to be a three-week hunting and fishing trip like 1982 . . . you're sadly mistaken." Wall told Flynn that the Union wanted a continuing working agreement and was not going to strike. Wall testified that the proposal was submitted to the membership because the committee felt a lockout would occur if no agreement was reached, and he was aware of the posting of security guards around the mill as a result of a notice on the bulletin board. He had also seen security guards at two locations around the plant.

John Flynn, Respondent's industrial relations manager, testified as follows: The I/E group was not incorporated into the proportional representation portion of MOPIP as it was contemplated that the I/E group would stay the same or increase in number as a result of the plant's becoming high tech and more computerized, which would require greater sophistication and skill and that the I/E group would not be subject to the reductions as much as the mechanics and service portions of the maintenance group. Respondent thus anticipated that the IBEW Union would benefit by increases in numbers as a result of these factors, but was not adverse to according proportional representation to the IBEW group if they had raised this as an issue. To eliminate safety concerns, the Respondent agreed that the operators, including the two UPIU groups and the powerhouse operators, would not work on energized equipment and mechanical craftsmen would only work on energized equipment alone after they were trained for 8 hours and had worked with I/E mechanics for 2 years and they would not work on starters or switch gears unless accompanied by an I/E mechanic. Over the years the approval of the International has not been crucial to the implementation of the agreement and on at least one occasion was not forthcoming.

Flynn conceded on cross-examination that nothing in the MOPIP agreement guarantees there will be any new apprentices once the current group completes its training or that would prevent a reduction in the I/E mechanics in the future or that would prevent the assignment of I/E work to other crafts when it is 440 or less in voltage with the exception of requiring other craftsmen to work with IBEW I/E mechanics on switch gears and some other equipment. He does not recall that Wall told him that the Union was pursuing its unfair labor practice charge on the night when he called to tell him the Union had ratified the agreement. He acknowledged that at the 3 October meeting the statement was made by the Respondent that "the company was ready and willing to negotiate an agreement; but if there was no movement, continued discussions would be useless."

Wall testified on rebuttal that he had informed Flynn that the Union "had ratified the agreement but that the charges remained active."

V. CONTENTIONS OF THE PARTIES

The General Counsel and Charging Party contend that MOPIP is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining and would blur the craft lines between the unions and thus effect changes in their certifications by allowing the Respondent to change the unit description and to allow the Respondent unfettered control in assigning work on jobs to employees at its whim with the power to decimate the bargaining unit and that it would thereby remove the employees' rights to representation of their own choosing as encompassed in Section 9(a) of the Act. They contend further that Respondent insisted to impasse on 4 November 1935 (and on several prior dates according to the Charging Party's view) up to the time of the acceptance of the agreement under the threat of lockout by Respondent and that this impasse was reached regarding this subject as the principal subject of disagreement between the parties. They thus contend that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its insistence to impasse on MOPIP, a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, as a requisite for reaching agreement on the other mandatory subjects of bargaining and that it also violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its implementation of MOPIP following the ratification of it by its members and by subsequently refusing to return to the bargaining table to negotiate following the disapproval of the International of the agreement in January 1986 and the verbal request of Massey to negotiate.

The Respondent contends that MOPIP related to work jurisdiction and task and work assignments rather than to the Union's certification and thus did not involve a representational matter, that it was necessary to effect efficiencies and improvements in its operations in order to enable it to compete, and that the Union's concern was with not having to perform maintenance work rather than with matters of safety as professed by the Union. It further contends that assuming arguendo MOPIP was found to be a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, it did not insist to impasse on MOPIP but rather MOPIP was only one of several clearly economic items on the table up to and at the time of its submission of its final offer to the Union relying on Taft Broadcasting Co., 274 NLRB 260 (1985). It also contends that the parties reached no impasse as the agreement was signed. It further contends that the Union did not act in good faith by the refusal of the International to approve the agreement, and that the agreement is binding.

VI. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

In reviewing all the above, I find that MOPIP was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining as it would have given Respondent the unfettered right to remove work from the bargaining unit at its whim, thus affecting the composition of the unit and the certification itself. This was not the right to assign a mere specific task out of the bargaining unit. Rather it was the right to redesignate employee classifications and transfer entire work groups out of the unit by totally eliminating their work and altering the scope of the unit and the certification of the Union to represent the employees. The Board has consistently held that such proposals are nonmandatory subjects of bargaining. Newspaper Printing Corp., 250 NLRB 1144 (1980), enf. denied 692 F.2d 615 (6th Cir. 1982); Newspaper Printing Corp., 232 NLRB 291 (1977), enfd. 625 F.2d 956 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 911 (1981); Columbia Tribune Publishing Co., 201 NLRB 538, 551 (1973).

I further find that the Respondent insisted to impasse on the Union's acceptance of its MOPIP proposal as a requisite for its agreement to other mandatory subjects of bargaining. Throughout the course of the bargaining up to and including the final offer prior to the ratification of the agreement by the employees, the Respondent set out its MOPIP agreement as an absolute it must have in order to reach agreement. Although there were some modifications of the proposal made by Respondent during the current negotiations, the MOPIP proposal stood out as the single significant impediment to reaching an agreement as asserted by Respondent's representative Jack Flynn on several occasions and as set out by Respondent in its 10-day notice of termination of the agreement and in the letter to the employees. The Board in Douds v. Longshoremen ILA, 241 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1957), has held it immaterial that impasse may have been reached on mandatory subjects of bargaining as well as nonmandatory subjects of bargaining in finding a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act had occurred by the Employer's insistence on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining to impasse. It is rare indeed for all items to be resolved save a single nonmandatory subject of bargaining. In the more common situation there may be several unresolved issues. In the Taft Broadcasting Co., supra, cited by the Respondent, the Board did not reject the premise that an employer may unlawfully insist to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining although there may be several other mandatory subjects of bargaining as yet unresolved that may also be contributing to the impasse. Rather the Board in Taft Broadcasting, supra at 261 stated:

> The existence of several unresolved items at the point impasse is reached, however, does not necessarily mean that each of the unresolved items caused the impasse. Thus, in evaluating whether parties have insisted to impasse on a particular nonmandatory subject of bargaining, the Board and the courts have looked to whether agreement on the mandatory subjects of bargaining are conditioned on agreement on the nonmandatory subjects of bargaining.

Applying this test to the facts in this case, I find that the Respondent's MOPIP proposal was the central focus of disagreement between the parties throughout the course of the negotiations. See Bozzuto's, Inc., 277 NLRB 977 (1985). The evidence was virtually undisputed that the Respondent had throughout negotiations informed the union representatives that MOPIP was critical to reaching an agreement. I find that the Respondent insisted to impasse on the acceptance of MOPIP by the Union at the final substantive meeting when it rejected the Union's proposal to resolve all issues but MOPIP and that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its insistence to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining as a condition for reaching agreement on mandatory subjects of bargaining. Although wages and other mandatory subjects of bargaining had not been resolved, the evidence demonstrates that these were not the cause of the impasse. I find the evidence is insufficient to demonstrate that impasse was reached prior to this during the course of bargaining from June to October as there appears to have been ongoing efforts at negotiations by both parties that were interrupted by other matters including ongoing negotiations by Respondent with the three other unions at the plant. I further find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its implementation of MOPIP in November and by its continuation of its implementation of MOPIP in January after it had been advised of the International's refusal to approve the agreement and by its failure to return to the bargaining table as requested by Wall. It is clear that the International had the right to approve or reject the agreement that the union membership had ratified in the face of a threatened lockout. Following the rejection of the agreement by the International, the Respondent had the obligation to return to the bargaining table as requested by Wall.

VII. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices of Respondent as found in section VI, above, in connection with the business of Respondent as found in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes obstructing the free flow of commerce.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent, Westvaco Corporation, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Local 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By its insistence to impasse on and by its implementation of its maintenance and operator productivity improvement plan (MOPIP), a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, and by its refusal to return to the bargaining table, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, it will be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act, and post the appropriate notice. The Board does not require that employees suffer losses of increases in wages and benefits under circumstances such as have occurred in this case in order to effectuate the policies of the Act, and I do not recommend that the increases in wages and benefits implemented by Respondent be rescinded. Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977); Dura-Vent Corp., 257 NLRB 430 (1981); and Pace Oldsmobile, 256 NLRB 1001 (1981). I do, however, recommend that all other terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement be reinstated to the status quo ante prior to 9 November 1985 when the agreement was ratified by the membership under threat of a lockout by the Respondent in support of its insistence to impasse on the nonmandatory subject of bargaining until Respondent fulfills its obligation by bargaining, on request, with Local 1753 as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit, and executes a written agreement with Local 1753 or until a valid impasse occurs, and that Respondent make its employees whole for any losses of earnings or benefits they may have sustained by the implementation of Respondent's proposal. Interest on the losses of earnings or benefits shall be applied in accordance with the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[4]

In the absence of any special circumstances asserted or argued in this case, I do not recommend the inclusion of a visitatorial clause as requested by the General Counsel to allow the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of civil procedure in order to monitor compliance. See O. L. Willis, Inc., 278 NLRB 203 (1986); United Cloth Co., 278 NLRB 583 (1986). Compare Hilton Inn North, 279 NLRB 45 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Westvaco Corporation, North Charleston, South Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Bargaining to impasse over its MOPIP proposal, a nonmandatory subject of bargaining.

(b) Instituting unilateral changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment by implementing its proposal on its MOPIP until such time as it has bargained the agreement by Local 1753.

(c) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Local 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative actions necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain in good faith with Local 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO.

(b) Make whole its employees for any losses they may have sustained as a result of Respondent's implementation of the aforesaid unilateral changes contained in its contract proposal.

(c) Reinstitute the existing terms of the labor agreement to the status quo ante prior to 9 November 1985 until such time as the parties have bargained in good faith and have executed a new agreement or, in the alternative, have reached an impasse.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Charleston, South Carolina facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[4] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Local Union 1753, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All electricians, power and boiler house employees, and instrument department employees of the Employer at its Charleston, South Carolina plant, excluding electrician leadmen and shift engineers, all other production and maintenance employees, office clerical employees, plant clerical employees, professional employees, technical employees, guards, watchmen, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT insist to impasse on our maintenance and operator productivity improvement plan (MOPIP) proposal, a nonmandatory subject of bargaining.

WE WILL NOT institute unilateral changes in the terms of the 1982-1985 collective-bargaining agreement by the implementation of our MOPIP proposal or otherwise unilaterally institute changes in existing terms and conditions of employment of our employees in the bargaining unit without notifying Local 1753 and bargaining collectively in good faith concerning such proposed changes, provided that nothing here shall require us to rescind any increases in wages or benefits that we have previously granted.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL rescind the MOPIP put into effect in November 1985 and will return to the status quo ante prior to 9 November 1985.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 1753, as the exclusive representative of employees in the appropriate bargaining unit described above with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL make whole the employees of Respondent in the above-described bargaining unit for any losses they may have sustained by the implementation of unilateral changes contained in our contract proposal with interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Babson and Cracraft

On December 18, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Eleanor MacDonald issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting and answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

1. We agree with the judge that the bargaining history in this case shows that the Union knew the Respondent planned to create new nonunit jobs with duties similar to those performed by unit employees when it agreed to broad contract language permitting the Respondent to eliminate all unit jobs, to transfer unit work to other employees or locations, and to determine what work the unit and nonunit employees would perform. Thus, we note that the entire contract package, including this broad language allowing the Respondent total discretion over the assignment of work and over the elimination of unit jobs, was not ratified by the Union's members until November 1984, after the Respondent had posted the new jobs for bidding and after the November bargaining sessions where the parties had discussed the nonunit status of these new jobs. Further, the bargaining history also shows that the Union knew before the contract was presented to its members for ratification that the Respondent planned to offer unit employees the opportunity to bid on these new nonunit jobs. Thus, Union General Counsel Groner admitted that during the November negotiations the Union had asked whether its members could bid on the new jobs and that the Respondent had said they could. By agreeing to such broad contract language when it knew of the Respondent's plans to create new nonunit jobs encompassing some unit work and to employ some former unit employees in these new nonunit jobs, the Union waived any right it had to bargain over the Respondent's actions here. The Union clearly believed it had waived its right to bargain on this point because it never requested any further bargaining over this issue after the November negotiations. Moreover, it waited until late May 1985 to make any further protests about the assignment of unit work, when it merely filed a grievance under the current contract.

2. We also agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. In adopting this dismissal, however, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's waiver rationale, because we find the General Counsel has not established that any discrimination based on union membership or activity occurred in the unique circumstances of this case. The General Counsel argues that, by offering some laid-off unit employees the opportunity to continue working in the new nonunit jobs, the Respondent was conditioning their employment on the abandonment of union membership and thus violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. There is no evidence, however, that the Respondent asked the former unit employees to give up their membership in the Union or in any other way conditioned their continuing employment on the abandonment of union membership. Nor is there any evidence that the Respondent selected particular unit employees for layoff based on their status as union members or their activities on behalf of the Union or that the Respondent decided which unit employees to offer the new nonunit jobs based on their lack of union membership or their lack of support for the Union. Although the Respondent did eliminate all the unit jobs, it only did this after reaching an agreement with the Union specifically allowing it to abolish the unit. The Union deemed it advantageous for the employees to make this agreement in return for immediate wage increases and generous severance benefits when the layoffs occurred, because the Respondent's financial condition was so poor it seemed likely that the Respondent would close and thus the employees would lose their jobs anyway. The employees apparently agreed that they were better off with some guaranteed benefits in hand now than with the chance of continuing in their current jobs, because they ratified the Union's agreement. The fact that the Respondent was able to continue operations after the unit was eliminated does not make the Union's judgment in agreeing to the loss of the unit any less valid. Moreover, both the Union and the unit employees knew of the Respondent's plans to create the new nonunit jobs and

[1] In its cross-exceptions, the Respondent contends that the complaint here should be dismissed because certain allegations are barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act and because the General Counsel should not be permitted to relitigate issues previously raised in a related 8(a)(5) charge that was dismissed on the merits. As we are dismissing the complaint in this case, we find it unnecessary to pass on these procedural issues.

to employ some former unit employees in these new nonunit jobs when they agreed to the elimination of the unit. In view of these unusual circumstances, we find that the Respondent's offer to hire some former unit employees into the newly created nonunit jobs does not establish that it was discriminating against employees because of their union membership or activity.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

Thomas O. McCarthy, Esq. and Alan I. Berger, Esq. (McMahon, Berger, Hanna, Linihan, Cody & McCarthy), of St. Louis, Missouri, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ELEANOR MACDONALD, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in New York, New York, on 5 and 6 March 1986. The complaint alleges that United Press International (Respondent), in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, has laid off its employees, hired employees in a newly created job classification, failed to apply the collective-bargaining agreement to the new employees, failed to offer United Telegraph Workers Division 47, AFL-CIO (the Union) an opportunity to negotiate, and has repudiated its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Respondent denies its actions were unlawful and asserts that it bargained with the Union and obtained the right to take the actions alleged in the complaint.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Union in May 1986, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation, provides news services to customers in the newspaper industry. The parties agree, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

It is undisputed that the Company and the Union, aware of the Company's longstanding and increasingly severe financial problems, entered into a collective-bargaining agreement that had the following "Preamble:"[1]

> As was fully discussed during contract negotiations for the 1984 Agreement, the Employer intends to initiate, facilitate, automate and conclude a reorganization of its communications operation, its maintenance and other work presently performed in the UTW unit. This reorganization may include, but not be limited to, the sale or other disposal of the communication system, subcontracting of bargaining unit work, automation, relocation of bargaining unit jobs to locations other than where presently located, or to employees other than UTW employees, elimination of certain jobs, and measures such as joint venture ownership of certain UPI presently owned assets.
> The parties agree, anything to the contrary in the Agreement, notwithstanding, that:
> 1. The Employer shall, at its sole discretion, be permitted to select what work shall be performed by bargaining unit personnel and what work shall be performed by a subcontractor or subcontractors, or by non-UPI personnel, or by UPI non-bargaining unit personnel.
>
> 2. The Employer shall, at its sole discretion, be permitted to relocate a job or jobs from one location to another location and/or to cease performing any job or job function, in whole or in part.
> 3. If the Employer sells or otherwise disposes of the work (through joint venture ownership or otherwise), subcontracts bargaining unit work: relocates a bargaining unit job, or discontinues the performance of a job, and said Employer action causes an employee to lose his/her job then UPI shall offer the dismissed employee one of the following options.

The options include certain provisions if the Company finds a job for the employee and other provisions for the payment of dismissal indemnity to those employees not placed by the Company.

Various Company witnesses testified, and the General Counsel's witnesses did not dispute the assertion, that during the negotiations the Company told the Union that the unit would cease to exist by 31 July 1985. The preamble provides that "staff reductions . . . shall be accomplished before July 31, 1985."

The instant controversy arises from the fact that the Company created a new position called technical support coordinator (TSC) with duties substantially similar to those performed by the technicians represented by the Union. By the time of the instant trial, eight TSC employees had been hired and three of these were former UTW unit members.[2] The General Counsel does not challenge the Company's right to discharge the unit members pursuant to the contract. The General Counsel asserts, however, that the contract and the Act do not permit the Company to discharge UTW-represented technicians and give their work to nonunion TSC employees. The General Counsel makes three arguments: The contract language does not permit the discharge of unit members and transfer of their work to TSC employees; the contract language is ambiguous and the bargaining history shows that the parties did not intend this result; in any case, the Act prohibits the action taken by the Company.

[1] The contract was negotiated from January to November 1984 and had a term from 1 February 1984 to 31 July 1985. The Union represents technicians and operators employed by the Company.

[2] The employment of TSC employees began 2 February 1985.

It seems to me that the contract language is clear and unmistakable and that it permits the result achieved. The plain language of the contract says that the Employer intends to reorganize the work performed by the UTW unit and that the "reorganization may include, but not be limited to, relocation of bargaining unit jobs to employees other than UTW employees . . . ." The language further specifies that the parties agree that the Company "shall, at its sole discretion, be permitted to select what work shall be performed by . . . UPI non-bargaining unit personnel." This clear and unqualified language permits the Company to give the technicians' work to anyone not in the UTW unit. There is no language preventing the Company from giving the work to former UTW unit members or to anyone else it may choose in its sole discretion. Based on this language, I find that the Union waived any objection to the Company's course of conduct and that there has been no refusal to bargain.

Moreover, the bargaining history supports the Company's position.[3] Negotiations between the Company and the Union began in early January 1984 for a contract due to expire on 31 January. Bobby Ray Miller, vice president for labor relations and editorial development, and Alan Berger, Esq., testified about the negotiations on behalf of the Company. Isaac Groner, Esq., general counsel of the UTW, and David Axelrod, a unit member, testified on behalf of the General Counsel.

On 4 and 5 April 1984, the Company proposed an 18-month contract retroactive to 1 February with a provision "to reduce the entire staff and have the Union give up its jurisdiction." UPI wanted to get out of the communications business and remain only in the news business. The Company was trying to sell its communications business; it expected all UTW unit members to go either to a new company or to a nonunion job at UPI or to a new joint venture. The Company wanted flexibility in the UTW unit so it could have flexibility to negotiate with other companies for disposition of its communications business. The Company showed the union language in its proposed preamble to the collective-bargaining agreement. The Company explained to the Union that the proposal meant the Company "could exercise its sole judgment in determining who would do the work that at that time was done by UTW people, and that we anticipated that every UTW person would lose his job by the end of that contract."

The financial difficulties of UPI were discussed and the fact that these difficulties adversely affected the Company's payments to the pension fund, reimbursement of travel expenses to employees, and employee insurance claims. The Union expressed a willingness to give up its jurisdiction if it could take care of its people. The parties discussed the possible effects on employees if a deal to sell the communications system was consummated, the possibility of unit work being given to the wire service bargaining unit, the fact that subcontracting would be increased, and the fact that there might be a small amount of work left similar to that done by unit members. In this last event, the Company said that these jobs would evolve from requiring employees to perform work similar to unit work into jobs that involved coordinating the work of subcontractors.

When the parties reconvened on 19 April, the Union agreed to the proposal. There was language in it covering employees who might be placed with a subcontractor or joint venture partner and employees who might be placed on permanent layoff and given dismissal indemnity. The Union asked for and received a salary increase over the 18 months of the contract. After 18 months, the unit would be eliminated, and the Company retained the right to select employees for layoff based on merit rather than in inverse order of seniority. The Union agreed that the dismissal indemnity could be paid over time and not in a lump sum. Dismissed employees would be provided with extended medical coverage. Finally, the Company agreed that the dismissal indemnity would be paid to unit members who quit when they found a new job, not merely to employees who were dismissed. In effect, UPI was paying an indemnity in exchange for an employee's resignation.

This agreement was still being drafted when, in July 1984, the Company encountered further financial difficulties and it negotiated concessions with its other union, the Wire Service Guild.

Further negotiations took place with the UTW in September 1984. The UTW agreed to some wage reductions and it agreed that 16 technicians were to be dismissed immediately. The agreement was incorporated into a memorandum of understanding dated 20 September 1984. The UTW submitted it for ratification and the Company sent layoff notices for 20 October. However, the September agreement was not ratified, and the layoff notices were rescinded. The Union told the Company informally that the failure of the membership to ratify was because the layoffs were not going to be based on seniority and the Company and the Union agreed to delay the layoffs until an agreement was ratified by the membership.

On 6 November 1984, the Company posted a number of new positions, designated TSC. The job description read > Understanding of FDM, TOM and communications networks, videos, printers, modems, etc. Ability to troubleshoot and repair above.

There is no dispute that this was substantially the work performed by the technicians represented by the Union.

The parties next met on 13 and 14 November.

According to Miller, on 13 November, the meeting began about 2 p.m. and the Union opened with a question from Local UTW Chairman Raleigh Brown about the TSC jobs posted a week or so earlier. Brown asked for a detailed job description. The Company responded that it was not prepared to discuss the subject, that "we had already reached an agreement in April about that" and then the Company representatives caucused. When they returned from the caucus, they told the Union "that we believed that under the agreement we had reached with them in April . . . and because these jobs would eventually become supervisory and managerial jobs, it would be improper to include them in the bargaining unit." The Union replied that the jobs should be in the unit and it requested a more detailed job description. The Company maintained that "the TSC jobs immediately would be virtually the identical jobs that UTW technicians were doing at that time, but that as (subcontractors such as) RCA took over more and more areas of the country . . . the TSC jobs would become supervisory and managerial." In response to the Union's question whether its members could apply for the TSC jobs, the Company told the Union how this could be done. According to Miller, on the morning of 14 November, the Union again asked to have jurisdiction over the TSC positions and the Company replied that the April agreement excluded those jobs from coverage. The Union also asked for further information to help its members decide whether to apply for the new jobs. Finally, after the parties had reached agreement to proceed with the layoffs by seniority by bureau instead of merit, Groner said that if the membership again rejected the contract, the Union might seek grievance arbitration over the question whether the TSC jobs would be in the unit.

[3] There is substantial agreement as to much of what was said during the negotiations for the contract. Wherever there is a disagreement, I will indicate this fact in the narrative.

Berger testified that on 13 November the parties met at 2 p.m. Groner said the membership had rejected the agreement. Raleigh Brown asked about the 20 TSC jobs posted by the Company. The Company's representatives then caucused and when they returned, they told the Union that the jobs would initially consist of troubleshooting, maintenance, and repair and that in a few months they would become supervisory or managerial. Beyond this, the Company said, it was not prepared to discuss the jobs. The Union said the jobs belonged in the bargaining unit and the Company said, "no they don't. There's not going to be a bargaining unit in 7 or 8 or 9 months, so why put them in now." On 14 November, the TSC jobs were discussed in the morning. A union representative stated that the TSC job description was similar to UTW unit work. UPI Vice President Bob Brown said, "We know that. We don't know to what extent these jobs are going to change and when, but . . . they're going to go from hands on over to an interface kind of job." The Union said it wanted the TSC jobs in the unit and the Company continued to maintain that the jobs would not be in the unit.

According to Berger, at the end of the meeting Groner said, "I just want to make sure that our position is perfectly clear. We have not waived our position with respect to your untimely opening of the contract, and . . . I hope you understand that if this contract is rejected again by our membership we may have to file a grievance and arbitrate the issue of whether those new jobs, the technical service coordinator jobs are properly in or out of the bargaining unit." Berger replied, "have at it."[4]

Groner testified that on the morning of 14 November before the start of the negotiations, the Company said "these jobs would be non-union because they would be supervisory or managerial." Groner then asked for additional information and job description. The Company responded that there was no additional information and no job description. Groner testified that he then told the Company

> That whether or not these jobs were bargaining unit . . . positions, was clearly a matter which would depend on the facts that the employer could not unilaterally designate what was supervisory or managerial . . . . That the union firmly opposed and denied any such right on the part of management and . . . the facts under Labor Board law would determine the appropriate placement of these positions.

According to Groner, the Company responded that it understood the Union's position and would provide additional information when it became available.

Groner said no agreement was reached about the TSC jobs at the negotiations. Groner testified that he told the Company the question whether a job was supervisory or managerial was a question of fact to be determined under Board law; there was insufficient information to determine the status of the TSC jobs, but he referred to Board law as the way of resolving the issue. He never said the Union would seek to arbitrate the placement of the new jobs.

Groner stated that the Company position was that when the TSC jobs were filled, they would not be inside the unit because they would be supervisory or managerial. Groner did not recall that the Company asserted any right "to make positions non-bargaining unit merely by proclaiming them non-bargaining unit."

Axelrod testified that immediately after introductions were made on 13 November, he asked "whether this list of jobs that they had posted on the Company bulletin board a few days previously . . . which . . . looked to be the same as the jobs currently being performed . . . were intended to be union or non-union jobs." The Company requested a caucus and when it returned to the table it said that all the new positions were intended to be nonbargaining unit positions. Local UTW Chairman Brown remarked that he could not understand how the Company could propose to lay off 16 technicians while at the same time post 15 to 20 jobs covering the same work. Then union officer Carriero or Johnson asked "what in the job descriptions made these jobs management or non-union, and what the pay rates would be." The Company responded that management would get back to the Union. The Union asked whether its members could bid on the new TSC jobs and it asked for a more complete job description. The Company said there was no job description yet and that UTW members were free to bid on those jobs. The subject of TSCs was never raised again by either side during the 2 days of negotiations. Axelrod summed up this exchange as follows:

[4] The issue of untimely reopening was discussed during the negotiations but is not relevant to the instant case.

> The end results of the discussion was a disagreement between the company's position and the union's position, which was to be then determined when more specifics about how this was to be implemented came out.
> In order to secure ratification of the agreement, the Company said it would agree that the layoffs would be accomplished according to seniority by bureau. The Union accepted this after a caucus and said "we had an agreement."

The contract was ultimately ratified in November 1984 by the membership and executed on 10 February 1985. Layoff notices were mailed to unit members beginning in November 1984.

This summary of the bargaining history makes it clear that the TSC positions were discussed by the parties during the negotiations for their contract. The Company disclosed that although the UTW technicians were to be phased out, the new TSC employees would be doing similar work when they were first hired. The Union took the position that the TSC positions should be in the unit but the Company refused to include them. Then, the Union agreed to the contract as proposed by the Company with full knowledge that the unit would cease to exist by the end of the contract term and that the Company would hire new TSC employees. Thus, the Union did not gain any concession from the Company on this point. Although the General Counsel's witness testified that the Union orally reserved its rights under "Labor Board Law," this does not affect the conclusions to be drawn from the bargaining history. The Union had knowledge of the Company's intentions but it nevertheless agreed to and executed the contract including language permitting the Company to take the actions it took with respect to the TSC employees. Thus, it agreed to the actions taken by the Company. Citizens National Bank of Willmar, 245 NLRB 389 (1979), enfd. 644 F.2d 39 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

Finally, the General Counsel urges that the language of the contract permits "the displacement of unit employees solely because of their status as union members" and by its terms violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3). It is well established that statutory rights may be waived by the clear and unmistakable language of a contract. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956); Columbus Electric Co., 270 NLRB 686 (1984). The General Counsel recognizes this rule but urges that the considerations expressed in Gale Products, 142 NLRB 1246 (1963), enf. denied 337 F.2d 390 (7th Cir. 1964), and NLRB v. Magnavox, 415 U.S. 322 (1974), supersede the Union's waiver. The General Counsel urges that the Union has attempted to waive the employees' rights to invoke the Board's processes. I cannot find any merit to the General Counsel's position. In Gale and Magnavox, the employees' rights which the union attempted to waive were such that they might be exercised contrary to the union's position and interests. In the instant case there is no such actual or foreseeable divergence between the union's and the employees' rights and positions.

Because I have found no merit to the complaint, I need not deal with Respondent's assertion that portions of the complaint are barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The General Counsel has failed to prove that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

Upon charges filed separately by Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price on December 9, 1986, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing against Gold Star Mining Corporation, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charges and consolidated complaint, the Respondent has failed to file an answer.

On December 30, 1987, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On January 5, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. On January 19, 1988, the Respondent replied by letter to the Notice to Show Cause. The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board."

According to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, the order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing was served on the Respondent, by certified United States mail, return receipt requested, at its Woodville, West Virginia minesite and its corporate offices in Beverly Hills, California, where the Respondent had previously received and acknowledged correspondence with respect to the instant cases.[1] The documents mailed to both addresses were returned to the Board's Regional Office marked "unclaimed." Notations on the returned receipt indicate that the Respondent was given notice on August 4 and again on August 12, 1987, of such certified mail addressed to it. On October 5, 1987, pursuant to West Virginia Code, Chapter 31, Article I, Section 15, the Secretary of State for the State of West Virginia (Secretary of State) accepted service of the order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing as well as the order withdrawing approval of settlement, and forwarded them to the Respondent at the address used by the Board by certified mail, with a return receipt requested. The documents were returned to the Secretary of State marked "unclaimed." Thereafter, the General Counsel caused a visit by Board personnel to be made to the most recent offices of the Respondent in Beverly Hills, California, and made telephonic inquiries to ascertain the whereabouts of the Respondent and/or its officers and representatives. These efforts were unsuccessful.

In response to the Notice to Show Cause, the Respondent, under its Beverly Hills, California address, states that it has not been in receipt of any correspondence from the Board since May 1987. It encloses signed copies of a settlement agreement and notice to employees concerning the instant cases that, it asserts, were returned as requested to the Board and all parties to the proceeding the week of May 4, 1987.[2] The Respondent alleges it has not yet been informed of the acceptance or nonacceptance of the settlement agreement by the complainants. The Respondent further asserts that due to the precarious financial condition of the Company and a long delay in the funding of a loan commitment to the Company, the Respondent was not able to finalize the payment of $5400 as prescribed in the settlement agreement. The Respondent states that it intends to make payment as soon as a financial restructuring can be effected. Finally, the Respondent states that as soon as it can pay the money, it will do so, but summary judgments of this type would make it far more difficult to raise money or start up again.

In deciding this matter we note that in its response, the Respondent does not address the issue of its failure to file an answer to the consolidated complaint, even though the Notice to Show Cause sets forth the General Counsel's assertion that the Respondent failed to file an answer to the consolidated complaint as required by Sections 102.20 and 102.21 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, and that therefore all allegations of the consolidated complaint should be deemed to be admitted as true and summary judgment be granted on the pleadings. Thus, even assuming the Respondent had previously been unaware of the issuance of the consolidated complaint, it now acknowledges awareness but does not file an answer, seek an extension of time to file an answer, or in any manner address the allegations of the complaint. Similarly, with regard to the settlement agreement, even assuming the Respondent received no further communication from the Board after returning its signed copies of the agreement, the Respondent does not allege that it complied with the agreement or is presently prepared to comply with it. Instead, the Respondent concedes that it was not able to comply with the agreement in May 1987, that it cannot comply at the present time, and that it will comply only at some indefinite future time when it can afford to make the required payments.

[1] The Regional Director's order withdrawing approval of settlement agreement which issued on July 31, 1987, was also served in the same manner to the same addresses.

[2] The agreement provides, inter alia, for a total of $5400 in backpay.

Assuming the truth of all the Respondent's assertions, they do not show good cause for the Respondent's failure to file a timely answer to the complaint.[3] In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[4]

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a West Virginia corporation, has been engaged in the mining and sale of coal at its facility in Julian, West Virginia, where it annually sold coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to Hatfield Terminals, Inc. and Hatfield Dock and Transfer Co. Hatfield Terminals, a Delaware corporation, with an office and place of business in Cincinnati, Ohio, has been engaged in buying and selling coal, and has annually shipped and sold, from its West Virginia facilities, coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of West Virginia. Hatfield Dock and Transfer Co., a Florida corporation, with an office and place of business in Marmet, West Virginia, has been engaged in buying and selling coal and has annually sold and shipped, from its West Virginia facilities, coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of West Virginia. Accordingly, we find that the Hatfield Terminals, Inc. and Hatfield Dock and Transfer Co. are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, that the Respondent, through its business operations with Hatfield Terminals, Inc. and Hatfield Dock and Transfer Co., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In late November or early December 1986,[5] Secretary-Treasurer Hugh Elder[6] informed an employee that he was being discharged for engaging in union activities.

In August 1986, the Respondent, acting through Mine Manager Carl Bragg,[7] threatened employees with the shutdown of the Respondent's mine if the Union was successful in its efforts to represent the Respondent's employees.

In September Bragg threatened to discharge employees who engaged in union activities.

About October 23, Bragg, at a location approximately one-quarter mile from the Respondent's minesite, informed employees that if they did not cross a picket line and return to work, they would be discharged. About November 6, Bragg threatened employees with unspecified reprisals if they did not cease their support for, and activities on behalf of, the Union.

From mid-October through mid-November, the Respondent's employees, including Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price, concertedly complained to the Respondent regarding the late payment and nonpayment of wages. From about October 14 to about October 22 and again from about November 11 through about November 13, employees Bragg, Hawkins, Lovejoy, Price, and other employees of the Respondent ceased work concertedly and engaged in a strike.

[3] Member Cracraft does not assume the truth of the Respondent's assertions or rely on the reasoning of the preceding paragraph. In her view, the General Counsel's submission establishes that the Motion for Summary Judgment should be granted based on the Respondent's failure to file an answer to the July 31, 1987 consolidated complaint. As the General Counsel points out, it is well established that a respondent's failure or refusal to claim certified mail will not serve to defeat the purpose of the Act. Michigan Expediting Service, 282 NLRB 210 (1986). In these circumstances, the Respondent's unsworn assertion that it has not received any correspondence from the National Labor Relations Board since May 1987 other than the Notice to Show Cause does not warrant denial of the General Counsel's motion. See Rule 56(e) of the Federal Rules of civil Procedure. Thus, in Member Cracraft's opinion, the Respondent's failure to attach a supporting affidavit to its response precludes finding a genuine issue as to any material fact.

[4] The General Counsel requests that the Order include a provision for a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States courts of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[5] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[6] Elder is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and an agent of the Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

[7] Bragg is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and an agent of the Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

About November 14, the Respondent discharged the four above-named employees because they concertedly complained about the late payment and nonpayment of wages, because they engaged in a strike, and because they joined, supported, or assisted the Union, and engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. The Respondent otherwise endeavored to discourage these and its other employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By informing an employee that he had been discharged for engaging in union activities; threatening employees with the shutdown of the mine if the Union is successful in its efforts to represent the employees; threatening to discharge employees who engaged in union activities; threatening employees with discharge if they did not cross a picket line and return to work; threatening employees with unspecified reprisals if they did not cease their support for, and activities on behalf of, the Union; and discharging employees Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price for concertedly complaining about the late payment and nonpayment of wages, engaging in a strike, and joining, supporting, or assisting the Union and engaging in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging employees Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price because they joined, supported, or assisted the Union, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has unlawfully discharged employees Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price, we shall order it to offer these employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and to make these employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unlawful discharges. Backpay and interest shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[8]

We shall also order the Respondent to remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that it will not use the discharges against them in any way.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Gold Star Mining Corporation, Julian, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Informing employees that they have been discharged for engaging in union activities.

(b) Threatening employees with the shutdown of the mine if the Union is successful in its efforts to represent the employees.

(c) Threatening employees with discharge if they do not cross the picket line.

(d) Threatening employees with reprisals if they do not cease their support for, and activities on behalf of, the Union.

(e) Discharging employees for joining, supporting, or assisting the Union, concertedly complaining about the late payment and nonpayment of wages, engaging in a strike, and otherwise engaging in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

[8] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Julian, West Virginia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT inform our employees that they have been discharged for engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with the shutdown of our mine if the Union or any other labor organization is successful in its efforts to represent our employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge if they do not cross the picket line.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with unspecified reprisals if they do not cease their support for, and activities on behalf of, the Union or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees for joining, supporting, or assisting the Union, concertedly complaining about the late payment and nonpayment of wages, engaging in a strike, or otherwise engaging in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Teddy Bragg, Sam Hawkins, Walter Lovejoy, and Hassel Price immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 23, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified, but not to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

1. This case involves numerous allegations that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to provide the Union with information necessary for, and relevant to, the Union's performance of its function as collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the involved units. The Respondent claims that its refusals were justified by its 1980-instituted Employee Privacy Protection Plan, which states that the Respondent will not release personal information regarding employees to outsiders without employee authorization. The plan specifically provides:

> If you are a union-represented employee, personal information about you will not generally be available to a collective bargaining representative without your written permission. However, it may occasionally be necessary to disclose certain relevant information, when such information is requested by the bargaining representative and, in the opinion of the Company's Legal Department, is relevant to a matter in collective bargaining. In such instances, notification of the disclosure to the bargaining representative will be given to you.

In arguing that the information sought need not be released to the Union absent employee authorization, the Respondent relies on New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 720 F.2d 789 (3d Cir. 1983), which involved the Respondent, one of the Charging Parties, and records of the same general nature as in this matter. The court reversed the Board and found that the privacy plan was not instituted to frustrate the Union in its role as employee representative. The court also found that the employee absence records contained highly personal information. The court concluded that the Union must obtain employee consent for the release of the records; and that the Company's refusal to provide the information absent consent did not violate the Act. The judge in the instant case distinguished New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB. We agree that the cases are distinguishable.

In New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, supra, the Union directed the employees not to sign the release forms, that the Respondent required. The court quoted with approval the following finding from the underlying judge's decision:

> [By directing the involved employees not to sign releases, the Union] intentionally placed itself in the way of attaining its own legitimate objective for there is no evidence in the record that the employees had any real objections to

[1] The Respondent filed a motion to receive into evidence a letter from counsel for the Charging Party to the judge. The motion is denied. Its purpose was to support the Respondent's contention that the judge erred in considering arguments contained in certain articles published in medical journals. Although the judge did not err in considering the articles sent to him by the Charging Party's counsel, we find it unnecessary to rely on those articles in reaching our decision.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent also argues that the charges in this proceeding are barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act because the Respondent's employee privacy plan was published more than 6 months prior to the filing of a charge. The plan specifically states, however, that information may be disclosed to the bargaining representative when it is relevant to collective-bargaining matters. The plan itself did not put the Union on notice that the Respondent intended to withhold relevant and necessary information. Accordingly, Sec. 10(b) did not begin to run until the Respondent refused to provide the information, and the charges in this proceeding are timely.

[3] For reasons discussed in the text, employee records need not be furnished with employee identification where (1) the Union has agreed already to receive such records without employee identification, or (2) the Respondent proves (i) that an employee's medical records contain highly intimate medical information, e.g., a mental disorder, a miscarriage, or infection with a venereal disease, (ii) and that the Union does not need the employee identity information to perform its representation functions. For the reason set forth in fn. 5, infra, Member Cracraft does not agree with the second qualification.

In the judge's remedy section, par. 7, L. 4, we correct an inadvertent error by substituting "Mosco" for "McAllister." We also note that the judge inadvertently omitted mention of employee Dobish in the remedy, recommended Order, and notice, despite his finding that the Respondent's failure to provide information pertaining to the Dobish grievance violated the Act. To remedy this violation the Respondent shall be ordered to turn over the requested documents concerning Dobish's grievance.

> the Union representative gaining access to the material in question and it would have been a simple matter for the Union to obtain releases, to gain access to the materials it needed and to pursue the grievance procedure to a proper conclusion. Instead, it preferred to play games, to challenge the employer's Employee Privacy Protection Plan, a policy which, on its face, appears to be legitimately concerned with employees' right to privacy and not in any way discriminatorily motivated. (Emphasis added.)

Id. at 792, quoting New Jersey Bell Telephone Co., 265 NLRB 1382, 1387 (1982).

In this case the Union did not direct employees to refuse to sign the release forms. In fact, several grievants signed release forms when requested to do so by the Respondent. Contrary to the assumptions of the administrative law judge and the court in the prior case (which, of course, were not tested there), it was not a simple matter for the Union to obtain the information it needed, at least with respect to those employees whose records were needed for comparison with those of the grievants.

Furthermore, unlike the proof offered in the prior New Jersey Bell case, there was no showing here that absentee records contained information of an "intimate and highly personal nature." Rather, the judge found here that the absentee records proffered for his inspection contained merely information concerning a "garden variety of common ailments."

Most significantly, however, in the present case the Respondent actually obtained employee releases in some instances, and in others the Union offered to accommodate privacy interests by agreeing to accept records with employee identifications omitted. Yet the Respondent still either refused to provide any of the requested information or provided records that omitted information needed by the Union for the performance of its representational duties. Thus, in the case of the Mosco grievance, even after Mosco signed a release, the Respondent refused to allow the Union to make copies of any records and did not even allow the Union to inspect certain portions of the records that were relevant to the grievance. In three instances, offers by union representatives to accept records with employee identifications omitted were met with footdragging and continuing refusals to provide all the requested relevant information. Thus, in the case of information requested for the Mananian and Marotta grievances, the Respondent produced only its own summaries of its records, omitting some of the relevant information requested by the Union; in the case of the request related to the Dobish grievance, the Respondent shifted to the excuse that the parent International had not yet appealed the pending grievance; and in the case of the request related to the Tiernan grievance, the Respondent simply relied on the lack of employee consent.[4]

In short, the record in this case reveals that the Respondent was using its privacy plan as a pretext for denying the Union information to which it was clearly entitled and shifting to other grounds when the privacy claim was stripped of even colorable validity. For these reasons, among others, we do not regard the decision in New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, supra, as controlling.

Regarding to the Respondent's position generally that it should be entitled to deny requests for relevant information from personnel records simply because its privacy plan requires an employee consent, we find no support in Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979), on which the Respondent also relies, for any such blanket claim of confidentiality. See Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916, 919 (1984), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 309, 763 F.2d 887 (7th Cir. 1985); Oil Workers Local 6-418 v. NLRB, 711 F.2d 348, 362 and fn. 36 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Certainly an employer should not be able to "bootstrap" a confidentiality claim as a barrier to disclosure of information to the bargaining representative simply by relying on a plan through which employees, including bargaining unit employees, are promised that a broad range of personal information will remain confidential. Moreover, the mere fact that an employee does not give formal consent—or might even object—to the disclosure of information does not in itself constitute grounds for refusing to provide such information when it is relevant to the bargaining representative's performance of its representational duties. As the Eighth Circuit, in WCCO Radio, Inc. v. NLRB, 844 F.2d 511 (1988), recently observed with respect to information concerning the terms of certain unit employees' personal contracts with the employer (844 F.2d at 515; citations omitted):

> One of the consequences of collective bargaining is that it subordinates the particular interests of individual employees to the collective interest of the unit. Hence, a preference for confidentiality on the part of some WCCO em> ployees does not nullify [the Union's] right to the information.

---

[4] In addition, on one occasion the Respondent advised the Union that no records would be released until a grievance actually was filed. Moreover, the Respondent consistently refused, citing the cost factor, to allow union representatives to photocopy voluminous records that need examination. Yet in one instance in which the Union responded by requesting a cost estimate, the Respondent then offered a different reason for refusing access to the information and provided no cost estimate.

We do, however, make one minor modification to the judge's order with respect to information for which the Respondent makes a particularized showing that the specific records requested contain highly intimate information, medical or otherwise. We note that the Union has indicated in several instances, through its offer to accept records with employee identifications deleted, that the Union can sometimes accomplish its representational task without knowing the identities of employees for whom requested records are furnished for purposes of showing, for example, the pattern of discipline for particular kinds of conduct. Thus, with respect to records for which the Union has already agreed to such conditions, our Order will not require that the records be furnished with employee names included. Furthermore, as to any other records at issue in the compliance stage, similar conditions may be imposed if it is shown (1) that personal privacy interests would be invaded by disclosure and (2) that the Union could carry out its representational functions without knowledge of the identities of the employees to whom the information pertains. This is in keeping with the accommodative approach that properly governs such requests. WCCO Radio, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 844 F.2d at 515. See generally Oil Workers Local 6-114 v. NLRB, supra, 711 F.2d at 363.[5] As our discussion above reveals, however, the Respondent thus far has, by either refusing requests entirely or by refusing to accept reasonable offers of accommodation by the Union, failed to satisfy its basic obligation under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

2. The judge concluded that the Respondent's failure to disclose the requested information pertaining to employee Therese Brill's grievance violated the Act. The judge based this conclusion on his finding that the Respondent's policy of not releasing medical records directly to an employee regardless of the employee's medical condition was paternalistic. The Respondent has excepted to the judge's finding that its policy is violative, and the General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to find further that the Respondent violated the Act by not abiding by its existing policy in a timely manner. We find the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act regarding the Brill grievance for the reasons that follow.

Before taking medical leave beginning in December 1981, Brill was referred by the Respondent to a pyschiatric consultant, Dr. Schwed, who diagnosed depression. Brill consulted her own psychologist while on leave. When Brill decided to return to work, the Respondent sent her to Dr. Schwed, who in June 1982 recommended part-time work. After 1 month of part-time employment, the Respondent informed Brill that she must work full time and that her disability pay was being discontinued retroactive to her part-time return.

Brill filed a grievance, which was denied at step 1 of the grievance procedure. The Union requested the Company's medical records on Brill, particularly Dr. Schwed's reports, at the step 2 meeting. The Respondent advised the Union that Brill must sign a release; the Union agreed to obtain one. On November 8, 1982, Brill wrote a letter requesting her medical records including the Schwed reports, and on November 10, 1982, she signed the Respondent's form to examine her personnel records. At the step 3 meeting[6] on December 1, 1982, the Union asked why Brill had not received her records. The Respondent advised the Union that a meeting would be arranged at its medical department. Brill arrived at the subsequently arranged meeting on December 6, 1982, with a union representative. The company doctor with whom Brill met refused to allow the union agent to accompany Brill to the meeting in the doctor's office and refused to show Brill copies of Dr. Schwed's reports. The Respondent advised Brill that she could get the reports only by authorizing the transmittal of the reports to her own doctor. Brill agreed and signed the form. On January 6, 1983, a copy of Dr. Schwed's June 1982 report was sent to Brill's own doctor. Brill's doctor gave her the report, and she gave it to the Union.

The Respondent knew that both the Union and Brill were seeking her medical records in connection with a pending grievance. Despite this fact and the Respondent's own policy of promptly releasing validly requested information, the Respondent took no action in the first 3 weeks following Brill's initial authorization, forcing Brill and the Union to face the step 3 meeting without the necessary documents. Almost 2 months elapsed from Brill's first request until some of the records finally were released to her doctor. Given the Respondent's policy of prompt release, its knowledge of the reason for Brill's and the Union's requests, and its delay in transmitting even part of the records, we find the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[7]

[5] Where, as here, the Board has found the Respondent was using the privacy claim as a pretext for denying the Union information to which it was entitled, Member Cracraft finds it inappropriate to allow the Respondent to make further privacy claims in the compliance stage of this proceeding.

[6] Under the parties' contract this particular grievance could not be taken past stage 3.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, New Jersey Bell Telephone Co., Newark, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Locals 1022, 1023, and 1024 of the Communications Workers of America by refusing to furnish to the Union information and records relevant to the processing of grievances or the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request forthwith furnish to the Union copies of Laura McAllister's absentee records including an unexpurgated copy of her G-661 record.

(b) On request forthwith furnish to the Union copies of Patricia Zipf's absentee records.

(c) On request forthwith furnish to Therese Brill's doctor copies of her medical records to the extent it has not already done so.

(d) On request forthwith furnish to the Union copies of the cumulative sales records of the employees in the Respondent's Pascack Valley office.[8]

(e) On request forthwith furnish to the Union copies of the job performance records of employees in Helen Dobish's office.[9]

(f) On request forthwith furnish to the Union copies of Hartent Dunston's absentee and job performance records.

(g) In circumstances where the Union requests photocopies of records relevant to the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement or to process grievances, the Respondent and the Union shall negotiate as to the circumstances in which the Union should bear the costs of photocopying and the costs thereof.

(h) Post at its New Jersey facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(i) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Locals 1022, 1023, and 1024 of the Communication Workers of America by refusing to furnish to the Union information and records relevant to the processing of grievances or the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to the Union copies of Laura McAllister's absentee records, including an unexpurgated copy of her G-661 record.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to the Union copies of Patricia Zipf's absentee records.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to Therese Brill's doctor copies of her medical records to the extent we have not already done so.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to the Union copies of the cumulative sales records of the employees in our Pascack Valley office.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to the Union copies of the job performance records of employees in Helen Dobish's office.

---

[7] In finding the Respondent violated the Act for failing to comply with its own policy, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether the Respondent's medical record release policy itself violates the Act. Thus, we are not prepared to say that prompt release of the records through the employee's physician would have left the Respondent in default of its bargaining obligation. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's discussion of patient rights; and we modify the remedy, and substitute a new Order and notice to eliminate any requirement that the Respondent change its policy on medical records.

[8] See fn. 3, supra.

[9] Ibid.

[10] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL, on request, furnish to the Union copies of Hartent Dunston's absentee and job performance records.

WE WILL, on request, make photocopies of relevant information and records requested by the Union for use in administering the collective-bargaining agreement. In this respect, we will negotiate with the Union as to the circumstances in which the Union should bear the costs of such photocopying and the costs thereof.

NEW JERSEY BELL TELEPHONE CO.

Hope Singer, Esq., for the General Counsel.
James F. Brady, Esq., for the Respondent.
Amy Gladstein, Esq. (Gladstein, Reif & Meginniss), of Brooklyn, New York, for Locals 1022 and 1024, Communication Workers of America.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard by me in Newark, New Jersey, on July 7, 8, 18, and 19 and August 5, 1983. The charge in Case 22-CA-12078 was filed by Local 1022 on December 10, 1982. The charges in Cases 22-CA-12316 and 22-CA-12450 were filed by Local 1024 respectively on March 31 and May 5, 1983. The charges in Cases 22-CA-12362 and 22-CA-12439 were filed by Local 1023, respectively, on April 19 and May 19, 1983. Thereafter, on June 20, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 22 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a consolidated complaint. In substance, the complaint alleged that Respondent on various occasions failed and refused to furnish to the local unions certain records and information that they had requested in connection with the processing of contractual grievances.

Based on the entire record in this proceeding, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and on consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The parties agree, and I find, that the Company is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. There is also no dispute, and I conclude, that the Charging Parties are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

A. The Prior Case

On December 16, 1982, the Board issued a decision involving New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. and Local 1023, 265 NLRB 1382 In that case, three employees who had been marked tardy filed a grievance with their local union, which then requested to see the employees' absence and tardiness records. The Employer, relying on its "Employee Privacy Protection Plan" (described below), refused the Union's request, unless the three grievants authorized their release. The Union instructed the employees not to authorize release of the records believing that it had an absolute right to this information without being required to obtain employee consent. The Board, in disagreement with the administrative law judge, held that the records involved were not confidential in nature as they merely reflected the reasons the grievants themselves had given to the Company at the time of their absences and therefore did not constitute medical records. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals, 720 F.2d 789 (3d Cir. 1983), disagreed with the Board because in its view the records did contain highly personal and sensitive information regarding the employees' health. It therefore concluded that the information sought was confidential in nature and that it was the Union's instructions to its members to not authorize release, which prevented the Union from obtaining the data.

B. The Collective-Bargaining Relationship

For many years the Company has recognized and bargained with the Communication Workers of America (CWA). The collective-bargaining agreements have been between the Respondent and the CWA, and the most recent agreement prior to the hearing ran from August 10, 1980, to August 6, 1983. The CWA in turn, is comprised of a number of constituent local unions. The agreement covers the nonsupervisory employees of the Company's commercial and marketing departments in which the employees are members of five different local unions. The local unions involved in this case (Locals 1022, 1023, and 1024) represent specific segments of the overall bargaining unit and it is clear from the record that by custom and practice they have been delegated the responsibility of administering the collective-bargaining agreement at the local level at the first two steps of the contractual grievance machinery.[1] Thereafter, representatives of the CWA are responsible for handling grievances at the third step and at arbitration. Although the labor agreement is between the Company and the CWA, it is apparent that local union representatives, through their presidents or agents, execute the agreement on behalf of the CWA. (See p. 24 of the contract.)

In light of the above, I reject as without merit Respondent's assertion that the local unions involved were not the majority representatives of their respective constituencies and that they did not have the authority to request the information sought. It has been shown that insofar as grievance handling under the contract, the Company and the CWA have historically recognized and acceded to the function of the local unions in carrying out the administration of the contract at the local level through the first two steps of the grievance procedure. Therefore, it seems to me that the parties to the contract (the Company and the CWA) have agreed, at least implicitly, that it is to be the local unions that carry out this important function where, in all probability, the vast majority of grievances are disposed of. In this respect, it seems obvious that over a substantial period of time and by virtue of custom and practice, the Company has recognized and acceded to the delegation of authority by the CWA to its local unions, of the function of processing grievances at the first steps of the grievance procedure.

[1] The grievance procedure is set forth at art. 12 of the collective-bargaining agreement. It provides for a step 4 procedure, the last step being arbitration. The record shows that after a grievance is processed through the first two steps, it is only then that a representative of the CWA will ordinarily become involved at the third step.

C. The Company's Employee Privacy Protection Plan

It appears that in 1980, the Company instituted its Employee Privacy Protection Plan, which provides that the Company will not release certain personal information regarding its employees to noncompany people without employee authorization.[2] It also appears that this plan was not instituted as a result of any negotiations with the Union and therefore was not implemented as a consequence of any agreement with the Union. Although the plan is designed to preclude disclosure of certain information concerning employees, without their consent, it is noted that the plan also states:

> If you are a union-represented employee, personal information about you will not generally be available to a collective bargaining representative without your written permission. However, it may occasionally be necessary to disclose certain relevant information, when such information is requested by the bargaining representative and, in the opinion of the Company's Legal Department, is relevant to a matter in collective bargaining. In such instances, notification of the disclosure to the bargaining representative will be given to you.

1. The Laura McAllister grievance

Laura McAllister, a member of Local 1024, is a service representative employed at the Company's Harmon Cove office. Initially, in January 1982 she was discharged because of excessive tardiness, but was reinstated in March 1982 as a result of the settlement of a grievance processed by Local 1024. As part of the settlement, she was placed on final warning.[3]

On March 1, 1983, McAllister received a letter in lieu of suspension based on her absenteeism since her reinstatement. She then contacted her shop steward, Tom O'Rorden, who filed a grievance on her behalf. During the first-step meeting, O'Rorden asked for McAllister's absence records and the Company's representative, Mark Drew, stated that they would only be released if McAllister gave her consent. O'Rorden responded by stating, in effect, that under the National Labor Relations Act the Union was entitled to the information without the employee's consent. (Indeed, as the employee filed the grievance, it could be argued that she gave her implied consent to the release of her own records.) At the same time, O'Rorden handed over a letter from Local 1024's president, dated March 24, which read

> In our capacity as Collective Bargaining Agents for the members of CWA Local 1024, we are requesting, on behalf of Laura McAllister, that the Company provide records which are relevant and material to the representation of Miss McAllister.
> Specifically, we are requesting the absence record G-520 and associated C 4014, for Miss McAllister, and any other documentation relevant to her history of absence, to date. In your refusal to provide this information to Tom O'Riordan, Union Steward, you sited [sic] the Company's Privacy Protection Plan. I would like to point out that there is a provision in the Plan regarding information relevant and material to the Union's performance of its Collective Bargaining and Grievance Handling functions.

In response, Drew, by letter dated March 22 stated:

> It is our understanding that the Employee Privacy Protection Plan still governs the release of Employee Records and we are so guided by this plan.

In connection with the information request, the union witnesses testified that they believed that in assessing absences, the supervisors are given certain discretion in excusing absences and therefore not counting them for disciplinary purposes. They also testified that they asked for the specific forms listed (forms G-520 and C-4014) because to their knowledge these were the forms used by the Company.

On March 29, Respondent's representative, Regina Von Aln, tendered to the Union a handwritten list, which set forht the dates, reasons, and number of days that McAllister had been absent after her reinstatement in March 1982. This list did not, however, set forth the various "discussions" that McAllister had with her supervisor. These "discussions" are generally set forth by the supervisor on a separate form (G-661) and in addition to recording his or her conversation with the employee, also sets forth the supervisor's evaluation of the employee's excuses for being absent. The record of discussions are referred to in the form C-4014 and are sometimes physically attached to that form.

A second-step meeting was held on April 12. At this time Union Agent Massa indicated that the Union wanted to look at the official records on which the tendered summary was based. Von Ahn refused, citing the Employee Privacy Protection Plan.

On April 22, the Union wrote to Sabo, the Company's director of labor relations, as follows:

> Regarding our grievance on behalf of Laura McAllister, Service Representative in the Harmon Cove AIC, we have requested information that is

[2] There are, however, a number of exceptions. For example, certain information will be divulged for law enforcement purposes or in connection with "any proceeding or action affecting the Company's interest including its defense to any employment related matter."

[3] Respondent has a system of progressive discipline for absenteeism and lateness. The steps include (1) a "welcome back" by the employee's supervisor; (2) a notification to improve; (3) a notification that good attendance is a condition of continued employment; (4) a notification that the employee's job is in jeopardy; (5) the issuance of a warning in lieu of suspension; (6) dismissal. The warning in lieu of suspension has the same weight as a suspension and is, in effect, a step short of discharge.

> relevant and material to the representation of Miss McAllister. This request was presented to Mr. Mark Drew, manager of the Harmon Cove AIC.
> Specifically we asked for copies of the G520 and C4014 from Miss McAllister's personal file. These records were denied to us by Mr. Drew.
> We appealed our grievance to second level in order to state our request to Miss Regina Von Ahn, District Manager of the Harmon Cove AIC. At this level we were provided with a hand written list of dates and reasons for absence, not the records requested.
>
> In accordance with our duty to represent, we have appealed this grievance to third level in order to protect the time limits specified in the Contract. However, we are unable to present a proper grievance without the information we have repeatedly requested.
> By denying the Union copies of Miss McAllister's G520 and C4014, the Company has not allowed the Union the opportunity to determine whether or not the Company acted properly in giving Miss McAllister a letter equivalent to a three day suspension. The Union cannot perform its duty as collective bargaining agent without the material requested.

In response to the Union's letter of April 22, Respondent's representative, William Wilson, called Union Agent Dellavia and asked if the Union would agree to having McAllister give her consent before releasing the information. Dellavia said that she did not agree and argued in effect that employee consent was not a proper condition for releasing these types of records. (Dellavia reiterated her position in this regard by letter dated May 4, 1983.) There is no evidence, however, to suggest that the Union either directed or requested McAllister to refuse to give her consent to the release of the documents.

On May 10, Drew asked McAllister if she would agree to the release of her records to the Union and she said she would have to ask her shop steward. As a consequence of this conversation, Respondent apparently construed McAllister's failure to object as a consent, and it thereupon released some, but not all of McAllister's absentee records to the Union. Thus, on May 18 the Respondent tendered to the Union copies of McAllister's records designated by forms G-520 and C-4014.[4] Also tendered was an expurgated copy of form G-661, which contained the record of discussions by her supervisor. What in fact was deleted from the form G-661 were several of the discussions concerning McAllister's absences.

Respondent asserts that it had no duty to furnish the form G-661 because the Union did not specifically request it. However, it appears that the Union's agents were not aware that such a form designation existed (also unknown to some of Respondent's managers), and in any event, the record shows that this form was incorporated, as a matter of practice, with the form C-4014. Clearly, as the Union expressed the desire to review all documents relevant to McAllister's absence record (by letter dated March 24) the Respondent was on sufficient notice to furnish not only forms G-520 and C-4014, but also the form G-661. It also is evident that by heavily editing the form G-661, Respondent did not furnish the information requested. Indeed, it is my opinion that given the nature of the grievance, the form G-661, in its entirety, would have been the record most relevant to her grievance. That is, it is only by viewing this particular form that the Union would have been able to determine if some or all of McAllister's absences had been excused by her supervisor.

2. The grievance of Therese Brill

Therese Brill is a longstanding employee who works in Respondent's Asbury Park office. In December 1981 she went on a medical leave of absence. Before leaving, she was examined by Dr. Margaret Fitzpatrick who is employed in Respondent's medical department. She also was referred to an outside psychiatric consultant, Dr. Schwed (now deceased) who diagnosed her condition as a form of depression. (This diagnosis is contained in a report to the Company dated December 29, 1981.) While on medical leave, Brill was seen by her own private psychologist, a Dr. Hanson.

In the spring of 1982 Brill expressed to Dr. Fitzpatrick a desire to return to work on a part-time basis. In order to determine if she was fit to return, Brill was again referred to Dr. Schwed. By report dated June 10, 1982, Dr. Schwed informed the Company that Brill's condition had abated and he recommended that she go back to work on a part-time basis. Accordingly, on June 23, Brill returned to work and informed her supervisor, Cooper, that she wanted to work 2 to 3 days a week.

After working for about a month on a part-time schedule, Brill was told on July 15 that she was to return to work on a full-time basis. She also was notified that her disability payments had been terminated retroactive to the time she returned to work. Thereafter, Brill filed a grievance relating to the termination of her disability pay.

In relation to the grievance, it is noted that the Company has a plan for providing disability pay for employees who cannot work for medical reasons.[5] Although parties agree that disputes involving eligibility to receive disability pay are not arbitrable under the collective-bargaining agreement, they do agree that such disputes are subject to the grievance procedure, short of arbitration. In essence, Brill's grievance rested on the contention that, notwithstanding her return to work on June 23, she still was eligible for disability pay for those days that she did not work.

[4] The G-520 form is a calendar on which latenesses and absences are recorded. The C-4014 form lists the dates, lengths, and reasons for an employee's absences. It also shows if any disciplinary action was taken and what, if any, discussions were held between the supervisor and the employee regarding a particular incident. As noted above, the supervisors may make extended notes of their discussions, including an evaluation of an employee's excuse on form G-661 or on any other piece of paper and these notes are, in effect, incorporated by reference into the form G-4014.

[5] Respondent maintains a benefit committee that decides whether a particular employee is eligible for disability pay. The physicians of the medical department make recommendations to the benefit committee in borderline cases.

On September 3, Respondent denied Brill's grievance and it was appealed by the Union to the second step. On November 4, 1982, a second-step meeting was held and the credible evidence shows that Union Representative Lynn Buckley asked Respondent to produce Brill's medical records, particularly Dr. Schwed's reports. Company Representative Moulineaux responded that these records were confidential and could only be released if Brill signed a release. Buckley then turned to Union Agent Huber and asked him to have Brill sign a release. As a result, Brill was asked by Huber to make a written request for her records from the medical department. On November 9, Brill wrote to Dr. Bisgeir, the head of the medical department, as follows:

> Kindly send me copies of all the medical reports pertaining to my recent illness including the report of the consulting psychologist, Dr. Schwed.
> I would appreciate you doing this as expeditiously as possible.

Also on November 10, Brill executed a company form, at Respondent's request, entitled, "Request to Examine Personnel Records."

On December 1, a third-step meeting was held in which Pat Niven, a CWA District staff representative, asked why Brill's medical records had not been forthcoming. Moulineaux and Company Representative Wilson responded that it was company policy to set up a meeting at the medical department (located in Newark) where the employee could review her records. Subsequently, Brill was informed that a meeting had been set up for her for December 6. On that date, Brill, accompanied by Union Representative Huber, visited the Newark office where Brill spoke to Dr. Fitzpatrick, who at that point, was aware that Brill had filed a grievance. Brill credibly testified that she asked if she and Huber could obtain her medical records and that Dr. Fitzpatrick refused. In essence, Dr. Fitzpatrick refused to allow Huber to accompany Brill into her office and she refused to turn over or read the medical reports to Brill. What she did do was to read a small portion of Dr. Schwed's June 10 report and indicated to Brill that the Company would only send the reports to Brill's private physician if so desired by Brill. Brill thereupon signed a release for the Company to transmit the records to her private physician. At the conclusion of the meeting, Dr. Fitzpatrick asked Brill to sign a form indicating that she had been given an adequate opportunity to review her medical records. Brill refused to sign the form as written, as she concluded that she had not been afforded an opportunity to adequately review her records. On December 7, Brill wrote another letter to Dr. Bisgeir complaining of Dr. Fitzpatrick's refusal to turn over her medical records.

On January 6, 1983, a copy of Dr. Schwed's June 10, 1982 report was sent to Brill's private physician. He promptly turned it over to Brill who, in turn, gave it to the Union.

The Company asserts preliminarily that Brill never authorized or consented to the release of her records to the Union. Although this is technically correct, it seems clear that as these records were being sought by Brill and the Union to justify her grievance, Respondent was fully aware that she intended to turn them over to the Union. Moreover, on December 6, she arrived at the medical office, accompanied by Union Agent Huber, and requested that Huber assist her in reviewing her records. In any event, the Company not only refused to turn over the records to the Union, but also refused to turn them over to Brill.

The Company also asserts that it should not be compelled to turn over medical records directly to employees (except for hard data such as blood tests) because such action might be harmful to the employee's health or mental condition. Indeed, this appears to be the current policy of the medical department, which will only release such records to an employee's private physician if so requested by the employee. As to Dr. Schwed's reports relative to Brill, Respondent additionally notes that these reports are stamped:

> Confidential
> This report is for employment suitability.
> It may adversely affect the mental health of the subject if indiscriminatorily shown to him.

However, the record shows that all reports received from Dr. Schwed have been stamped in the above fashion as a routine matter. There was no adequate showing by Respondent that Dr. Schwed's reports, if shown to Brill, would have adversely affected her mental health and, although I am not a physician, I simply cannot imagine how they could have done so. On the contrary, it would seem to me that disclosure of Dr. Schwed's reports to Brill, and particularly his second report, could only have been beneficial to her mental condition as it expresses the opinion that her depression had largely abated. I also note in this regard that when Brill's private physician received the report he apparently had no difficulty about releasing it to her.

Based on the record as a whole, it is evident that Dr. Fitzpatrick simply applied a blanket company policy, which is to refuse to disclose to any employee his or her medical diagnostic records (apart from hard data), irrespective of the illness involved, and to make such records available only to the employee's private physician. It also is clear to me that in carrying out this policy, the Company's physicians do not, in fact, make any independent medical judgment whether the disclosure of the records would adversely affect an employee's health. In short, it seems to me that this policy essentially is a manifestation of an outdated paternalism, which seemingly assumes that patients are ill equipped to deal with medical information concerning themselves. To my mind it is a policy which, except perhaps in extreme circumstances not present here (e.g., terminal illness or suicidal depression), has little or no justification.[6] It is my opinion that it is axiomatic that any patient, except perhaps in extreme circumstances noted above, should have the right to know information concerning his own body and to have that right honored by any physician with whom he consults. Indeed, it may be argued that the refusal by Dr. Fitzpatrick to turn over the medical reports to Brill was also contrary to the laws of New Jersey, which require physicians, including company-employed physicians, to release on request employees' medical records or a summary report thereof. In a letter to the Company from Charles A. Janousek, executive secretary of the New Jersey Board of Medical Examiners, he stated:

[6] See The Right to Know: Giving the Patient His Medical Records, 57 Arch. Phys. Rehabilitation 78 (1976); Giving The Patient His Medical Records. A Proposal To Improve The System; The New England Journal of Medicine, Sept. 27, 1973.

> The New Jersey State Board of Medical Examiners, in 1978, promulgated the enclosed Patient Records Rule. That rule requires that a physician, upon written request and within 30 days, submit a copy of his physician's record or a summary report of such record, and/or copies of all pertinent, objective data and papers to the patient, designated physician or a duly authorized representative.
> This Board, when promulgating the rule, determined that it was the physician's prerogative whether to copy the entire record for release or make a summary report of such record. The Board has determined, since the rule has been promulgated, that the submission of a summary report complies with the intent of the rule, although the patient or another designated individual may have wanted a copy of the full record.
> With regard to the release of the complete record or summary report, the patient has the right to receive the material directly, request that it be sent to a specific physician, or the request can be made on behalf of the patient by an attorney, who the Board has determined is the duly authorized representative. The rule also allows the physician the discretion, while in his professional judgment, to withhold certain records that the physician considers would be deleterious to the patient's best interests. I know of no instance where the Board has been asked to determine whether a physician has withheld information that is not deleterious. I know of no previous case where the Board has made inquiry into a complaint, that a physician has edited a summary report for any reason.[7]

3. The grievance of Cheryl Sistrunk

Cheryl Sistrunk is employed as a service representative in Respondent's New Brunswick, New Jersey office. In April 1982 Local 1023 filed a grievance on her behalf alleging that she had been passed over for a promotion to a drafting position. In this regard, another employee, Serone, who had less seniority than Sistrunk, had been given the position.

On April 20 a first-step grievance meeting was held in which the Company was asked why Serone rather than Sistrunk had received the promotion. On April 22 the Company responded that Serone had had 6 months' experience in drafting and that she had a physical handicap, which gave her priority pursuant to the Company's affirmative action program. The Union then requested a copy of Serone's upgrade and transfer application, indicating that it wanted to see her drafting experience and to see if, in fact, Serone had a handicap. On April 28, Company Representative Kesselmeyer denied the Union's request, relying on the employee privacy protection plan.

The record shows that the Union did not attempt to seek Serone's consent for the release of her application and that it was never furnished to the Union. The record also shows that the grievance ultimately was settled at the third step. I do not know what information was contained on Serone's application, as I was not shown this document and I am unaware of the nature of the settlement.

4. The grievance of Kim Mosco

Kim Mosco is also employed at Respondent's New Brunswick office as a service representative. There are about 39 employees at this office who are represented by Local 1023. In April, Mosco received a letter in lieu of suspension because of excessive absenteeism. Thereafter, she informed Union Agent Hutchins that she wished to file a grievance.

About April 5, 1983, Hutchins told Company Representatives Kesselmeyer and John Bradway that she wanted to see the attendance records of all the employees in the office before filing a formal grievance on Mosco's behalf. Bradway responded that the Company would only release such records if the employees signed releases.

On April 8 Hutchins told Bradway that it was the Union's position that it had a right to the records without employee releases and that if the request was refused, Local 1023 would take the matter to the NLRB. Thereafter, on April 12, Kesselmeyer offered to show the Union the records of the three worst offenders, without employee identification, if the Union paid for the cost of duplication. Hutchins refused, stating that she wanted to see all the records.

On April 25, Mosco at the request of the Company signed a release authorizing the Union to review her absence records. That afternoon, Hutchins was taken to Kesselmeyer's office and shown certain records in Mosco's binder. She, however, was denied her request to make photocopies and had to make notes by hand. She also was not shown the record of discussions relative to Mosco, which, as noted above, would contain, inter alia, the supervisor's evaluation of Mosco's excuses for being absent.

On May 2 a first-step grievance meeting was held. At one point, Hutchins asserted that in her opinion Mosco was being treated differently from other employees who had absences excused in similar circumstances. When the company representative challenged Hutchins to substantiate the claim, she replied in effect that she had no proof because the Company was denying her access to the employees' records.

[7] I do not construe the allowance of a summary report as permitting the deletion of pertinent medical information. Rather, it seems to me that what is intended is to allow a physician to reduce lengthy medical reports to shorter reports containing language understandable to a layman.

On May 11, Respondent denied the Mosco grievance and thereafter the grievance terminated because the Union did not meet the contract's time limitations for appealing to the third step.

5. The grievance of Patricia Zipf

Patricia Zipf, a member of Local 1023, is employed as a service representative in the South River, New Jersey office. On May 11, 1983, her shop steward, Bruce Heyer, was told by Joan Kelley (manager of the office) that Zipf was about to receive a letter in lieu of suspension because of her absences. Heyer told Kelley that a grievance would be filed and asked for Zipf's absentee records. Kelley replied that Sipf's consent was required for release of her records, and also told Heyer that the records would only be made available, assuming Zipf signed a release, if a grievance was filed.

On May 16 Heyer filed a grievance on Zipf's behalf and again requested that Kelley photocopy Zipf's absentee records at the Union's expense. Kelley refused. Sometime later, but before the first-step grievance meeting, Zipf signed a release and Heyer, on May 20, was taken to the manager's office in the late afternoon where he was allowed to review Zipf's records and make handwritten notes in Kelley's presence. His request to use the Xerox machine in the office was denied and he testified that he spent about 2 hours reviewing and copying the records by hand.

6. The grievances of Diane Mananian and Michael Marotta

Diane Mananian and Michael Marotta are sales representatives at the Pascack Valley office and both are shop stewards for Local 1024. In February 1983 each received performance ratings and although each was rated satisfactory overall, they both received unsatisfactory sales ratings. Thereafter, the Union filed grievances on behalf of both employees with respect to their sales ratings.

In connection with the grievances, it is noted that the sales rating is only one portion of an employees' overall rating and it is the overall rating that effects his or her job. Regarding the sales rating, the employees involved in sales are generally given a $300-per-month quota although some employees such as "off-line" or "backline" employees, who have less contact with the public, are given lower quotas. There are about 20 employees in this office. It was the Union's contention in these grievances that (1) as shop stewards spend part of their time on union business, their quotas should be lower, and (2) some of the other employees who met the quota did so by selling items to their friends and families. It is noted that previously the Company had published the sales results of its employees, a practice that was discontinued because the Union had objected.

On March 1 at the first-step meeting, the Union requested the cumulative sales records for all the employees in the office. The Company responded that it would only tender the information if the employees consented to its release. The cumulative sales records consist of a one-page document for each employee that list his or her quota and the number of items sold.

On March 10, the Union wrote a letter to the Company in connection with the grievance of Mananian. This letter stated:

> Specifically, we are requesting the sales performance records of all other Service Representatives of the Pascack Valley Residence Service Center. We have been advised that you are concerned about violating the Company's Privacy Protection Plan by providing this information. Although we do not agree with your position on this, for the purposes of this case only, the records requested may be provided with the names of the individuals deleted.
> I would however, like to point out that there is an exception to the plan with regard to information relevant and material to the Union's performance of its Collective Bargaining and Grievance handling functions.

On March 22, the Union again requested the information and the Company refused, citing the employee privacy protection plan. Respondent did offer, however, to show the Union the sales figure of the three lowest producers who were rated satisfactory, without identifying the employees by name.

About April 3, Company Representative Lutz called Local 1024 Vice President Dellavia and asked her to clarify her request for information. She stated that the Union was interested in knowing what the quotas were, how they were determined, how sales were broken down, and if the quotas were the same for all employees. She told Lutz that she wanted the information for all the employees so that the Union could compare, "and see if all employees were treated the same." She also told Lutz that the Union was willing to receive the information with the employees' names replaced by alphabetical listing.

On April 8, the Company sent a summary to the Union, in lieu of the actual records. This summary set forth each service representative designated by letter, his or her average monthly sales revenues, and whether the particular employee was full time, part time, backline, or on disability leave. The summary also indicated which employees had unsatisfactory sales ratings, although their names were not revealed. By letter dated May 4, Dellavia wrote to Director of Labor Relations Frank Sabo, as follows:

> I am writing in reference to requests for records on behalf of Diana Mananian and Michael Marotta. In my letter to Mr. Lutz, (see Enclosed) I requested the sales performance records of all Service Representatives of the Pascack Valley RSC.
> In a conversation with Mr. Lutz on April 8, 1983 he agreed to provide the sales objectives and actual sales results of each Service Representative, the reason why one individual objective would be lower than another and what formula was used to determine each objective.

> Enclosed is the response I received. As you can see all of my requests were not met.
> Mr. Lutz subsequently explained in a telephone conversation on April 22, 1983 that the office objective was $300 and that anyone who's [sic] objective was less than $300 was explained on the list. Without a detailed explanation of how each objective below $300 was arrived at and on what it was based, we can not make an informed decision as to the fair and equal treatment of Michael Marotta and Diana Mananian. Therefore we are again requesting copies of the actual sales records of all the Service Reps. in the Pascack Valley RSC.

Thereafter, on May 11, Sabo responded by letter, which read:

> This is in response to your letter of May 4, 1983 concerning your grievances on behalf of Helen Dobish, Diana Mananian and Michael Marotta.
> Inasmuch as these grievances are still in the grievance procedure and have not been appealed to me by your International Union Representative in accordance with the Agreement, I cannot comply with your request and suggest that you continue to negotiate the grievance at the present step where I hope a satisfactory resolution can be reached.

7. The grievance of Helen Dobish

Helen Dobish is employed at Respondent's Bergen Mall office. In November 1982, she was given a satisfactory rating but this was changed to an unsatisfactory rating in 1983 by her district manager. Local 1024 filed a grievance. The evaluation is a one-page document with blocks for ratings and a space for explanation.

The first-step meetings were held on March 2 and 8. In connection with the grievance, Dobish specifically authorized the Union to receive a copy of her evaluation. The Union was allowed to inspect it, but not to photocopy it.

On the basis of the evaluation shown to the Union, it decided to proceed further with Dobish's grievance in the belief that her evaluation did not warrant an unsatisfactory rating. Accordingly, on April 13 the Union wrote a letter to Von Ahn, requesting the job performance records of all similar employees in the office "from May 1982 to the present." On April 25, Von Ahn told Dellavia that the Company would not furnish these records without the consent of the employee involved. Dellavia then contacted Frank Sabo and reiterated her request for the records. Sabo told her that the Union would have to pay for the cost of copying the records and she asked how much this would be.

On May 9, Dellavia wrote to Sabo, as follows:

> In response to our telephone conversation of April 27, 1983, with regard to the grievance on behalf of Helen Dobish, I wish to again make a request for the following:
>
> Job performance records of all SSA's in the typing unit of the Bergen Mall SOEC, for the period from May 1982 to the present. These records may, if necessary, be provided exclusive of the individual employees names, for the purposes of this grievance only.
> We wish to stress that we require photocopies of the actual records not a prepared synopsis of the material contained within the records. We require this information in order to make an informed decision as to the fair and equal treatment accorded Ms. Dobish in the preparation of her job performance appraisal.
> During our conversation you mentioned the expense involved in preparing this material for the Union. If you will provide us with a cost estimate for the supervisors time spent in xeroxing the records and the cost of the copies, the Union will advise you as to our decision to bear these costs. As I'm sure you must realize, if the Company finds these costs burdensome, we will also have to review our Budget to determine if the Local can cover the expense. This consideration will apply in this case only and is not to establish a precedent.

On May 11, Sabo denied the Union's request stating that the grievance had not yet been appealed to him by the CWA. He did not state that the records would be made available if the Union paid the cost of copying and he did not indicate what the cost might be.

8. The grievance of Cathy Tiernan

Cathy Tiernan is employed as a service representative at the Palisades, New Jersey office where there are about 20 to 25 other employees. In April 1983, she received a final warning for poor job performance and a grievance was filed on her behalf by Local 1024. In connection with her grievance, the Union was given Tiernan's records after she signed a release. However, as the Union asserted that Tiernan was being treated in a disparate manner from other employees, it also requested the job performance records of the other service representatives employed in the Palisades office. In this regard, the Union stated that it did not need the records identified by employees' names. This request was denied by the Company.

On May 4, 1983, Local 1024 President Gilbert Snowden sent a letter to Respondent District Manager Norman LeGeaux, which stated:

> In our capacity as collective bargaining agents for Cathy Tiernan, Service Representative in the Palisades RSC, we have requested records that are relevant and material to our grievance on Ms. Tiernan's behalf. (see our letter of April 13th 1983) The records requested have been denied to us by Mrs M. Hiboki, Manager of the Palisades RSC. Without these records it is impossible for the Union to determine if Ms. Tiernan was given fair and equal treatment when she was advised by her supervisor Luann Mallock, that her job was in jeopardy due to poor performance.
> We are unable to provide proper representation at a grievance meeting on this subject and therefore

> Chief Steward Noreen Scanlon has requested that the time limits on this grievance be protected at first level until the matter of the records can be resolved.
> This request was also refused by Mrs. Hliboki on April 22, 1983. We are now being forced to advance a grievance to second step without having had a proper first step grievance hearing. We cannot see how the tenets of collective bargaining can be served by this method of action.
> We again request that this grievance be held at first level until such time as the Union is able to obtain all the information necessary to determine if we in fact have a grievance worthy of a second level hearing.

On May 22, a second-step meeting was held at which Union Representative Noreen Scanlon requested the job performance records of the office service representatives without name identification. Respondent refused, stating that employee releases would be necessary before these records could be turned over. It appears that subsequently the grievance was settled when the warning to Tiernan was withdrawn by the Company.

9. The grievance of Hartent Dunston

Hartent Dunston is employed as a service representative at Respondent's East Orange, New Jersey facility. On April 4, 1983, she was given a letter in lieu of suspension for walking off the job. On April 20 she received a 5-day suspension for poor work performance, the Company asserting that she was intoxicated while at work. Dunston then filed a grievance with Local 1023, which was heard at the first step on April 22, 1983. At this meeting the Company's representative told the Union the reasons for Dunston's disciplinary actions. The Union did not at this time request any records.

About 3 weeks after the first-step meeting, Local 1023 requested Dunston's absence and job performance records. The Company advised that Dunston's release was required before it would turn these records over to the Union. Dunston did not sign a release and the records were not sent to the Union. As a consequence, Dunston's grievance was left pending at the first step of the grievance procedure, which is its current status.

II. ANALYSIS

A. General Principles

Pursuant to Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, an employer has an obligation to comply with a union's request for information that is relevant to the processing of grievances unless there is a showing that the information is unduly burdensome, legitimately confidential, privileged in nature, or has been waived. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979); LaGuardia Hospital, 260 NLRB 1455 (1982). In determining the parameters of relevance, the criteria used is a broad discovery type of standard;[8] namely, whether the information requested is probably or potentially relevant. Therefore, it need not be shown that the information will result in the union winning an arbitration, so long as it is relevant to the disputed subject matter. Indeed, the fact that the information may even tend to show that a grievance or potential grievance is without merit, equally serves a legitimate purpose of collective bargaining because such disclosure would enable a union to determine which grievances it will pursue to arbitration and which it will not. In this latter connection, the Court in NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co. stated at 438:

> Arbitration can function properly only if the grievance procedures leading to it can sift out unmeritorious claims. For if all claims originally initiated as grievances had to be processed through to arbitration, the system would be woefully overburdened.

The Board has consistently held, as a general rule, that an employer's refusal to turn over relevant information may not be excused because the information requested may be available from the employees represented by the union or from other sources. New York Times Co., 265 NLRB 353 (1982). See also Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 633, 638 (2d Cir. 1982). Indeed, such a rule makes eminent practical sense. For example, a union may seek, in relation to an employee's grievance, information about many other employees in an effort to discover whether the grievant has been treated in a disparate manner. The simplest, most expeditious, and error free source of such information would normally be the employer's records. To allow a company to refuse the information request and thereby compel a union to seek the identical information from the employees would likely take a good deal longer and be more prone to error even assuming that all the employees responded affirmatively and accurately to the union's request. Indeed, the potential for error and delay could be extremely prejudicial to a grievant where, as here, the contractual grievance procedure has time limitations for moving a grievance from one step to the next. Moreover, it is conceivable that in certain grievances an employee or employees might not want to furnish information to the union, whem the outcome might be adverse to them. This situation could arise, for example, in a circumstance similar to the Sistrunk grievance, in which the issue is which of two competing employees is entitled to a promotion. In short, it is clear from the case law that an employer may not refuse to furnish information relevant to a grievance on the grounds that the union has alternative means of obtaining the information. Thus, as stated by the Board in Kroger Co., 226 NLRB 512, 513 (1976):

> Absent special circumstances, a union's right to information is not defeated merely because the union may acquire the needed information through an independent course of investigation. The union is under no obligation to utilize a burdensome procedure of obtaining desired information where the employer may have such information available in a more convenient form. The union is entitled to an > accurate and authoritative statement of facts which only the employer is in a position to make.

It is of course possible for a union to waive its right to relevant information. Where this contention is raised, however, the burden is on the employer to establish a "clear and unmistakable" waiver on the part of the union. NLRB v. Perkins Machine Co., 326 F.2d 488 (1st Cir. 1964); Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 746 (6th Cir. 1963). In the present case, I certainly do not consider the Employer's unilateral promulgation of its employee privacy protection plan as amounting to a waiver by the Union as there is no evidence to suggest that this plan was the result of any agreement or negotiations with the Union. Moreover, I note that pursuant to the provisions of the plan, it explicitly exempts from nondisclosure, information requested by the bargaining representative that is relevant to a matter in collective bargaining. Since the processing of grievances under the contract is part and parcel of the collective-bargaining process, it seems to me that the authors of that privacy plan were aware and recognized the legal requirements for disclosing employee information, without the employees' consent, when such information is relevant to grievance handling.

Notwithstanding a union's request for relevant information, there can also exist rare circumstances whem a company may lawfully refuse to furnish information because of its confidential nature. Thus, in Detroit Edison v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979), the company refused to comply with a union's request for copies of aptitude tests, the answers to the tests, and employee scores that were used by the company for purposes of promotion. The Supreme Court (440 U.S. at 317-320), in refusing to enforce the Board's Order, stated:

> [W]e agree with the Company that its willingness to disclose these scores only upon receipt of consents from the examinees satisfied its statutory obligations under § 8(a)(5).
> The Board's position appears to rest on the proposition that union interests in arguably relevant information must always predominate over all other interests, however legitimate. But such an absolute rule has never been established, and we decline to adopt such a rule here. There are situations in which an employer's conditional offer to disclose may be warranted. That we believe is one.
> The sensitivity of any human being to disclosure of information that may be taken to bear on his or her basic competence is sufficiently well known to be an appropriate subject of judicial notice. There is nothing in this record to suggest that the Company promised the examinees that their scores would remain confidential in order to further parochial concerns or to frustrate subsequent Union attempts to process employee grievances. And it has not been suggested at any point in this proceeding that the Company's unilateral promise of confidentiality was in itself violative of the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement. Indeed, the Company presented evidence that disclosure of individual scores had in the past resulted in the harassment of some lower scoring examinees who had, as a result, left the Company.
> Under these circumstances, any possible impairment of the function of the Union in processing the grievances of employees is more than justified by the interests served in conditioning the disclosure of the test scores upon the consent of the very employees whose grievance is being processed. The burden on the Union in this instance is minimal. The Company's interest in preserving employee confidence in the testing program is well founded.
>
> In light of the sensitive nature of testing information, the minimal burden that compliance with the Company's offer would have placed on the Union, and the total absence of evidence that the Company had fabricated concern for employee confidentiality only to frustrate the Union in the discharge of its responsibilities, we are unable to sustain the Board in its conclusion that the Company, in resisting an unconsented-to disclosure of individual test results, violated the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith.

B. Additional Grievances

1. The grievances of McAllister, Mosco, and Zipf

Each of these employees had filed grievances relating to disciplinary actions taken against them because of excessive absenteeism. In each instance, the local union representing them made requests for certain company records relating to the absences of the grievants or to other similarly situated employees. The Company's responses varied in each case.

In the case of McAllister, Local 1024 requested her absence records during the first step of the grievance procedure. It did so orally and by letter. The letter asked the Company to produce certain of McAllister's records by form G-520 and C-4014 and "any other documentation relevant to [McAllister's] history of absence to date." Respondent rejected this request, citing its employee privacy protection plan. It asserted that McAllister would have to consent to the release of her records. Subsequently, the Company did tender to the Union, notwithstanding the fact that McAllister had not given her consent, a handwritten summary setting forth the dates and durations of her absences since March 1982. The summary also set forth the reasons that McAllister had given for her absences. (I.e., flu, weak and nauseous, upset stomach, sunburn, and virus.) When the Union indicated that it still wanted to see the official records on which the summary was based, the Company refused, again citing the privacy plan.[9] Thereafter, the Union reiterated its request in writing and the Company took the position that McAllister's consent was a necessary precondition for release of her records.

[9] The processing of a grievance under a collective-bargaining agreement is, to some degree, analogous to a trial. In the latter instance, while summaries may be offered by one party into evidence, it must make available to the other side the records on which the summary is based. Fed.R.Evid. 1006.

On May 10, the Company asked McAllister if she would consent to the release of her records and she said she wold have to discuss this with her shop steward. Apparently, the Company construed her answer as a consent and gave the Union some, but not all, of McAllister's absence records. Thus, although it tendered copies of her forms G-520 and C-4014, it furnished her G-661 record in an expurgated fashion. although Company argues that it had no obligation to furnish the G-661 record because the Union did not explicitly request that form, the evidence shows that the Union's representatives, and indeed some of the Company's representatives, were not aware that the form G-661 was a separate form. In any event, it also is evident that as a matter of practice, the form G-661, on which the supervisor may record his evaluation of an employee's absence excuses, is incorporated by reference into the form C-4014 and is part of an employee's absence records. Also, the Union while designating the forms G-520 and C-4014 in its initial request for information additionally requested any other documentation relevant to McAllister's history of absences.

As the grievance involved McAllister's receipt of discipline for her absences, it is axiomatic that all of her absence records, during the relevant period of time, would be relevant to her grievance and therefore discoverable by the Union. Moreover, the form G-661 was probably more relevant to her grievance than the other information furnished by the Company because it contained the supervisor's evaluation of McAllister's excuses, and a record of the discussions and/or warnings that preceded the particular disciplinary action. As the evidence shows that the Company did not turn over all of McAllister's absence records, but rather turned them over with substantial deletions, I conclude that it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

In reaching this conclusion, I am mindful of the Third Circuit's earlier opinion in New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 720 F.2d 789 (3d Cir. 1983). In this respect, I believe the facts are distinguishable.[10] Unlike the facts of the earlier case, the facts here do not disclose that the Union directed McAllister to withhold her consent to the release of her records or that she at any time expressed any concern that their release would infringe on her privacy. Also, unlike the earlier case in which the absence records showed medical reasons for being absent that were highly intimate and personal, the excuses given by McAllister, which were in fact turned over to the Union before she gave her "consent," were of the garden variety of common ailments.

With respect to the Mosco grievance, the Union initially asked to see the attendance records of all the employees in the New Brunswick office, of which there are about 39. The Company refused, asserting that employee releases would have to be secured. On April 12, after the grievance was filed, the Company offered to show the Union the records of the three worst offenders if the Union paid for the cost of duplication. The Union refused this offer, asserting that it wanted to see all the records.

On April 15, Mosco signed a release for her own records, but when Union Representative Hutchins asked to make photocopies of Mosco's records this was refused and Hutchins was forced to copy the records by hand. Also, Hutchins was not shown that portion of Mosco's records containing the record of discussions (i.e., the G-661 form).

On May 2, at the first-step grievance meeting, Hutchins asserted her opinion that Mosco was being treated differently from other employees who had similar types of absences excused. When the Company challenged her to prove this allegation, she said that she could not because of her inability to obtain the requested records. Subsequently, Mosco's grievances terminated because the Union did not meet the contractual time limits for appealing to the next step.

In relation to the Mosco grievance, it seems to me that her own absence records were clearly relevant to her grievance, which involved discipline for her excessive absenteeism. As in the case of McAllister, there was no showing that the Union directed Mosco to withhold her consent for release of her records and, in fact, she did sign a release. Accordingly, I can only conclude that when Respondent failed to tender the entirety of her absence records, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Also, it is my conclusion that when Respondent refused to allow Hutchins to make photocopies of the records, that it further violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Thus, in Communications Workers Local 1051 v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 923, 926–927 (1st Cir. 1981), the court stated:

> The evidence establishes that the "no photocopy" rule made it expensive and time-consuming, if not impossible, for the union to obtain the reliable copies it required to discharge its duties as bargaining representative. The rule plainly disadvantaged the union in evaluating and prosecuting grievances and was likely to discourage resort to the grievance process at all in some cases.
> In view of the company's vigorous defense of its ban on photocopies, we find it perplexing, to say the least, that it has neglected even to assert a legitimate business justification for its policy. Despite repeated inquiries by the ALJ, the company declined during the hearing to disclose the reason for its rule, and has continued on appeal to rely on its bare legal right to determine as it chooses, how information will be disclosed to the union. As we said in NLRB

---

[10] Even assuming that the facts were indistinguishable from the earlier case, I would nevertheless be constrained to follow the Board's precedent. Thus, in Insurance Agents, 119 NLRB 768, 773, the Board stated:

> It has been the Board's consistent policy for itself to determine whether to acquiesce in the contrary views of a circuit court of appeals or whether, with due deference to the court's opinion, to adhere to its previous holding until the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled otherwise. But it is not for a Trial Examiner to speculate as to what course the Board should follow where a circuit court has expressed disagreement with its views. On the contrary, it remains the Trial Examiner's duty to apply established Board precedent which the Board or the Supreme Court has not reversed. Only by such recognition of the legal authority of Board precedent, will a uniform and orderly administration of a national act, such as the National Labor Relations Act, be achieved.

See also Typographic Service Co., 238 NLRB 1568, 1573 fn. 13 (1978); Charles D. Bonanno Linen, 229 NLRB 624 (1977).

> v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical Division, 600 F.2d 313, 318 (1st Cir. 1979), management's prerogative to determine the form of information disclosure is not a license to put the union "through the hoops": "The union is under no obligation to utilize a burdensome procedure of obtaining desired information where the employer may have such information available in a more convenient form" (quoting The Kroger Company, 226 NLRB 512, 513 (1976)). We held in Borden that management could not refuse to supply the union with insurance cost data because the same information could be had by polling the employees. We see no reason to accord greater deference to management prerogative, if any exists, when, as here, the employer supplies information in the requested form (original documents) but seeks to limit the means by which the union may make copies. We affirm the Board's decision that application of the "no photocopy" rule in these cases unnecessarily impeded the grievance process.

Finally, regarding the Mosco grievance, it is my opinion that the Union's request for the attendance records of the other employees in her office was a valid one. The Union asserted its belief that Mosco was being treated in a disparate manner from other employees. Whether this belief was correct is not really the point, as an examination of the records, even if establishing that the claim was without merit, would have aided the grievance process. This is so because such disclosure might have convinced the Union to withdraw the grievance and thereby cause itself and the Company to cease spending time and effort on an invalid claim. As noted by the Court in NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra, a union's need for information is not dependent on a showing that the information will aid the union in winning the grievance. Of equal importance, is the need of a union to sift out nonmeritorious claims that would bog down the grievance-arbitration process.

With respect to the Company's defense that it legitimately required employee releases before releasing these records, I conclude that this defense is without merit for the same reasons stated above. That is, there was no showing that the Union directed any of the employees to refuse to sign releases, there was no evidence that any employees objected to the release of such information, and there was no showing that these particular records contained information of a medical nature that was highly intimate or personal. However, in light of the Third Circuit's opinion in the prior case, the Board may want to consider whether to allow the Company in the future to furnish these types of absence records without employee identification.

To the extent that the Company asked the Union to pay for the cost of copying the records, this may be a reasonable request where, as here, numerous documents need to be photocopied. Therefore, it seems appropriate for the parties to bargain about the circumstances in which the Union will pay for the cost of copying company records and the costs involved. Communications Workers Local 1051 v. NLRB, supra at fn. 3.

With respect to the grievance involving Zipf, the record shows that when Shop Steward Heyer asked for Zipf's absentee records, he was told that Zipf's consent was needed and that her records would only be released after a formal grievance was filed. When the Union did file a formal grievance, it again requested Zipf's records and offered to pay for the costs of photocopying. After Zipf signed a release, the shop steward was allowed to review Zipf's records but was required to make notes by hand in the presence of a supervisor.

It is my opinion, for the reasons expressed above, that the Company violated the Act by conditioning release of the records on Zipf's consent. Also, I conclude that Respondent violated the Act by additionally conditioning release of Zipf's records on the filing of a formal grievance. See Tom's Ford, Inc., 253 NLRB 888, 894 (1980). Finally, I conclude that the Company violated the Act by refusing to allow the Union to make photocopies of Zipf's records after Zipf had signed a release and after the Union offered to pay for the cost of copying.

2. The Brill grievance

In this instance, the Union requested from the Company Brill's medical records including the reports made by consulting psychologist, Dr. Schwed. The records were clearly relevant to Brill's grievance as the issue was whether her present medical condition warranted her continued eligibility for disability pay after her return to work following a medical leave of absence.

Recognizing that disclosure of Brill's medical records required her consent, the Union asked her to send a letter to the medical department, requesting her records. She did this on November 9, 1982. On December 6 when Brill, accompanied by Union Agent Huber, went to the medical department, he was not allowed to review her records and Brill was told that the psychologist's reports would not be turned over to her. Rather, she was told that the Company would send these reports to her private physician. Brill objected to no avail and it was not until a month later that these records were transmitted to Brill's physician. When he got them, he turned them over to Brill and she turned them over to the Union. In the meantime, her grievance was pending.

Under Board law, medical records are accorded a high, if not absolute degree of confidentiality even if relevant to the bargaining process. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 261 NLRB 27 (1982), enfd. 694 F.2d 1289 (D.C. Cir. 1982); LaGuardia Hospital, 260 NLRB 1455 (1982); Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 252 NLRB 368 (1980); Colgate Palmolive Co., 261 NLRB 90 (1982). Nevertheless, even assuming in a particular case that the need for confidentiality outweighs the need for medical records, the Board has noted that the "privilege in question, of course, belongs to the employees and not to the Respondent." Johns-Manville Sales Corp., supra. Therefore, it is plain that the assertion of a confidentiality privilege may not be asserted as a defense, if the employee whose records are sought has consented to their release.

It is true, in the present case, that Brill did not explicitly, in writing, authorize the release of her medical records to the Union. Nevertheless, considering all the circumstances, it seems to me that the Company was aware that Brill wanted these records furnished to her and that she intended to give them to the Union in support of her grievance. Indeed, when she went to the medical department on December 6 to pick up her records, she asked that the shop steward be allowed to accompany her into the interview with Dr. Fitzpatrick. Nevertheless, the Company not only refused this request, but refused to turn over the records to Brill. Also it refused to allow her to look at her records or even to be read the full contents.

It appears that the Company's policy is to refuse to honor any employee's request for direct release of medical records (apart from hard test data), irrespective of the employee's medical condition. The Company makes a blanket assertion that such direct release would be harmful to an employee's health. I do not accept this generalized assertion, which assumes that under any circumstance the release of medical records directly to employees would be detrimental to them. As stated above, it is my belief that such a position is outdated at best, and appears to be contrary to the laws of the State of New Jersey. It is my opinion that a person, if he or she so desires, is entitled to have information concerning his/her own body and mind. It is recognized that there may be extreme circumstances (such as terminal illness or suicidal depression) that might justify a physician in refusing to furnish medical records if it is demonstrated, on an objective basis, that such disclosure would be harmful to the health or mental condition of a patient. However, I am satisfied that no such showing has been made in the present case as I do not believe that either of Dr. Schwed's reports, if disclosed to Brill, could conceivably have been detrimental to her health or mental condition.

Based on the above, it is concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when it refused the requests of the Union and Brill to turn over her medical records to be used in connection with her grievance.

3. The grievance of Mananian and Marotta

When Mananian and Marotta received unsatisfactory sales performance ratings, Local 1024 filed grievances on their behalf even though they had received satisfactory ratings regarding their overall performance. Both of these indididuals were shop stewards, and as such spent part of their time doing union work. As the rating for sales performance is based on a quota, the Union argued, in part, that the Company should have taken into account the fact that both individuals spent part of their time in union business. In this regard, it was shown that other employees who work on other functions have lower sales quotas.

In support of its grievance, the Union requested from the Company the cumulative sales records of all the employees in the office and the Company responded that this information could not be turned over absent employee consent. Previously, these records, which consist of a single page for each employee listing their sales and quotas, had been published by the Company. However, when employees complained that their publication was divisive, the Company ceased that practice.

On March 10, the Union repeated its request for the records although it indicated that the records could be provided with the names of the individuals deleted. The Company, while refusing this request, did offer to furnish the sales figures of the three lowest sales producers, without identification, who received satisfactory ratings. This offer was rejected by the Union.

On April 8, the Company, instead of sending copies of the actual records to the Union, sent a summary that set forth each employee by letter designation, and set forth his or her average monthly sales revenues. The summary also set forth whether the employee was engaged in sales on a full-time or part-time basis, and whether the employee had an unsatisfactory sales rating. The Union responded that the summary tendered was not sufficient for its needs and again requested copies of the actual sales records.

It is my opinion that the information sought was relevant to the grievances involved. In this regard, it seems to me that the Union had a colorable claim that whem sales quotas are lowered for other employees who do not work full time in sales, the shop stewards who are required to spend some of their time in union business should be treated in a similar fashion. (This does not mean, however, that I conclude that the Union's grievance ultimately would have been successful.)

The Company's claim that the sales records were confidential and required employee consent for their release is rejected. I do not see any rational basis for asserting that such sales figures, if released to the Union (and not generally published) would have invaded a legitimate privacy interest of the employees. Any concern employees might have regarding the release of such records is, in my opinion, outweighed by the Union's need for information relevant to grievances handling. Moreover, the Union indicated that it was willing to receive the information without employee identification.

Where, as here, the records involved were readily available and not particularly voluminous, I also do not understand why the Company simply did not turn them over as requested. Thus, in the absence of any evidence showing a justification for a refusal to tender copies of the actual records, it is my opinion that tender of a summary is not sufficient to meet the Company's obligation to furnish relevant information.

4. The Sistrunk grievance

Local 1023 filed a grievance on Sistrunk's behalf when she did receive a promotion to a drafting position. It did so because another employee, Serone, received the promotion notwithstanding her lower seniority.[11] The Company, in response to the grievance, asserted that Serone was given the promotion over Sistrunk because she had previous drafting experience and because she had a handicap, which gave her a priority under the Company's affirmative action program. When the Company gave these reasons, the Union asked to see Serone's upgrade application to verify the Company's assertions regarding Serone. The Company refused citing its privacy plan and asserted that Serone would have to authorize release.

[11] The contract at art. 9 states, in substance, that in promotion to non-management positions within the bargaining unit seniority shall be controlling, where "all other qualifications including ability, knowledge of the job to be filled, attendance record, dependability and availability for the assignment are substantially equal."

Clearly, the information requested was relevant to the grievance because of the Company's asserted reasons for promoting Serone over Sistrunk. Simply stated, the Union should be entitled to verify, through appropriate records, the facts asserted by the Company instead of being compelled to accept the Company's word. In this case it is my opinion that the Union's need for the information outweighed any claimed right of privacy. I also think the facts are distinguishable from the facts in the Third Circuit's earlier opinion. First, the Union did not direct Serone to refuse to sign a release. Secondly, the Union made no request for any information disclosing the precise nature or extent of Serone's handicap. Finally, the Company did not demonstrate that Serone's application contained information of a medical nature that was highly intimate or personal. I also note that although the Union did not seek to obtain Serone's consent for release of her application, there is no assurance that she would have given her consent in view of the fact that the Union's position regarding the grievance was adverse to her. If Serone had refused to give her consent, would the Union then be compelled to process the grievance without the necessary documentation?

5. The grievances of Dobish, Tiernan, and Dunston

Each of these employees received unsatisfactory performance ratings and in the case of Tiernan, she received a final warning. A grievance was filed in each instance and the Union requested certain information in relation to the grievances.

With respect to Dobish, the Union requested receipt of her performance evaluation. After Dobish signed a release, a union representative was allowed to review this document, but the request for a photocopy was refused. After reviewing the evaluation, the Union decided to process Dobish's grievance further and requested the job performance records of the other employees in the office. On April 25, the Company notified the Union that it would not furnish these records without employee consent. When the Union contacted Frank Sabo, the Company's director of labor relations, he stated the Union would have to pay for the cost of duplicating the records. On May 4, the Union wrote to Sabo reiterating its request for the records and asking for a cost estimate for copying. On May 11, Sabo replied, asserting that he could not comply with the Union's request because the grievance had not yet been appealed to the third step of the grievance procedure.

Obviously the records of Dobish were relevant to her grievance and I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing the Union's request to have photocopies made of her records. Communications Workers Local 1051 v. NLRB, supra. I am also of the opinion that the request for the performance records of the other employees was relevant to the grievance because the Union was entitled to discover whether Dobish was treated in a disparate manner. As the information involved was not of a medical nature or, in my opinion, otherwise confidential in nature, I reject the Company's claim that it could legitimately condition their release on the employees' consent.

Based on the above, I therefore conclude that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. As in the case of the Mosco grievance, it seems appropriate for the parties to bargain about the circumstances in which the Union will bear the cost of copying and the costs involved.

Regarding the Tiernan grievance, Local 1024 was given Tiernan's records after she signed a release. When the Union asserted that it believed that Tiernan was being treated in a disparate manner from other employees, it requested the job performance records of the other service representatives in the same office. In making this request, the Union indicated to the Company that it did not need these records identified by employee names. Nevertheless, the request was denied. On May 4, the Union wrote to Respondent reiterating its request and setting forth its reasons. When the Union again repeated its request for the records (without employee identification) on May 22, the Company refused, stating that employee releases were necessary. Thereafter, it appears that Tiernan's grievance was settled when the warning was retracted.

For essentially the same reasons set forth above, I conclude that the information requested was relevant to the grievance under the broad discovery standard applicable to these cases. I do not conclude that the information sought was confidential or otherwise privileged from disclosure by virtue of a claimed right of privacy. Therefore, I conclude that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by conditioning release of these records on employee consent.

Concerning the grievance of Hartent Dunston, who was disciplined for poor work performance, I conclude that the records requested by the Union (Dunston's absence and job performance records) were relevant to the grievance. As there is no showing that the Union requested Dunston to refuse to sign a release, and because there is no evidence that Dunston objected to their release, I conclude that Respondent, by refusing to turn them over unless she signed a release, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Communications Workers of America and its Locals 1022, 1023, and 1024 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All nonsupervisory employees of Respondent's commercial and marketing departments constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material the Communications Workers of America has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. At all times material, the Communications Workers of America, with the assent of Respondent, has delegated to its Locals 1022, 1023, and 1024 the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement at the local level and the processing of grievances at the first two steps of the contractual grievance procedure.

6. By failing to provide certain information and records to the Union and by failing to provide photocopies of certain records to the Union, when such records were requested for the purposes of administering the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain violations of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Insofar as the denial of information relating to the McAllister grievance, I recommend that Respondent furnish to the Union copies of all of her absentee records including an unexpurgated copy of the record designated form G-661.

Regarding the Mosco grievance, as this grievance terminated, the information requested has no current utility. I, therefore, shall not recommend that the information requested be turned over to the Union. This does not mean, however, that I conclude that the entire issue is moot so as to warrant dismissal of the charge in question. To the contrary, it is apparent that the Company's refusal to furnish relevant information in these cases was part of an overall pattern of nondisclosure that, unless ordered to cease, will continue in the future. C-B Buick Inc. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 1086, 1092–1093 (3d Cir. 1974); Boyer Ford Trucks, 254 NLRB 1389, 1394 (1981). Accordingly, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist in the future from violating the Act in similar respects.[12]

With respect to the Zipf grievance, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to turn over copies of Zipf's absentee records because I have concluded in the circumstances that Respondent unlawfully conditioned release of her records on her consent and on the filing of a formal grievance. I also recommend that the question of who will bear the cost of copying records is properly a subject for negotiations between the parties.

In connection with the Brill grievance, I will recommend that an order be issued directing the Company to turn over to Brill a copy of her medical records to the extent that they are not already in her possession. (It is not clear from this record whether she had obtained both of Dr. Schwed's reports.) Further, in future cases whem an employee's medical records are relevant to the employee's grievance, I recommend that such records be turned over to the Union on that employee's consent, or directly to the employee if such employee requests them from the Company's medical department. When such employee medical records are furnished to the Union, however it should be understood that the Union, its officers, agents, members, and attorneys shall not divulge such information, absent the employee's consent, to any other persons who are not involved in or necessary to the resolution of the grievance in question. Further in such rare and extreme circumstances (such as terminal illness or severe mental disorder), where, in the exercise of medical judgment, the disclosure of an employee's medical records is objectively judged to be harmful to an employee's health or mental condition, Respondent may fulfill its obligation by promptly transmitting such records to any physician designated by the employee.

Regarding the grievances of Mananian and Marotta, I recommend that Respondent furnish to the Union the cumulative sales records of the employees in the Pascade Valley office as requested by the Union without conditioning their release on the employees' consent. As noted above, the question of the cost of copying is a matter that the parties should negotiate.

Regarding the Sistrunk and Tiernan grievances, as those matters ultimately were settled in the grievance procedure, the information requested has no current utility. Accordingly, as in the case of the McAllister grievance, I shall not recommend that Respondent furnish this information. Since I have concluded that Respondent has violated the Act in these incidents, however, I do not consider these cases moot and I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from similar violations in the future.

In connection with the Dunston grievance, I shall recommend that the Respondent furnish to the Union her absence and job performance records without conditioning their release on Dunston's consent.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

---

[12] In light of the Third Circuit's opinion in the prior case, New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, supra, the Board may wish to consider modifying this order to provide that in grievances whem absence records are sought, such records of employees other than the grievant, may be furnished without employee identification unless such employees give their consent.

Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. and Sloan Steel Erectors and Equipment Rental, Inc. and International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 6, AFL-CIO. Case 3-CA-11787

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 12, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondents filed cross-exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.[2]

The judge found that Kenmore and Sloan are not alter ego corporations and do not constitute a single employer. She concluded, therefore, that they did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement between Kenmore and the Union to Sloan's employees. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with the judge's determination, and we find that Sloan is the alter ego of Kenmore and that they have violated the Act as alleged.[3]

The facts, which are largely undisputed, are detailed in the judge's decision. Kenmore is a steel erection company that performs construction work using its own cranes and equipment. It also leases cranes and related tools, such as welders, to other construction contractors. Kenmore has been owned since 1966 by Jacqueline Hanley and her husband, Hugh Hanley Jr. They are the Company's only officers. Kenmore is a member of the Construction Industry Employers Association, Inc. (CIEA) and, through CIEA, has been party to a series of collective-bargaining agreements with the Union, the most recent of which was effective from June 1, 1981, through May 31, 1984. The Building Trades Council (BTC), of which the Union is a member, prohibits union employers such as Kenmore from performing construction work at sites where nonunion contractors perform work, and the CIEA-union agreement prohibits ironworkers from working for nonunion contractors.

On November 4, 1981, two of the Hanley's children, Cherub and Patrick, then 27 and 21 years old, respectively, formed Sloan, a nonunion steel erection and crane rental company. Cherub is Sloan's president and Patrick is its vice president; they are Sloan's only officers and shareholders. Sloan performs steel erection work in western New York State, the same geographic area that Kenmore services. Sloan rents all the construction equipment it uses from Kenmore, and but for a pickup truck purchased on credit through a friend of the Hanley family, Sloan owns no field equipment. Sloan subleases cranes and other tools it rents from Kenmore to third parties. No other Kenmore customers are permitted to engage in third-party rentals. Additionally, unlike other Kenmore customers, Sloan is not required to lease the services of Kenmore crane operators when it uses Kenmore cranes[4] and, accordingly, is able to sublease Kenmore equipment to third parties using Sloan operators. Sloan's employees—who numbered 14 on its largest job—are paid approximately one-third of the union wage rate and do not receive fringe benefits. The parties stipulated that both companies share many of the same customers.[5]

Sloan's office is an 8- by 10-foot area located within the Kenmore office. Pursuant to an unwritten agreement, it rents this space from Kenmore for $100 a month, a figure unilaterally set by Kenmore. Although Sloan has been as much as 6 months late in rent payments, Kenmore has never required that it pay interest or penalties. Sloan owns no office equipment and uses without additional charge Kenmore's adding machine, typewriter, and office supplies. It maintains its own payroll, bank account, books, and records.

At the time of the formation of Sloan and continuing through the date of the hearing in these proceedings, Cherub and Patrick Hanley were fi-

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to resolve a conflict in the testimony of Fitzpatrick and Hugh Hanley Jr. concerning whether the latter said he was paying Sloan employees $7 an hour. In view of the decision we have reached, we find it unnecessary to resolve this question of credibility.

[2] We affirm the judge's finding that the Charging Party Union first acquired specific knowledge of the existence of Respondent Sloan approximately 1 month prior to the filing of the charge. We further affirm her conclusion that the charge was timely filed.

[3] In view of our finding that the Respondents are alter egos, we find it unnecessary to pass on the General Counsel's alternative allegation that the corporations constitute a single employer.

[4] Hugh Hanley Jr. testified that Kenmore once leased a crane without a crane operator to a contractor named Stimm.

[5] Pursuant to the stipulation, G.C. Exh. 8 indicates that Sloan's only customer in 1981 was also a Kenmore customer, and that in 1982 five of eight Sloan customers were Kenmore customers. In 1983 and 1984, respectively, 8 of 12 Sloan customers and 12 of 18 Sloan customers were or had been Kenmore customers.

289 NLRB No. 56

nancially dependent on their parents. Cherub and her son live in a condominium apartment owned by her parents, for which half the mortgage, fees, and utilities are paid by her parents. Her parents also pay her son's school tuition and approximately half the cost of his clothing. Patrick lives with his parents when not residing on campus at the Rochester Institute of Technology, and his parents pay his tuition and expenses. Additionally, both Cherub and Patrick were employees of Kenmore at the time of Sloan's formation. Cherub worked as a receptionist for Kenmore until July 1983 at a salary of $150 a week. Patrick was employed as a yardman. He testified that his employment with Kenmore ceased when Sloan was formed. Although neither Cherub nor Patrick has any previous experience in the industry, Cherub is Sloan's office manager and bookkeeper, and Patrick, whose title is field superintendent, estimates and bids Sloan jobs and supervises work at Sloan construction sites.[6] Cherub used the proceeds ($1400) from the sale of a car her parents had given her to capitalize Sloan.[7] Patrick testified that he contributed $1200 to capitalization, money from a student loan he secured for college but did not use for that purpose because his parents financed his education.

The judge correctly stated that in determining alter ego status, the Board considers whether the companies have substantially identical ownership, management, business purpose, operations, customers, equipment, and supervision.[8] As she pointed out, no one factor is controlling. The judge found, and the record establishes, that Kenmore and Sloan exist for the same business purpose, use some of the same equipment,[9] and share the same premises.[10] She also found, however, that this evidence is insufficient to outweigh what she deemed to be a lack of common ownership, management, and control over labor relations policy. Contrary to the judge, we find that the evidence establishes that Kenmore and Sloan are commonly owned, operated, and managed and that the record as a whole warrants a finding that the two corporations are alter egos.

First, we note that a finding of common ownership may be made where, although the same individuals are not shown to be owners of each corporation, the corporations are solely owned by members of the same family. Watt Electric Co., 273 NLRB 655, 658 fn. 17 (1984); E. G. Sprinkler Corp., 268 NLRB 1241, 1244 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Goodman Piping Products v. NLRB, 741 F.2d 10 (2d Cir. 1984). Granting that the existence of a close family relationship between owners of two companies will not always establish the common ownership element in an alter ego inquiry, we see no impediment to such a finding here, given the record evidence of Cherub's and Patrick's financial dependence on their parents and the less than arm's-length dealings between Kenmore and Sloan in the course of the latter's founding.[11]

Patrick and Cherub were able to provide the minimal capitalization of Sloan ($2600) only by virtue of aid from their parents. Specifically, Jacqueline's and Hugh's payment of Patrick's tuition enabled him to divert his student loan to the capitalization of Sloan; and Cherub's initial investment was made possible by the opportunity, immediately on the sale of her car, to lease a car from Kenmore, at a rate set by Kenmore with sporadic rental payments made through Sloan.

Concerning Sloan's operations, Kenmore and Sloan share the same premises, office equipment, and supplies and have open access to telephones and workspace. As the record establishes that Sloan owns no equipment except a pickup truck, uses Kenmore cranes for its own erection work, and subleases Kenmore property to third parties, it is clear that Kenmore and Sloan share substantially the same equipment. Further, although the Hanleys describe the two corporations as competitors, Sloan's ability to provide equipment to third parties is dependent on its having access to Kenmore equipment without operators. In this regard, Sloan subleases Kenmore equipment to third parties at the same cost it is charged by Kenmore, but derives its profits from the amount it charges for also providing an operator. Moreover, Sloan is the only Kenmore customer permitted to engage in third-party rentals.[12] On two occasions Sloan was awarded jobs it could not perform, and it subcontracted both to Kenmore without seeking or inviting other bids. On one of those jobs, the Walden job in August 1983, Kenmore earned $800 or more as the subcontractor while Sloan received only $100. On the Iroquois Central School project that was subcontracted to Kenmore, Sloan made no profit at all.

[6] As a yardman for Kenmore, Patrick helped to load trucks, did odd jobs, and generally kept the yard clean. Patrick never operated a crane. His only experience estimating a job was for a school project.

[7] Immediately after selling her car, Cherub, through Sloan, rented a car from Kenmore for $150 a month. As with the office rental, the figure was unilaterally set by Kenmore and although the rent payment was as much as 9 months in arrears, no interest or penalty was charged.

[8] See Leslie Oldsmobile, 276 NLRB 1314 (1985); Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984); and Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976), cited with approval in Goodman Piping Products v. NLRB, 741 F.2d 10, 11 (2d Cir. 1984). As explained below, the Board has also considered employer motivation in assessing alter ego status.

[9] As explained, infra, we find that the Respondents use substantially more than "some" of the same equipment.

[10] We agree with the judge that Hugh's instructing Sloan employees in the proper use of a crane and proper hand signals on August 1, 1983, at the National Fire Adjuster jobsite was too isolated an incident on which to base a finding of common supervision.

[11] We find the instant case distinguishable from cases in which the Board found that alter ego status was not established between corporations in which the owners were members of the same family. In Best Mechanical Contractors, 273 NLRB 83 (1984), in which the closing of the business of M. H. Best was followed by the opening of a business by his son and son-in-law, the new business did not engage in the same kinds of projects as the old one and its purchases of equipment and other transactions with the old corporation were all at arm's length. These same circumstances—different markets and arm's- length dealings between the two family-owned corporations—were also present in United Constructors, 233 NLRB 904 (1977). In Hillsamer Painting Contractors, 272 NLRB 1366 (1984), the assistance of the father (who owned Hillsamer) to the son (who owned Commercial Decorating) was minimal (use of a telephone and some clerical assistance for a brief period). The evidence of financial dependence and subsidizing of the formation of the new enterprise did not approach what was shown in the present case.

Likewise, the instant case differs from Victor Valley Heating & Air Conditioning, 267 NLRB 1292 (1983), in that in Victor Valley, although the father gave advice and training at the start of the business formed by the son and the son's friend, the son contributed the entirety of the capital (from his own funds and a gift from a grandmother who had no demonstrated connection with the other corporation), and the new corporation paid cash for equipment it received from the father's business. Id. at 1293, 1297. Victor Valley is distinguishable also for reasons discussed infra at fn. 18.

In addition to this evidence concerning Sloan's manner and method of doing business, the record reveals that Jacqueline and Hugh Hanley and Kenmore employee Tina Kasinski are integrally involved in Sloan's everyday affairs, including answering telephones, noting records, bookkeeping, and preparing job estimates and specifications, tool lists, and payroll. In this regard, we note that Kasinski completed substantial portions of Sloan's individual payroll records, including those pertaining to Cherub's and Patrick's earnings, for the 23-week period from July through December 1983.[13] Her entries and calculations, as well as those made by Jacqueline, also appear frequently in Sloan's cash disbursement/payroll journal for the months of March through December 1983. A review of Sloan invoices for that year reveals that Jacqueline took a customer order (invoice 8438) and twice wrote in notations instructing that no tax should be charged Sloan customers (invoices 8427 and 8431).[14] Attachments to Sloan invoices 8432, 8410, 8411, and 8412 are price specifications drawn up by Hugh. Invoices 8432 and 8411 also have attachments in Patrick's handwriting. It is noteworthy that while Patrick and Hugh's figures for invoice 8432 are the same, the price actually billed on invoice 8411 is the one calculated by Hugh. Significantly, those invoices that reflect Jacqueline's, Hugh's, and in one instance Hugh III's[15] input account for more than half of Sloan's income from erections and rentals for 1983.

Also relevant to our analysis is Cherub's salary as a Kenmore receptionist, which was nearly three times that of her Sloan salary between November 1981 and August 1983, even though, she testified, she divided her workday equally between the two companies. She earned $150 a week from Kenmore and $55 a week from Sloan until the pay period ending July 31, 1983, when she purportedly ceased working for Kenmore and began earning $150 a week from Sloan.[16] What is most salient about Cherub's salary is that Sloan records show that Cherub's first paycheck at the higher salary was written on August 3, 1983, 2 days after Union Representative Fitzpatrick encountered Hugh at a Sloan jobsite. Patrick's salary likewise increased, from $55 to $140, on August 3.

We find it relevant, too, under the circumstances, that Patrick painted the exterior of the Kenmore building at a time when he was no longer a Kenmore employee. Patrick testified variously that he received only his regular Sloan salary for this work, that he "imagine[d]" Kenmore paid Sloan but "to be perfectly honest" he did not know, and that Sloan was compensated but the price was left "to the owner of the building."[17]

In our view the foregoing evidence, particularly Sloan's unique and total reliance on Kenmore for equipment rentals and the day-to-day input of Kenmore personnel in Sloan's affairs, establishes that the operations of Kenmore and Sloan are so interrelated and symbiotic as to be substantially identical.[18]

[12] Sloan is also the only Kenmore customer permitted to select the actual cranes and tools it desires, and frequently rents them without executing the customary Kenmore paperwork.

[13] Kasinski's weekly entries account for nearly all the entries for all employees for August.

[14] Notwithstanding Cherub's explanation that Sloan was "new in the business" and uncertain about some tax matters, we note that the invoices noted "no tax" are dated November 1983 and involve equipment rentals, a service that Sloan had provided for 2 months and that Kenmore had provided Sloan for 2 years. Regarding invoice 8416, which bears Jacqueline's instruction to "continue billing Spancrete," Patrick testified that although he could not actually explain the notation, he believed he may have asked his mother to mark the invoice on an occasion when he telephoned the office while Cherub was out.

We also note that Patrick was away at school during the fall of 1983 and that Cherub attended office courses during the summer and fall of that year. Although Sloan hired Linda Longobardi on September 29 to help around the office, she was laid off on November 8 and worked only 56 hours in the 7 weeks she was employed, usually 3.5 hours on Monday and Tuesday of each week. In light of these facts, it appears that there were frequent and substantial periods of time when no Sloan personnel were present in the office at all.

[15] Hugh Hanley III is another of Jacqueline and Hugh Jr.'s children. He is an ironworker and has been employed by Kenmore.

[16] Cherub did not articulate any reason for her ceasing to work for Kenmore, nor did she indicate that her termination resulted in her ceasing, for example, to answer Kenmore phone calls or to perform other receptionist's duties.

[17] We note, but find no need to base our finding of common operations on the fact that Patrick painted a 35-ton Kenmore crane. Cherub denied knowing that any equipment was painted but stated that the equipment needed it and surmised that the improvement would make for a better impression. Kenmore employee R. Barry Miller, who is Jacqueline and Hugh's nephew, testified that Patrick often selected equipment that did not bear the Kenmore name and acknowledged that his cousin painted a crane. Patrick admitted painting over Kenmore's name on the crane, but stated that he did so to avoid the equipment's being vandalized by persons unhappy with a nonunion company's presence at construction sites.

Even apart from its bearing on the substantial identity of operations between the two companies, Jacqueline and Hugh's involvement in Sloan affairs, as described above, evidences that they were vested with decision-making authority. Thus, Jacqueline and Hugh quoted prices to Sloan customers, Jacqueline resolved a Sloan customer's complaint and a dispute a Sloan employee had with his paycheck, and Hugh estimated Sloan jobs and prepared tool lists while Patrick was away at school. Moreover, Cherub testified that she was not aware of her father's price quoting or whether he was authorized to do so and that in an instance in which her mother made a notation in Sloan's records about a problem with a customer, Cherub did not know what the discussion between her mother and the Sloan customer related to or what the notation meant.[19] The extent of this authority, we find, is a manifestation of common management in the two corporations.

Finally, Patrick testified that although he never discussed the matter with his father, he knew from working with Kenmore and from reading articles about a decline in unionism in the United States that former Kenmore customers which were previously union shops had become nonunion and that they would seek nonunion companies such as Sloan to perform steel erection.[20] It thus is evident from Patrick's testimony that Sloan was created at least in part to do business with nonunion customers and to perform work at sites at which Kenmore was prohibited by the BTC from working. The intent to operate a nonunion company and to build a customer base of nonunion companies does not, without more, manifest an unlawful purpose or indicate antiunion animus. However, where the nonunion corporation's operations are so interrelated with its union counterpart as to be substantially identical, and the corporations share a common business purpose, customers, management, and owners, such a stated intent is further evidence of alter ego status.[21]

In view of all the foregoing, we find that Kenmore and Sloan are alter egos. As the record establishes that Sloan failed to apply the terms of the union contract to its ironworker employees, we find further that Kenmore and Sloan have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by their failure to do so.

REMEDY

Having found that Sloan and Kenmore unlawfully failed to apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement between Kenmore and the Union to Sloan's ironworker employees, we shall order that they cease and desist and that they maintain and give full force and effect to the 1981-1984 CIEA-union contract retroactive to February 26, 1983,[22] and amendments and subsequent agreements covering the unit employees,[23] to which Kenmore is a party. Kenmore and Sloan will be required to take the actions necessary to fulfill their contractual obligations, including but not limited to: (1) reimbursing their former and current employees for any loss of wages and benefits they may have incurred since February 26, 1983, because of the Respondents' failure to apply the established terms and conditions of the agreement, with interest;[24] (2) making all required payments to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreements;[25] and (3) reimbursing their employees for actual costs they incurred (such as payments to health care providers and to third-party insurers) by reason of the Respondents' failure to make required contributions to agreed-on health care and insurance plans, with interest.[26] Additionally, in view of the nature of employment in the construction industry, we find that posting notices at the Respondents' place of business is inadequate to inform the Respondents' present and former employees of their rights under this Decision and Order. Therefore, we shall order that in addition to posting the attached notice at their place of business, the Respondents will post copies of the notice at their jobsites, and furnish signed copies of the notice to the Union for posting at the Union's office and meeting places.[27]

[18] Sloan's near total dependence on Kenmore further distinguishes this case from Victor Valley Heating, supra. From its formation, Concord, the nonunion business established by the son, had its own offices, equipment, and tools. The trucks that it leased from Victor Valley were essentially surplus since Victor Valley had gone into a different kind of business, and there was no evidence that the monthly lease payments by Concord (which included a 10-percent profit for Victor Valley) represented less than the market rate. 267 NLRB at 1293, 1297.

[19] Cherub's testimony in this regard strains credibility, given the office arrangement and the fact that she is Sloan's highest-ranking officer and the custodian of its records. The judge did not discredit the testimony, however. Assuming its veracity, Cherub's ignorance about such matters gives rise to an inference that her parents held considerable decision-making authority in Sloan.

[20] Hugh testified that Kenmore had lost a lot of jobs because of BTC restrictions on union contractors.

[21] See Advance Electric, 268 NLRB at 1004.

[22] The normal remedy for violations of this nature is limited to the 10(b) period, in this case 6 months prior to the filing of the charge on August 26, 1983, and no basis has been shown in the present case for a departure from this rule. See Al Bryant, Inc., 260 NLRB 128 fn. 3 (1982).

[23] The appropriate unit is ironworkers and ironworker apprentices employed by Kenmore Equipment Contracting Co., Inc. and Sloan Steel Erection and Rental Equipment, Inc.

[24] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[25] Interest, if any, on trust fund contributions, shall be determined at the compliance stage of this proceeding in the manner set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

[26] Interest on these sums shall be computed in the manner set forth in fn. 24, supra.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondents, Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. and Sloan Steel Erectors and Equipment Rental, Inc., Cheektowaga, New York, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing or refusing to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 6, AFL-CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of their employees in the appropriate unit, and failing or refusing to honor collective-bargaining agreements applicable to those employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Maintain and give full effect to the 1981-1984 collective-bargaining agreement between Iron Workers Local No. 6 and the Construction Industry Employers Association, Inc. retroactive to February 26, 1983, and any amendments and subsequent agreements covering the unit employees, retroactive to February 26, 1983, including but not limited to: (1) making whole all unit employees for any loss of wages and benefits they may have incurred since February 26, 1983, because of the Respondents' failure to apply or maintain the established terms and conditions of such agreements; (2) making required payments to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreements; and (3) reimbursing their employees for any actual expenses they incurred which ensue from the Respondents' failure to make such contributions; all as set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at their place of business and at each of their jobsites copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[28] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained by them for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by the Union, if it is willing, at its office and meeting halls, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to recognize and bargain collectively and in good faith with International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 6, AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit, or fail or refuse to honor collective-bargaining agreements applicable to those employees. The appropriate unit is:

> All ironworker and ironworker apprentice employees employed by Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. and its alter ego, Sloan Steel Erectors and Equipment Rental, Inc., excluding all other employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

[27] See generally Apex Decorating Co., 275 NLRB 1459 (1985).

[28] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

We will maintain and give full effect to the collective-bargaining agreement between Local 6 and the CEIA and its employer-members which was effective by its terms from June 1981 through May 1984, and any amendments and subsequent agreements covering the unit employees, retroactive to 26 February 1983, and including but not limited to

(1) Making whole all unit employees for any loss of wages and benefits they incurred because of our failure to apply or maintain the established terms and conditions of such agreements, with interest,

(2) Making required payments to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreements,

(3) Reimbursing our employees for any actual costs they have incurred which ensued from our failure to make required contributions to contractually established trust funds, with interest.

Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. and Sloan Steel Erectors and Equipment Rental, Inc., Alter Egos

Doren G. Goldstone, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Joseph L. Randazzo, Esq. (Flaherty, Cohen, Grande, Randazzo & Doren, P.C.), of Buffalo, New York, for Respondent Kenmore.

Mario J. Rossetti, Esq., of Buffalo, New York, for Respondent Sloan.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Winifred D. Morio, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me from January 16–18, 1984, in Buffalo, New York. The complaint, which was issued by the Regional Director for Region 3, on October 7, 1983, alleged, in substance, that Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. (Respondent Kenmore) and Sloan Steel Erector and Equipment Rental, Inc. (Respondent Sloan) are either alter ego corporations or constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act and that Respondent Sloan, since on or about January 1983, has failed to apply the terms and conditions of employment, contained in the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between Respondent Kenmore and International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 6, AFL–CIO (the Union), to its employees and has failed to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees of both Respondents in a combined unit. The answers filed by Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan deny that the corporation are alter egos or constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act and also deny that the combined employees of Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan constitute an appropriate unit as defined in Section 9(b) of the Act. The answer filed by both Respondents also claim that the Union has not demanded that Respondent Kenmore or Respondent Sloan apply the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between Respondent Kenmore and the Union to the employees of Respondent Sloan. Finally, the answer filed by both Respondents allege that the complaint is time barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

All parties were given a full opportunity to participate in the proceedings, to cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by all parties.

On the entire record in the case and my observation of the witnesses and after careful consideration, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, the principal place of business of Respondent Kenmore has been located at 1560 Harlem Road, Cheektowaga, New York, where it is and has been engaged in the steel erection and equipment rental business. During the past year Respondent Kenmore, in the course and conduct of its business operations, provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for Morton Salt Co., an enterprise directly engaged in interstate commerce. The parties admit, and I find, that Respondent Kenmore is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The record fails to disclose jurisdictional facts with respect to Respondent Sloan. It is the position of counsel for the General Counsel that the jurisdiction over Respondent Sloan is based on "whether the Respondents are alter egos or in the alternative single employers."

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties admit, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Respondent Kenmore was established in 1919, and in 1966 its outstanding stock was purchased by Hugh Hanley Jr. and Jacqueline Hanley, who are presently, respectively, vice president and president.[1] Respondent Kenmore is and has been a member of the Construction Industry Employers Association, Inc. (CIEA), and as such, has been a party to collective-bargaining agreements with several labor organizations, including the Union. The most recent agreement between Respondent Kenmore and the Union was effective between June 1981 and May 1984. Hugh Hanley Jr. has been a member of the negotiating committee for CIEA for over 12 years and is a trustee for the Iron Workers Health Care and Pension Fund. According to Hanley, Respondent Kenmore and other members of CIEA have been advised by the Building Trades Council, of which the Union is a member, that union contractors cannot bid on a job if there is a nonunion contractor on the job. Hanley testified that Respondent Kenmore lost "quite a few jobs" as a result of that directive.

[1] These are the only officers of the corporation.

In November 1981, Cherub and Patrick Hanley, who are the children of Jacqueline and Hugh Hanley Jr. formed the corporation, Respondent Sloan, with Cherub as president and Patrick as vice president.[2] The corporation was formed to perform essentially the same type of work performed by Respondent Kenmore, in basically the same geographic area, in the western part of New York State. At the time they formed the corporation Cherub and Patrick were, respectively, 27 and 21 years of age and both were receiving financial assistance from their parents. Thus, Cherub Hanley, although living with her son in her own residence, received approximately one-half of her expenses for rent, utilities, and her son's clothes and education needs from her parents.[3] Patrick Hanley, both at the time of the formation of the corporation and at the time of the hearing, resided with his parents when not attending school and received financial assistance from them for his education and living expenses. Both individuals claim that they formed Respondent Sloan to gain financial independence and because they saw a limited future if they continued with their employment with Repsondent Kenmore. Cherub Hanley was employed in November 1981 as a receptionist for Respondent Kenmore and Patrick Hanley was employed as a yardworker. Although both individuals contend that they had considerable knowledge about the steel erection and equipment rental business by virtue of their relationship with their parents, the record fails to reveal that these individuals had performed the type of work involved in the steel erection industry, or had supervised the performance of such work. There is also no evidence that either Cherub or Patrick Hanley had submitted bids for steel erection jobs or estimated such jobs prior to the formation of Respondent Sloan. It also appears that both Cherub and Patrick Hanley had limited education backgrounds in the business area. Cherub Hanley, at the time of the formation of Respondent Sloan, had some bookkeeping courses while in high school and Patrick Hanley had received an associate degree in construction technology from Erie Community College (ECC) and had commenced his freshman year at Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT).[4]

According to the testimony of Cherub and Patrick Hanley, the formation of Respondent Sloan was funded by $1400 from Cherub and $1200 from Patrick. These moneys, apparently, were used for incorporation fees, for letterheads, and for the salaries of Cherub and Patrick. Cherub Hanley testified that she secured her moneys from the sale of her car, which had been a gift from her parents. Patrick Hanley testified that he secured the money he put into the corporation from a loan he had secured for school purposes, but which he did not apply to that purpose because his school tuition was paid by his parents. Cherub Hanley testified that when she sold her car in November 1981 Respondent Sloan leased a car, which she began to use in November 1981, from Respondent Kenmore. The car was leased for the sum of $150 per month, a figure that was determined by Respondent Kenmore. However, it does not appear that Respondent Sloan began to make the payments for leasing the car until some months after November 1981.[5]

Commencing in November 1981, Respondent Sloan rented office space from Respondent Kenmore. The space rented was in a building owned by Respondent Kenmore and was on the same floor where the office of Respondent Kenmore was located and where other tenants, who rented desk space from Respondent Kenmore, also were located. The area rented by Respondent Sloan, approximately 8 by 10 feet, was separated by a partition from the area used by Respondent Kenmore and the other tenants and it contained a desk and phone, both of which were used by Cherub and Patrick Hanley. There was no written lease for the use of office space between the two Respondents or, apparently, between Respondent Kenmore and other tenants. Initially, according to C. Hanley, Respondent Sloan had planned to use the 25 Gratton Street entrance as the address for the new corporation rather than 1560 Harlem Road address used by Respondent Kenmore. However, that plan was not followed because the space near the Gratton entrance was leased to another tenant. Respondent Sloan agreed to pay the sum of $100 a month to Respondent Kenmore as a rental fee.[6] However, Respondent Sloan was frequently late in making these monthly payments, sometimes for periods as long as 6 months, and it was not required to pay either interest or late payment penalties. C. Hanley testified that this same courtesy was extended to other tenants by Respondent Kenmore due to the difficult financial conditions in the area. The younger Hanleys did not purchase office equipment when they formed Respondent Sloan but used Respondent Kenmore's office equipment and they had free access to the entire area outside the space occupied by Respondent Sloan. It also appears that C. Hanley used office supplies of Respondent Kenmore, including timesheets and scratch pads, without reimbursing Respondent Kenmore for the use of the material.[7] C. Hanley testified that she received permission to use the office equipment and supplies and she "assumed" that the use of these supplies was included in the monthly rental fee, although the matter was not discussed when the fee for the office space was negotiated.

After the formation of Respondent Sloan, C. Hanley continued her employment with Respondent Kenmore as a receptionist. She was paid $150 a week by Respondent Kenmore for that work, which included typing duties and answering phones. She was also paid $50 a week by Respondent Sloan and her duties included preparing paychecks, distributing them at the jobsites,[8] paying taxes and other bills and in general maintaining the financial records for Respondent Sloan. On at least one occasion she authorized a Respondent Kenmore employee to purchase equipment, however, it is unclear when this occurred. The record reveals that during the period between November 1981 and July 1983, C. Hanley divided her hours of work equally between the corporations, although there was a substantial difference in the moneys she received from the corporations. It does not appear that C. Hanley was required to or did work specific hours for either corporation. In July 1983, C. Hanley ceased working for Respondent Kenmore and about the same time her salary for Respondent Sloan was increased to $150 a week.

[2] Cherub and Patrick are the only officers of this corporation.

[3] She was receiving the same type of assistance at the time of the hearing.

[4] It appears that sometime after the formation of the corporation, Cherub Hanley took an adult education class in bookkeeping and an accounting course at ECC. Patrick was scheduled to receive his degree from RIT in May 1984.

[5] Cherub Hanley testified that she knew "some time went by" before Respondent Sloan began to make payments for the lease of the car, although she was uncertain as to the length of time. She also testified that at the time of the hearing she was "caught up" with the car payments.

[6] Hanley testified that, initially, rent was paid to Jacqueline C. Hanley and then it was paid to Respondent Kenmore.

[7] Respondent Sloan, however, did have its own forms, including invoices.

As noted, part of the duties C. Hanley performed for Respondent Sloan included maintaining the books of that corporation. It is conceded that prior to her employment with Respondent Sloan, C. Hanley had limited actual experience in bookkeeping duties. The record reveals that C. Hanley received assistance with respect to these duties from Tina Kazinski, an employee of Respondent Kenmore. This assistance was not limited to the time when Respondent Sloan began its operations but continued through 1983. In fact, in many instances it was Kazinski who actually prepared the records for Respondent Sloan. Thus, C. Hanley testified that Kazinski wrote the names and addresses of Respondent Sloan employees on compensation forms and entered the number of exemptions for each employee on these forms. An examination of Respondent Sloan's payroll and timesheet records[9] for 1983 discloses that, although C. Hanley made entries on these records, numerous entries were made also by Kazinski and to a lesser degree by Jacqueline Hanley.[10] The parties stipulated that in the instances where Kazinski's handwriting appeared it was she who computed the figures that appeared in the record. C. Hanley testified that she requested Kazinski to prepare the payroll when she was not available[11] and "she does it as part of the rents which I pay Kenmore, the hundred dollars a month." At another point, C. Hanley testified that she did not pay wages to any Respondent Kenmore employee for work done in connection with Respondent Sloan's payroll. C. Hanley did not know if she asked her parents whether she could use the services of Kazinski to assist her in preparing Respondent Sloan's records.[12]
